INTRODUCTION.

In entering on our fifth Volume, we shall briefly advert to a few topics, peculiarly interesting to the Catholic Community in India. It is admitted, even by our adversaries, that the progress of our Holy Faith in every part of this great empire is so remarkable, that it moves them to leave no effort untried, to wrest what, through ignorance and prejudice in their minds an evil, but, what by us, who have the happiness to profess the true Faith, must be hailed, as the appearance of the orient from on high," as, the diffusion of that true saving light, which illumines those to whom God hath given power to become his sons, and whom, by his vocation to the Catholic Faith, he has prepared for the inheritance of his grace here and of eternal life hereafter. In support of the consoling fact we have referred to, we may appeal to the long lists of converts, which for the last few months, it has been our glory to send forth to the world, in the pages of this journal. It is, moreover, now placed beyond all doubt, that the chief Catholic doctrines which have hitherto proved the most formidable obstacle to the conversion of our separated brethren, have found favor at length and are hailed, as the offspring of the Apostolic ages, by several of the most gifted among the English Protestant clergy serving in India. Added to this, the notorious dissensions, revilings and recriminations of the English clergy and the Baptist and other Protestant Sectaries here, which the press has so often lately announced, for the edification of the public. On one side, a Baptist or Independent minister openly accuses one or more English Protestant ministers, that some of his converts had been fraudulently, and by mercenary influence seduced from his to the English Protestant communion: on the other, a clergyman of the English Protestant Church, publishes a Catalogue of criminals, whom the Baptists have received and dignified with the appellation of converts. Let us pause here for a moment, and reflect, what would be the impressions excited in our minds, by these conflicting narratives, had it been our misfortune, to have grown up in the profession of the native superstitions which prevail in India. Heathens or pagans, as in the proposed hypothesis, we suppose ourselves to be, what should we think of English Protestant and Baptist Protestant or Independent Christianity? We peruse their respective statements. We find, that their testimonies against each other are of a conflicting and contradictory character. That if the testimonies of both be true, both parties must have enacted a most unworthy part, they must have sacrificed the interests of truth and of pure religion to considerations of a sordid-partizanship, and of a base mercenary character. If, on the contrary, the testimony of both be false, then are we forced to arrive at a conclusion still more dishonorable to human nature. For, we are, thus, obliged to confess, that, for the sake of a paltry triumph at the expence of truth, one party or the other charged its adversary with grievous accusations, of which, if the accused were guilty, they would merit from every honest man the most unqualified condemnation. If in these circumstances, and whilst utterly estranged from the knowledge of the house of peace and unity, of the temple wherein dwell Unity, Sanctity, Catholicity and Apostolicity unbroken and undefiled, it were incumbent on us to enquire and decide, if Christianity were to be preferred by us, seated, as we suppose, ourselves to be in darkness and in the shadow of death, even in the very depths of Indian superstition, to what conclusion, we ask, could we reasonably come? Could we give credence to conflicting sectaries, who, unsteady and daily vacillating in their own religious belief, cruelly or rashly calumniated the Creed of their rivals? Undoubtedly not. Could we act thus, more especially, if it were proved conclusively to us, that from their recent origin, both the conflicting parties referred to, had even in the opinion of their respective adherents, repeatedly uttered foul slanders and calumnies against the most ancient and universally diffused Christian Community throughout the world? That for this grievous crime against Catholics, several Protestant Clergymen and Laymen had been visited with severe punishment by Protestant Judges and Juries in every part of the British Dominions, and that even, from almost the very birth of the Reformation, Whitaker, a Protestant Clergyman had pronounced "forgerly or falsehood to be the plague spot of Protestantism." Most certainly we could not. Were we to confine our inquiry to the proofs of divine origin which such sects could advance, we would not feel ourselves bound in conscience, however eager to know the truth, to embrace the peculiar tenets of either. Our first feeling would be one of loathing and disgust, at the outrageous violation of charity and truth, which they had respectively perpetrated. Obeying the impulse of right reason, we, Pagans or Heathens, as the case might be, would naturally inquire, whether these conflicting sects of Protestantism did or did not deem the belief and profession of their respective peculiar tenets required for salvation? If they did not, then why disturb the peace of society, why give scandal to the public, by publishing to the universe their accusations of bribery and corruption against one another, merely because one Protestant sect, which was as much in the way of salvation as its rival, gained over from another Protestant sect a few Proselytes? If these had been brought over by mercenary means, the crime was imputable to their seducers and to themselves as a personal sin, but notwithstanding, the Proselytes in reality had only exchanged one form of sound worship for another, and they were still as secure of their salvation as they previously had been. And if this be so, where is the great room for accusation, when the crime imputed consists, not in inducing others to do what is in itself wrong and sinful, but merely to adopt one mode of expressing truth in preference to another. Had undue influence or mercenary means been employed to pervert others from truth to falsehood, the injury to truth would then have been grievous, and no language could be too strong which would be employed in its condemnation. But, when there is question of transferring persons merely from one order of truths, as it were, to another, then, in reality, there appears to be no just grounds of public complaint or invective, because the religious interests of the parties thus transferred, are provided for as securely in the present circumstances as they were before. We are forced to view the subject in this light because, it is notorious, that, the sectaries who have lately inveighed against each other with such bitterness, unite together in Bible and other such Meetings and Societies, and profess publicly for one another the esteem and charity of religious Brotherhood, most especially when they find it meet, to discharge a few volleys against Catholics. But if the view of the subject be not just, if in heart and in reality, each of these contending parties hold, that its own sect alone professes the saving truths of the Gospel, and that its adversaries are all estranged from the same happy privilege, then, how, or with what consistency, can they, even for the sake of clubbing together to strike down the Pope with greater certainty, assume, as they so often do, the semblance of religious Brotherhood, when, indeed and in truth, they are as exclusive and hostile in their sentiments towards one another, as the Catholic Church is towards error, under whatever guise or name it may present itself. But the fact is, error must be ever inconsistent and the inconsistency cannot fail to betray itself in due time, however its abettors strive to conceal it from themselves and public. In religious truth, Catholicity admits of no compromise, the minutest iota of creed must be received with the same faithful reverence, as the dogma of the Trinity that of the Incarnation. Hence, the inflexible consistency of the Catholic Church. Hence is She likened by the Prophecy to an army in battle array. Hence do Holy Scriptures proclaim, that her watchmen shall never slumber, but that day and night they shall cry aloud, in order to cheer their brethren and to confound their adversaries.

On our own prospects, as Journalists, do not deem it necessary to dwell. Accounting as the sacred cause to the support which we are pledged has progressed, and circulation of THE BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD has been proportionally increased, and we are confident, that for the future, according to truth proceeds, like a giant in its course, it goes on conquering and to conquer, our labors will be more fully appreciated. In the their support to these exertions, our brethren will co-operate, not only to defeat error but to advance the true faith, but will have moreover the great additional comfort, of contributing by their subscriptions to this journal, to uphold and enlarge both the Orphanage and the other religious institutions of the Bengal Vicariate.

CHINA MISSION.

The following items extracted from a private letter, dated 29th March last, written by a Military Gentleman at Chusan, will be read with pleasure by the friends of the Rev. Mr. Daricourt, who was amongst us last year, and who with six others have since joined the Chinese Mission.

"We have a great treasure here in the person of the Rev. Monsr. Daricourt,—he is one of the most zealous little men I ever met in my life, and notwithstanding the difficulty he has had to study the English language without almost any assistance—he has so far surmounted it, that he is and has been able for the last three months to hear confessions and administer comfort to the sick in hospital. He is also getting on very fast with the Chinese.

Last Sunday, Mass was offered up by a Chinese priest from Macao—he was educated in France and seems a very nice person. The Jesuits who came here at the same time as Monsr. Daricourt have gone to Thanghi and believe are getting on very well."

ARRIVAL OF MISSIONARIES.

The French Ship Le Laborieux arrived at Pondicherry on the 8th of the present Month: brought out 8 Priests from the Seminary for Foreign Missions at Paris, viz. Rev. Messrs. Luquet, Virot, Tahier, D'Egoust, Journaux, Venault, Favre and Martin. Rev. Messrs. Luquet and Virot are destined for Pondicherry. Rev. Messrs. Tahier and D'Egoust for Cochin China. Mr. Journaux for Siam. Mr. Venault will be informed at Macao on what Mission he is to serve. Rev. Messrs. Favre and Martin are appointed to conduct the Chinese College at Penang. The "Le Laborieux" will convey six of these Holy Missionaries to Singapore. Two other Priests, Rev. Messrs. Titand and Forcat, are expected to arrive soon at Pondicherry. They embarked some time since in the French Frigate "Cicopatra," which is to call at Pondicherry.

MADRAS.—The Rev. Mr. McAuliffe has arrived at Madras from Rome, whither he had been sent by Bishop Carew to complete his Theological Studies.

FORT WILLIAM.—A numerous Congregation assisted at Fort William Catholic Chapel on last Sunday morning. Fifty seven received the Sacrament of Confirmation, and seventy-two approached the Holy Communion. The Chapel, we regret to add, is entirely unfit for Divine service in this climate for the numbers which ordinarily resort to it. Not only the Clergyman but the men, women and children who are crowded together in it must, whilst there, suffer seriously from excessive heat and exhaustion. It was impossible not to remark the eagerness, with which all who had an opportunity, strove to accommodate themselves near the door of the apartment, in order to inhale a little fresh air. We trust that the authorities will at once adopt means to remedy this intolerable grievance. Some lacs of Rupees have been expended in building the Fort Church, why not lay out a reasonable sum in erecting there also a suitable place for Catholic worship. The Catholics in H. M. 10th Regt. are more numerous than the Protestants, and generally speaking constitute about one half of Her Majesty's Regiments. In justice therefore they are entitled to be provided with a decent and heathful temple for Divine Worship. It is a mockery to proclaim to them, that they enjoy Religious liberty equally with their Protestant comrades, whilst they are huddled together, like cattle in Smithfield, in a Godown or a Garrett, and their Chaplain, as is the case in Fort William, left unprovided with a single penny of salary to pay for his support or conveyance to and from the scene of his numerous and laborious duties. What must be the feelings of the Catholics when, in contrast with this gross neglect of their religious concerns, they reflect that a stately Church with stained glass windows and Pulkahs, together with a Clergyman on a salary of about £900 per annum are provided, at the expence of Government, for their Protestant fellow Soldiers?

CONFIRMATION.—On next Sunday (tomorrow) Confirmation will be administered at Chandernagore by the Right Rev. the Bishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

CHITTAGONG MISSION.

We are indebted to the kindness of our Venerated Bishop for the following letter, addressed to his Lordship by that zealous French Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Barbe, giving an interesting account of his visitation tour through some of the districts in the Chittagong Mission.

MY LORD,—I started from Chittagong on the evening of the 25th April and reached Noakhallee on the 27th. the distance is 74 miles. I had previously sent my Catechist to prepare the Christians for the reception of the sacraments, thinking that, generally speaking, they were instructed in the principal mysteries of religion, but in that I was mistaken as I shall state hereafter.

The road is good enough, but the Ferry Boats are of the worst description, and on neither side of the river are houses where people in case of being prevented crossing by bad weather can shelter themselves; hence it happens some times that they are obliged to remain exposed to the weather for hours—a great deal of money is collected by the Ferry and there is a committee appointed to dispose of the funds, but they cannot carry into effect their resolution until the government sanction it, and as that takes some time, on account of the several references made from both sides, the money is kept and the people receive no advantage by it. The Company receives about 30 Lacs clear on account of the Monopoly at Chittagong, without speaking of other revenues proceeding from the land Khazana, Stamp paper &c. and does not spend hardly a rupee for the good of the country,—the roads and bridges are made by the money proceeding from the Ferry funds and the Tax on houses pay for the Choukedars.

Going from Chittagong to Noakhallee very few spots of ground are to be seen uncultivated, but in the last mentioned district the soil is better tilled than it is at Chittagong where the plough penetrates the ground only a few inches. The land at Noakhallee generally gives two crops every year. The grass being in abundance the oxen are of a larger size than at Chittagong and stronger also. The Buffaloes are also in great numbers: in some parts of the district, these being powerful animals are very useful. In this district are found wild Buffaloes in great number, they find refuge in the marshy places where they live on coarse plants which they prefer,—in the night they go close to villages, they are to be seen sometimes from 20 to 30 in the same spot. The way to catch them is to drive domestic Buffaloes close to them, some persons concealing themselves under the tame ones; having succeeded in driving a part of the wild in the Jungle, they surround one and throw over his neck a noose, securing the other part of the herd to the tame ones, they take him in that way to their villages. This animal is difficult to tame, but being so strong, he pays for the trouble that the people take to domesticate him, the hide is very strong, the milk very rich and the flesh not so bad as some people say.

Buffaloe hunting is a great sport,—the sportsmen proceed to the marshy places where they are to be found, on elephants, and surrounding the place, of the Buffaloe they advance; the greatest part run in the Jungle but the largest stands generally on the spot, to cover the retreat of the others and so he becomes the victim of his zeal. Wild boars are in so great numbers, particularly in the month of November and December, that the rich Zemindars are obliged to keep persons to drive them from their fields,—some of our Christians are thus employed. One of these persons was killed some years ago by a Tiger. Leopards go sometimes during the night in the villages, they feed on dogs and very seldom attack men, unless wounded. Two or three years ago the Christians of Noakhallee killed a Boaconstrictor close to the chapel, measuring about twenty feet. The Musulmans and Bengalees of these districts are the most litigious people known; for the sake of a Rupee they will carry their case from Court to Court and expend sometimes their all without seeing the end of their dispute. The facilities the people have of complaining, the Courts being in great a number, assist them in indulging their quarrelsome disposition. The profession of lawyer is I think the best for making money, but to these Vakeels I would not apply the definitions of Cicero, viz. "probus dicendi-peritus" but I would call them, viz. duphen litigandi peritus. Athens and Rome honored Concordia with altars and temples representing the goddess with a horn of plenty in her left, but the people here honor Discordia, and the Diva bestows on her worshipper all the misery proceeding from discord. I have been in different places of India but I have never seen a people so badly fed, clothed and so badly lodged as are the Bengalees here. The soil is rich, the people work hard, what then is the cause of such misery? The Ryots gather the thorn for themselves and the fruits for their rulers.

The Christians at Noakhallee are 633 in number. It is a great pity that they have no clergyman to take care of them. I have never seen people more ignorant on religion than they are; few of them know the principal mysteries of Christianity. I was with them for 10 days and during that time the boys and girls were very attentive to the Catechism. The people do not drink so much here as those of Chittagong, and I think that if your Lordship could send them a priest, he could reform easily the bad customs introduced from ignorance. I have left in the hands of Mr. Barber, one of the Deputy Collectors, who is a very pious person, 100 Rupees to build a Church, and I will send to Calcutta 50 Rs. to buy vestments. The money was left by a Christian woman who died some years ago. Should your Lordship have the intention to send a clergyman, please to let me know before hand, because in that case I would write to Noakhallee to have a house ready for him. He could reside there a part of the year and spend the other part at Agartolah. Here neither schism nor money matters are to be feared.

I started from Noakhallee on the 8th May and arrived at Comilla on the 11th in the morning, the distance is I believe about 70 miles, there is only a foot path for about 30 miles and as there had been much rain the week before, the fields were covered with water and the road in the worst state. I think that it would be a good plan to expend a part of the Ferry fund to repair it, as the distance from Noakhallee to the junction of Chittagong road to Comilla is only about 30 miles: some time ago there was talk about it; had some plan been proposed to increase the revenues it would have been put into execution then, but as the matter was to expend money the thing is in statu quo.

I spent 3 days in the house of Mr. Courgeon, the rich Zemindar of Comilla, in the company of his brother-in-law Mr. LeColier who is one of the most amiable French gentleman that I have met with for many years. To him and to Mr. and Mrs. DeLaney I beg to return many thanks for their kindness. On Sunday I celebrated mass in their house,—this is the only Catholic family in the district. Comilla is a very low place, but the roads are splendid—the station is, it is said, very healthy: the ladies and gentlemen there are very respectable people.

On the 16th I started from Comilla to Agartolah, which is the residence of the Rajah of Tipperah. As I had to cross the fields for the 45 miles which separate these places, I had the loan of 2 Elephants one from Mr. Le Colier and the other from Mr. Wats, the Rajah's Mooktear or Agent. This gentleman had also the goodness to give me a letter for the Raja. The first day I rested at Mogra, which place I reached at 7 o'clock in the evening. The Raja has there a villa where he goes sometimes to spend a few days. Starting early in the morning, I perceived the King's Palace, if such a name can be given to a house of two story with small windows, as are the common Bengalee houses at Calcutta. Close to his lodgings are about a hundred huts, where reside I suppose his Ministers and his Body-guard. The Rajah could not choose a worse place to reside on, this being a field covered with water for a part of the year. Formerly he lived at about 4 miles from that place, his Palace was on an elevated spot of ground close to the hills, but 2 or 3 years ago the Bramins who have an unlimited controul on him advised him to change his residence. It appears his predecessor had left him some money that was kept in his cellar, the money sunk some feet in the ground, occasioned, I suppose by rats rooting up the soil or perhaps by white ants, but whatever may be the cause, the Bramins attributed it to the devil, and told the King that if he resided there any longer the gentleman whose name some of the newspapers do not like to mention, for respect I suppose for his person, would take him also: this was enough for the King to leave the place and build the new one. This my Lord, I have heard at Agartolah on good authority. No business of any kind is undertaken by the King without the advice and approbation of the Bramins. They are also found in Siam and the Burmah Empire where they are consulted upon many occasions. The King has his Bramin who is in the highest credit and esteem, and he would not go to war nor make peace without his advice—to him belongs to appoint the Capital of a New Government and their determinations are held inviolable—When I was at Ava, a Bramin who being too lazy to work, as is generally the case amongst them, and who did not know how to support his family, hearing that the King was very anxious to have a white Elephant, went to His Majesty and told him, that before three years were expired he would catch one as white as milk,—the King was so much pleased that he ordered him a great reward. His wife being surprised to see his hands full of money, asked where he had got it, the man explained it to her, saying at the same time not to be frightened, as in case that what he had foretold did not happen, the King would not remember it, and such was the case. The Elephant was not taken nor the Bramin molested. If consulted on something of importance, in giving their answer they express it as did the oracles of the heathens anciently, in such unintelligible words as to prove the truth of what they said whatever is the event.

The number of Christian houses at Agartolah are 28 and the Christians 118. I cannot express to your Lordship how happy and glad they were when they heard of my coming. The men came to meet me as far as they could, I gave to one of them the letter to the King. The Rajah after perusal, ordered some of his people to go to Agartolah and have the house of his Mooktear ready for me and to give me every thing that I should require, not only for myself but also for my people. The house being at too great a distance from the Christians I could not avail myself of his kindness, so I took my lodging in the house of a Christian, where those poor people who had never seen a Clergyman before, treated me with much more kindness than I could have expected. For the five or six days that I was there the whole of them, committing to their servants the care of their worldly business, spent a part of the day and night in hearing the word of God: they are certainly the best conducted people and the most attentive in hearing the way of salvation that I have met with for a long time. I told them to build a small place of worship and to assemble there every Sunday, they immediately agreed to it and they chose a spot in the centre of their habitation. How these people went there I was thus told. Above one hundred years ago, some went from Chittagong and some from Noakhallee as fighting people; the Raja who employed them was so much pleased with their courage that he gave them land, rent free, they were there very much respected, but since the king has taxed their land, so now they pay, as other people do, 11 Annas the kanee, but they seem very happy and I may say that their food is better, their dress more clean and their houses more comfortable than it is the case among the people who live under the British Flag. Some of the Christians are soldiers, their pay is four and six Rupees monthly according to their rank. They are not paid regularly but every 3 or 4 years once, and as they have little to do as Soldiers, they have time to cultivate their ground, and the King deducts from their pay the Khazana every two or three years. They go to war against the people who live on the Hills who have at their head some ancient relations of the Raja of Tipperah: these Barbarians descend sometimes on the plain where they commit every sort of crime. This year some hundreds of persons were sent by the King against them they were absent for 3 Months they killed some of the people and lost 2 persons. The Raja has a large property in the English territory at Comilla for which he pays about 70,000 Rs. annually to the Company for the Khazana. His income is about four lacs of Rupees yearly but his expences are so great that he is a great—ly in debt and had not the merchants of Comilla lent him money at the rate of 24 per cent, his Zemindary would have been sold a long time ago; he does not trouble himself about money the whole is in the hands of his Sircars—what is the benefit to be a King, says he, if I am obliged to look by myself into the accounts. He has the power of life and death on his subjects but I was told that he never condemned any one to death—if a person commits a small fault he is condemned by the son-in-law of the Raja, who fills the situation of Judge and Magistrate, to the Irons and to work for them—if the fault is more heavy the person guilty is sent out of the country.

I went to pay a visit to the Raja—the first day he could not receive me saying that he was sick, but the reason was, that the day was unlucky and on such days the Bramin would not allow him to receive a stranger: the second time I was more fortunate, he received me very cordially, we shook hands and after the Loça communia, how are you,—he asked me the reason for going to Tipperah. I asked him if he had any complaint against the Christians he said that he had none at all and that they were well conducted people. I asked him to give some land to the Christians who had lately arrived from Noakhallee, he immediately granted it. He is about 48 years, standing 5 feet 9 or 10 and all his people speak well of him. He has a large family and four Queens or Rances. I made him a present of a fine Burmah sword, and he gave me a pair of Pistols. The Gunja (Cannabis) which is the true European hemp, grows well in Tipperah (Comilla) as also the Papaner album, the people preserve the seeds of this last in bottles in which oil has been kept and when they wish to sow it they put the seeds for an hour in water previously. When the plant is nearly ripe they make some cuts in it from which flows the opium. The Mussulmen of this district take but little of this last Drug but it is not the same with Gunja, it is in great esteem amongst them. I am happy to say that I have never heard of our Christians using any of these Drugs. I recollect when I was at Penang the case of many Chinamen presenting themselves to become Christians, much addicted to opium smoking and as they could not be admitted of course, when engaged in such a habit, they checked it, by swallowing a tea spoon full of Brandy taken from a bottle in which was mixed two annas weight of opium—as they took it only from time to time they generally lost the habit before the bottle of Brandy was finished. On my return from Agartolah to Comilla I went to see an inflammable air which has risen since three years in a marshy place: the Fakeers have built there a house where the Hindoos go to worship the Gas; putting water in, the pit from which it rises, the flame discontinues, but on holding a light to the surface it takes fire without any explosion. This natural product has continued since first it made its appearance, but at my visit the Fakeer poured a second time so much water that he could not succeed for the hour that I was there to light it again. I have never seen a person so much disappointed, he smiled first at me and afterwards he looked at me torvis oculis, when I saw it I thought it was time to be off. I suppose that he has since succeeded to light it.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I have read with strong emotions of sympathy for the innocent but destitute Orphans of the Bengal Vicariate, the late address of the Right Rev. Dr. Carew in their behalf to the Catholic Soldiers of the Bengal Presidency; and if you think that the following lines may contribute in any way to second the charitable and powerful appeal of the good Bishop, I shall thank you to give them a place in your very interesting and very useful periodical.

THE SOLDIER'S ORPHAN.

Religion clean and undefiled before God and the Father is this; to visit the fatherless and widows in their tribulation. St. James c. 1. v. 27.

Have you heard the little ones cry?
Have you seen the widow's sorrow?
Or heard them ask—who will supply
Raiment, home, or bread to-morrow?

The son of the faithful and brave,
Deserted and fatherless weeps;
In hunger he points to the grave
Where the stay of his childhood sleeps.

Say, shall he weep unprotected,
Or lose his religion for bread,
His father's friends unaffected,
Because that brave father is dead?

His soul is the image of God,
His features his father's expre
His hanes yet untouched by the rod
Are fervently lifted to bless.

Say, shall not the father possess
The prayers of the child he caressed;
And shall not his orphan profess
The faith that commends him to rest?

Fed by the hands of the stranger,
Shall he learn from him to deride
The prayer of his father in danger,
The hopes he expressed as he died?

No—heaven forbid it and man,
Forbid it the friends of the poor;
Catholics forbid it—you can,—
Religion forbids it, I'm sure.

No,—Kingdoms and kings may forget
The soldier that bled for their sake,
And bigotted rulers may yet
His children pervert or forsake.

But long as the brave shall be good
And Irishmen true to their hearts,
The child of distress shall have food
And all that religion imparts.

The orphan, fed, clothed, and taught,
Shall e'er bless the hand that relieves,
And yet prize the virtue unbought
That practises all it believes.

He shall praise the land of his sires,
And enlightened by heavenly truth,
The holy Faith, love, that inspires
The virtues that fostered his youth.

Our good God the promise has made,
And all that he promised is given;
The crown he bestows will not fade,
And charity wears it in heaven.

CHARACTER OF BAPTIST CONVERTS IN BENGAL, BY REV. MR. JONES, A MEMBER OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

They have received into their service persons who had been employed as readers in the Tallygunge Mission, and who at the time of leaving us were under disgrace. A native who went by the name of Moesh Brahmin, was found guilty of setting fire to the house of a native christian at Sojeneberia, and accordingly debarred the society of his brethren. The man went over to the Baptists, and was immediately received by them and employed as a preacher.

Another native named Gungaram, who was receiving instruction at Tallygunge, with the view of being employed as a reader, was put to disgrace for beating his wife. He joined the Baptist at Nurseedachoke, and was appointed a teacher.

Bhuggoban, a reader stationed at Jhanjera, was dismissed for drunkenness and singing obscene songs. The man betook himself to the Baptists, and received almost an immediate employ.

Catechumens of immoral character have also been received.

From Banghy, a man named Seebu, who for joining the Rajarampore people in idol worship, was excluded the privilege of having a seat in the Church, was without any enquiry into his conduct, received by Mr. Wenger, and a chapel built near his house.

Raju Ghoogu from Ragapore, and Raju Morul from Baugaishur, who were living in adultery, have gone over to the Baptists. The latter told me that after a stay of a month with them he was married.

Dhurmo Doss of Jhanjera, put out of communion for singing with the heathen at the festival of the Churruck. The man went to Nurseedachok, and received a ready admittance from Mr. Thomas residing there.

I can bring forward many other cases, but these will, I trust, suffice to prove where the blame lies, as also how difficult it is to maintain in the Church that discipline so essentially necessary.

They complain of the appellations of Anabaptists, &c., being applied to them; and at the same time forget how they have endeavoured to lower us in the eyes of the public, by calling us Puseyites, Papists &c. If the truth were enquired into, it would be found that merely in defence of Episcopacy, we are branded with these titles by the Dissenters. I challenge them to bring forward any other reason.—Bengal Hurkaru, June 20.

THE CHILDREN OF CATHOLIC SOLDIERS.

To the Editor of the Tablet.

SIR,—Now that so much is said about the education of our Catholic youth, I observe, with extreme concern, that no one has directed his attention to the religious condition of the children of the non-commissioned officers and privates in our armies. I feel the more on this subject, as I shrewdly suspect, nay, as I would almost venture to affirm, that every Catholic child in every regiment and depot in the British army is being publicly instructed in the Church of England Catechism. I know, at least, one corps, almost exclusively Catholic, in which there is a school for boys, and another for girls; and in these schools the education, in every sense of the word, is wholly Church of England. Now, this should not be; as Catholics, we should raise our voice, the voice of nine millions of united Christians, against this monstrous iniquity. The Government, of course, parades much outward liberality. It allows Catholic soldiers to go to Mass on Sundays; but, at the same time, it strives during the week to proselytize the sons and daughters of these very same soldiers. It salaries, for this purpose, a Protestant schoolmaster and mistress (an apostate from Catholicism is always preferred, when such can be had); it furnishes Protestant school-books; it orders Protestant versions only of the Bible to be read, and Protestant catechisms to be taught; it puts into the hands of each child a most Protestant abridgment of the History of England, where Catholicism is painted in the most false and hideous colours; and, to crown all, it lays every child under the necessity of beginning and concluding every school-hour by truly Protestant prayers. Under these circumstances, I think our young papists of the army must be rare geniuses indeed, if they can long hold out against the alluring attractions of Church of Englandism. To give some idea of the education these poor children are blessed with, I need adduce only one fact, which I witnessed myself. Happening one day to be examining the penmanship of a smart young Irishman—a Catholic himself, and the son of a Catholic—I observed the lad had just copied out of the History of England, which was lying open before him, the following, to me rather startling sentence:—"William the Third, being a Calvinist, was naturally averse to religious persecution." Now, here is a young Catholic taught to believe that the hero of Glencoe, and of many other places—that the wilies and most unrelenting persecutor that Catholicism has had to encounter since the days of Julian, was a man overflowing with the milk of human-kindness; that he was naturally averse to cruelty; and that if he really had not been so very good, his meek and mild Calvinism would have effectually restrained his passions; ay, this very Calvinism that gave Servetus to the flames on the Continent and rioted in rebellion and blood amongst ourselves for upwards of a century and a half. Now, let me ask, does a history of this kind convey a correct idea of Dutch William and of Calvinism? Is it not intolerable that Catholics should be taught to think favourably of such a man, and of such a system?

But it is useless to dilate on this subject. One plain fact is, the beloved offspring of our brave soldiers are being led astray by an insidious and proselytizing system. Are we to look on with calm indifference? No; we are bound, each and all of us, and more particularly the Catholic Institute, to do all that lies in our power to rescue this valuable portion of our community from the awful dangers with which it is surrounded.

Yours,
A CORRESPONDENT.

ST. PATRICK'S-DAY IN PARIS.

(From Galignani's Messenger, May 5)

One of our private letters of Thursday states but—

“St. Patrick's-day was ‘kept’ at the Irish College, Paris, on Wednesday last, (falling always in the Lent, the celebration by a banquet is necessarily postponed until after Easter,) with somewhat unusual pomp. M. Fernan, Archbishop of Nice, and Junio of the Pope, celebrated mass, at which assisted, besides the superior (the Rev. Doctor Macveeny), the professors and students, who amount to considerably more than 100, the Archbishop of Paris, the Bishop of Nancy, and other dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church, and several distinguished laymen. A splendid déjeuner was served in the refectory, and although no toasts were drunk, or set speeches delivered, much interesting conversation occurred. The Bishop of Nancy (M. de Robin Janson) took occasion to observe that he had the course of last year visited Ireland, and had preached in Dublin, although, unfortunately, able to do so otherwise than in French. A recent friend stood by him however, and rendered the sentence in English. ‘I had been in many towns,’ said M. de Robin Janson, ‘including a considerable portion of the British empire—Canada, the Scotia, etc.,—and derived delight and consolation from the proofs of the existence of religion which I found there; but on first setting my foot on Irish ground I felt that I touched la vraie terre, the soil of sanctity par excellence. The air needed to me to breathe, and the countenances I held to speak purely and religiously.’ M. de Robin Janson, a member, I need hardly observe, of one of the most ancient families in France, and possessed of estates producing nearly 1,000,000fr. a-year, has, during a long period, distinguished himself as a zealous missionary. Although more than 60 years of age, and after having, like, fought under Napoleon in several campaigns, he appears endowed with moral and physical capabilities, strength, and energy, of which there are many examples. He has resolved on proceeding on his mission to China.—Times.

ISLAND OF TAHITI; OR FRENCH MISSIONARIES AND ENGLISH SWADDLERS.

I give all our readers credit for being acquainted with the existence of the far-famed island of Tahiti, or Otaheite, in the South Pacific Ocean. About fifty years this and the adjacent islands have been subjected to the spiritual tillage of the Protestant Missionary Society. It is customary here, and even at home among those who are not deeply read in the “Statistics of Dissent,” to tell of the various chaotic enterprises of a quasi-missionary character, which issue from our cradle of religious anarchy, as branches of the great heresy of the Methodists. Nothing can be more mistaken. The Methodists have neither been the most numerous nor the most successful of the Protestant missionaries. That honour undoubtedly belongs to a much older sect—the Independents—who, in the South Seas, with an amount of enterprise, skill, and perseverance by no means contemptible, have succeeded in establishing a collection of bustling societies, half commercial and half religious, of a very peculiar character. Of these they are naturally not a little proud, just as a worn-out father dotes on his only child, even though it be a dwarf or an idiot.

It has been often remarked that Protestantism is very bare of martyrs to attest its missionary zeal. M. de Carné, in a recent article on this subject of Tahiti, in the Revue des deux mondes, urges this very unpleasant imputation against the Protestant Missionaries, and remarks, that no people can be pointed out which they have “prepared for the baptism of blood.” The Morning Chronicle, commenting on this passage, altogether changes the phrase, and remarks that M. de Carné is ill-read in the history of Protestant missions when he assumes that they have never confronted peril. Of a truth, M. de Carné would have shown himself very ill-read in the history of European colonies, if he made any such preposterous assertion “Confronted perils!” of course they have. All new colonies are based upon perils. All founders of colonies must confront perils. The latest colonists to New Zealand encounter perils enough; nay, and annoyances and discomforts to boot. The establishment of all new colonies may be emphatically styled “the pursuit of money under difficulties;” and it matters little for this purpose whether the means by which the colonies are founded be bodily labour and hard bargaining by themselves, or bodily labour and hard bargaining with Bibles in addition.

We should not be acting fairly by these vulgar-factions of Missionaries, if we did not at the outset avow the inclination of our belief that many of them have gone out not merely for colonial purposes; nor solely as a hopeful method of bettering their fortunes; nor only to follow the blind cravings of a restless enterprise and ambition, like those of the Missionaries of Britain with whom the seas swarmed in the days of Drake and Raleigh; nor under an unadvised impression that the fertile soil and mild climate of these islands, together with the facile yielding character of their inhabitants, offered considerable temptations to Epicurean shopmen and apprentices, whose unfurnished heads were yet susceptible of Independent ordination. We are not altogether “ill-read in the history of Protestant Missions,” but we have not data enough before us from which to pronounce on the extent to which these motives may have operated. But we are bound to avow our conviction that among these men there have not been wanting some wild bewildered notions of “missionary enterprise” as something higher than a trade or commercial speculation. In these their most successful undertakings, however, we do conscientiously believe that the labour has been rather less than that attending colonial enterprises in general, the peril considerably less, and the worldly reward, to a certain order of minds—not very uncommon nor very exalted—considerably greater. In the course of half a century they have, without encountering any extraordinary risks, founded very notable societies, of which the members labour for their profit, and pay them tribute; over which they reign with their wives and families; and in which, by the confession of one of their ablest writers, they look through marriage to propagate a dynasty of missionaries over a race of tolerably obedient servants. To all this we have nothing to say, except to record that it has been, and how it has been; and we take occasion from it to reiterate what M. de Carné has said, and to declare that, to the best of our knowledge, they have never themselves encountered any considerable danger of the Baptism of Blood, and have never trained up any population to be sprinkled with this baptism. We have indeed, a vague recollection of a native Protestant martyr in Madagascar, martyred after her shepherds had fled before the storm and deserted their flocks; but among their numerous missions in the seas now under notice, we do not remember a single instance of the kind. They have had a certain kind of success as a better sort of colonists, but we are not aware that they have advanced much further.

However, even this is a transcendent success for Protestant Missionaries, and accordingly, it is not lightly to be abandoned without a struggle. Having but one such specimen of a mission, what a dreadful thing it will be to see it swept away, so that its place shall know it no more.

It has always been a great point with the Independent Missionaries to keep out Popery. Having put the Tahitian Bible (garnished with heresies of purely South Sea growth, in addition to those with which we are familiar in the northern hemisphere) into the hands of the profound theologians of the Pacific, even Tahiti, unless we greatly err, has not been without its heresiarchs; and it has been not without a good deal of management that the dusky Bible-readers of the coral islands have been purged of the leaven of private judgment, and drilled down into the heterodox uniformity, of which the standard measure is kept among the other archives and curiosities at London Wall. Having this hard struggle to maintain at home, it was not likely that they would be very anxious for the assaults of a spiritual enemy from without. Accordingly the subjects of Pomare have conceded to the most unlimited exercise of private judgment only they had better not construct new religions for themselves; and the very name of Popery must, if possible, be kept from their too credulous ears. The reader will now be in a position to understand something of the feeling of these worthy gentlemen when they learned, that, in consequence of some disputes between the Queen Pomare and the French Admiral Thouars the sovereignty of the island had suddenly passed into the hands of King Louis Philippe. Information has not yet been received of the precise causes of the dispute which has ended in this assumption of sovereignty on the part of France. For anything we know, the transaction may be as unjustifiable as most of our recent proceedings in the East. Sure we are that it cannot be worse. But let us waive all speculations on this point for the present, and attend only to the terms of the treaty by which the surrender has been effected.

TO THE ADMIRAL A. DU PETIT THOUARS.

Because we are not able to govern in our own kingdom, in the present circumstances, so as to harmonize with foreign Governments: lest our land, our kingdom, and our liberty should become that of another, we, the Queen and principal chiefs of Tahiti, write to you, to ask that the shadow of the King of the French may be thrown over us, on the following conditions:—

1. That the title and the government of the Queen and the authority also of the principal chiefs, remain in themselves over their people.

2. That all laws and observances be established in the name of the Queen, and have her signature attached to them, to render them binding on her subjects.

3. That the lands of the Queen and all her people shall remain in their own hands, and all discussions about lands shall be among themselves. Foreigners shall not interfere.

4. That every man shall follow that religion which accords with his own desire. No one shall influence him in his thoughts towards God.

5. That the places of worship belonging to the English missionaries, which are now known, shall remain unmolested, and the British missionaries shall continue to perform the duties of their office.

6. Persons of all other persuasions shall be entitled to equal privileges.

On these conditions, if agreeable, the Queen and chiefs solicit the protection of the King of the French. The affairs concerning foreign Governments, and also concerning foreign residents at Tahiti, are to be left with the French Government and with the officer appointed by that Government, such as port regulations, &c. &c.; and with them shall rest all those functions which are calculated to produce harmony and peace.

The news of this surrender caused great consternation, and it was "for the purpose of adopting measures urgently required by the recent aggression of the French on Tahiti, and for securing the general interest of British missions in the islands of the South Pacific"—that the great meeting of saints was convened last Wednesday week in Exeter Hall. Lord Roden was to have been in the chair, but domestic affliction detained him in the enemy's camp at Paris. Charles Hindley, a Whig Member of Parliament, "was moved into the chair" instead of him; and after some unintoxicated Pecksniffs had favoured the meeting with four verses of the 45th Psalm, "from D. Watt's collection," and a Wesleyan prayer had been offered up, Lord Roden's locum tenens opened the business of the meeting. We are not of course going to bore our readers with a full description of what followed this auspicious commencement, but one or two points we must notice.

Mr. Hindley began by giving an imperfect and not very exact narrative of the efforts of the Independent gentlemen to keep out Popery from Tahiti. In the course of his narrative he took occasion (as a Whig Member of Parliament) to remark that he did not object to Catholic missionaries landing at Tahiti and doing the best they could for their faith by weapons of reason and argument. The promulgation of this sentiment caused some little displeasure, and the speaker was obliged to protect himself to his supporters by an interpolated disquisition on religious liberty. Mr. Hindley then returned to the course of his narrative, and wound up by decrying with much unction, that

It was not because France was powerful that she was an oppressor; on the contrary, the more powerful nation was, the more it became her to be just. If a giant went a long the Strand, and treated with cruelty of dwarf he met, would not every person cry out him? But France, it appeared, was determined to colonise, and in that determination it did not mind acting unjust principle. He did not wish to drive our Government into a war on account of any difference on this subject, but he thought that they might press on the Government while it preserved peace, to remonstrate with France. The question, he maintained, was not only an English question, and Protestant question, but it was a question interesting to Christianity! and he was sure that if France committed injustice in order to possess colonies, she would not increase her moral power. (Cheers.)

We wonder whether it ever occurred to the Whig gentleman who uttered this pathetic appeal to Justice, and this plithetic apostrophe on the connexion between colonies and moral power, or to the audience by whom this appeal and this apostrophe were received with "cheers"—that only a few months had elapsed since the disgraceful abandonment by England, after the perpetration of every kind of robbery and spoliation, of a most wicked invasion of Afghanistan, and that only a few days had elapsed since the receipt of the news of "the greatest victory since Plassy," by which we coerced the Ameers of Scinde into giving up their ancient hunting-ground on the banks of the Indus, to promote the convenience of our course of traffic. Oh! it is a fine thing to have a conscience for other people! This very Mr. Hindley, who thus bewails the infatuation of France in that she "did not mind acting on an unjust principle" in her attempts to colonise, has been rather more manageable and docile in the House of Commons with regard to the giant iniquities in the East, by which his party have blasted the reputation of England among the nations for honesty and uprightness of conduct. No, no, gentlemen; one weight and one measure, if you please. You have deliberately placed our Eastern colonies on a footing of robbery; and you cannot therefore complain of any other nation for robbing and plundering. If Lord Aberdeen matters a word against Tahiti, M. Guizot chokes his rising complaints with the magic words of Cabool and Hyderabad. We have gone too far to recede. We have made our iniquities too glaring. We have enrolled ourselves on the side of the devil a little too openly. We have left ourselves no room henceforward to utter in the ear of any nation a single remonstrance touching justice or abstinence from aggression. And yet the Morning Chronicle, Lord Palmerston's hack has the monstrous effrontery to reproach Lord Aberdeen for not interfering to prevent this occupation. On what ground could he interfere, oh Chronicle? On the ground of Justice? Oh no; your employer has not left behind him in the Foreign Office so much as a shred or vestige of justice wherewith to follow up our lawful business with other Courts. We are miserably bankrupt of justice indeed.

Mr. Hindley was succeeded by a Parson of the Church of England, whose speech is thus recorded:—

The Rev. Mr. Maberly, who was announced as Vicar of Fenborough, Suffolk, rose to express his dissent from the opinion of the chairman, that the Roman Catholic missionaries ought not to be opposed. He thought the spread of Roman Catholicism ought to be opposed in every way. He considered the Roman Catholic faith as the direst superstition, the direst idolatry, the direst usurpation, and the direst tyranny that had ever existed in the world. He admitted the force of truth, but he contended that men must take means to enforce it. They lived under the protection of Providence; but if they did not bar their windows at night, they would not find their property safe in the morning (Cheers and interruption, and calls of "Fair play.") So it was with truth, and they must take human means to secure its ascendancy. The Roman Catholic religion sought to extinguish truth and liberty. For 1200 years it had allowed no truth to be heard in Spain, and he would defy the Roman Catholics everywhere. He contended they ought not to be allowed to go to Tahiti, which had been Christianized and civilized by Mr. Williams, one of the most extraordinary men that ever lived. He was delighted at the opportunity of bearing his testimony to the character of that estimable man, and he declared that he would rather see this country go to war than see it supporting the missionaries of the Roman Catholic Church.

Our readers may fancy that this Mr. Maberly is a wild mad-headed creature, to whose words no weight is to be attributed; but we shall show presently that this marplot is the real exponent of the views of those in whose interest the meeting was convened.

Dr. Vaughan was the next speaker, and moved a resolution which contained a strange medley of nonsense and falsehood. It pretended to "repudiate" the principle of restriction and coercion towards "other systems of religious belief," and it protested against "the establishment by force of the system of Popery" in Tahiti—the establishment of Popery in Tahiti being, as Dr. Vaughan very well knew, nothing more than the removal of those very "restrictions" and "coercions" which he had pretended to repudiate. The resolution also stigmatized the doings of M. Thiers "as evincing the spirit of Proselytism" rather than the power of Christian benevolence." This is an odd jargon. Seriously, we should like much to know Dr. Vaughan's interpretation of the word "Proselytism." After several speakers had addressed the meeting, and in particular after the Rev. Dr. Alder, Secretary of the Wesleyan Missionaries, had resolutely asserted that they did not "come there that day to object to the peaceful labours of French Missionaries," and after the chairman had pledged himself, that since 1839 "the Catholic Missionaries have had equal liberty with others," the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel more honestly avowed that "It was not the act of deporting two French Missionaries, but the law which prevented the settling of Roman Catholics in Tahiti, which had occasioned all the evils they deplored, and had given rise to irritation in France." We cannot follow the report of this meeting any further, except just to say that it was a meagre one and not by any means unanimous; for it appears that when at the close of the proceedings a Mr. Miller volunteered to ridicule the paying so much attention to distant lands while thousands were starving at home, "many persons in the meeting seemed to concur in the justice of the remark." On the whole, then, we may pronounce the affair to have been a failure in point of numbers and unanimity, and to have been a ludicrous failure in the matter of common consistency. We have now a word to say on the state of things in the South Seas which this meeting was intended to prop up; and which indeed formed the main object of the meeting.

The principal Protestant Missionary in Tahiti is a Mr. Pritchard—Piritati, as the natives call him—who has constituted himself prime minister of the island and secretary of state for foreign affairs. In a letter to the Belgian Consul, on December 3, 1836, he says, "All business transacted by this nation and foreigners is transacted by me." This person is, indeed, the real king of the island. The old society has been overthrown, and a new system reared, of which the key is held by the Europeans. From this new system, even should it gall them in some respects, the natives would now find it very difficult to break loose. To suppose that the Queen as she has been described by Protestant navigators, cares one single sixpence whether Catholic missionaries visit her island or not, is an absurdity rather too gross for credence. But Piritati does care very much, and caring very much he having the whole affairs of the island in his hands, dragoons his plaything of a queen—confessedly against the wish of several of the chiefs—into obeying his orders, and shirking ing off all persons whom he dislikes, no matter whether they are British or French subjects. Tahiti, as our readers know, is a very important point in the South Pacific Ocean; is indeed a sort of station at which vessels touch, and passengers are put on shore, waiting for the arrival of other vessels to carry them to their destined ports. Mr. Pritchard, however, claims a right of determining (through the Queen) who shall be allowed to stop and who not; and thus to render it altogether uncertain whether a passenger arriving at Tahiti, and intending to wait there and take the chance of a vessel onwards, can be allowed to do so. If Mr. Pritchard takes it into his head that the passenger is a dangerous one, he has either to remain on board and be carried to the destination of the vessel—to North America perhaps, instead of South—or he has to pay the Captain an enormous gratuity for going out of his course to land him at the desired haven. This, be it understood, is no hypothetical case. It actually happened to the two French Missionaries in 1837, who, not being allowed to land, paid 300 dollars to a New England Captain to take them out of his course, to Valparaiso instead of Boston. In 1835 a similar refusal was at first given to Mr. Murphy, a British subject, who was bound for the same port. This gentleman, being at first refused permission to land, contrived to do so, and to procure an interview with the Queen, who informed him “that she had given no such orders, but “that Mr. Pritchard had assured the chiefs that I “was the Pope,” &c.

In the case of the two missionaries in 1837, a written refusal to land was given to the Captain; but this document, “as her Majesty assured Mr. Ringman, Lieutenant of the Columbus, she was “forced to sign without knowing its contents.” In like manner, in several instances where the Queen has herself taken money usually paid as the condition of a licence to reside, it has afterwards been taken from her by Pritchard, and returned to the giver with peremptory orders to quit the island. In one case a poor French carpenter, of the name of Vincent, had just landed his tools and paid the Queen thirty dollars; but through Pritchard's interference the money was returned, and the poor fellow drummed out of the island without mercy. These instances, which might be multiplied indefinitely, prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the “Majesty” of Queen Pomare is a sham Majesty; that this native sovereign, whose rights it is denounced as such gross injustice to violate, is a mere puppet in the hands of foreigners, who coerce her without cannon on the one hand, just as Admiral Thouars has done with cannon on the other. The real question at issue is not the right of Queen Pomare, nor the propriety of obeying her orders, nor the injustice of coercing her sovereign will, but the propriety of allowing Mr. Piratiti to coerce the sovereign will on the one side, and not allowing M. Thouars to coerce it on the other. The interests of Queen Pomare are a mere blind. If these missionaries lay claim to the island as their own, by conquest or by cession, we can understand it. They will then exercise a right over their “sovereign” like that which the East India Company exercises over the Great Mogul. But they make no such claim in right; they only exercise the power in fact. So that, when the Queen has taken a poor carpenter's money, and given him leave to remain, Piratiti snatches it out of her hand, and kicks him out of the island. On the whole, it strikes us that this is a new sort of sovereignty, the limits of which are not very clearly defined. If Piratiti exercises this kind of arbitrary and irregular despotism in the name of a Queen, who, being in the prime of her life, is yet a mere infant in her understanding, and if French subjects are habitual sufferers by this state of things, it is obvious that a little gentle coercion to persuade her Majesty voluntarily to part with her nominal sovereignty, is every bit as allowable as a little gentle coercion to persuade the Queen voluntarily to give back the dollars. In both cases the Queen's rights are, and are known to be, a mere delusion and a farce.

In conclusion, we observe that we have referred to these old cases because we have them on record, and because the details of the recent proceedings have not yet reached Europe, or at least are not known in England. For aught we know aggressions still more injurious and annoying may have been practised by Piratiti, and led to this doleful disaster at which London Wall weepeth.—Tablet, April 22.

CONVERSIONS.

CHESTER.—On the 28th ult. a respectable young woman, the wife of Mr. William Milner, of this city, made a public profession of the Catholic faith, and was received into the Church by the Rev. E. Carbery. Three other persons are at the present time under instructions here, determined to follow her example. On the first Sunday of Lent the above-named clergyman commenced a course of lectures, which have been hitherto listened to with great attention by Catholics as well as by several persons of different religious denominations.

TAUNTON.—On Sunday, seventeen persons at Taunton were admitted into communion with the Catholic church, the whole of them had formerly been Protestants. A numerous congregation witnessed the interesting ceremony of their recognition as members of the Romish faith.—Sherborne Journal.

YORK.—ANOTHER CONVERT.—A letter to a friend, in Dublin, received a few days since, announces the conversion of another lady in York. It appears that she was much influenced by the conduct of Mrs. Wood. The new convert was also connected with theatrical pursuits.

ST. HELEN'S.—At Lowe House Chapel, on Passion Sunday, several female converts and many boys and girls made their first communion. Amongst the converts was a young lady, Miss Alice Sourbut, a native of Ormskirk, who by this act forfeits all claim to the property left to her by her father's will. The females were dressed in white with white veils and white hoods; the sight was truly affecting. A sermon was preached on this occasion by the Rev. F. West, one of the missionaries of this place, and the rev. preacher was so much affected during his sermon, that his voice often faltered, and it was with great difficulty he could refrain from giving vent to his tears, and many, many a tear was shed by the congregation. The Rev. R. Corr, the other missionary of this place, a more unassuming and a more amiable man than whom there is not in existence, has also under his instruction other converts, which with those already admitted, number about 40.

MISCELLANEA.

AYLESBURY, BUCKS.—Efforts are now being made to establish a congregation in Aylesbury, a town of considerable importance, and in the very centre of the most benighted district in England. The few faithful in that neighbourhood have now about 30 miles to travel for those spiritual necessities, without which no Catholic can live; while the ignorance, prejudice, and blind bigotry with which the very name of Catholicism or "Popery" is regarded in Buckinghamshire, is truly awful. A priest is now about to take up a temporary residence, and a room is about to be temporarily engaged, in the hope that once a beginning is made, the Catholics of the neighbourhood will rally around the nucleus, and thus a new flock be formed, which will tend much to their own edification and to the conversion of those now sitting in darkness. The abuse of Catholics from the pulpits of ignorant sectarians, has led several to inquire into the doctrines and evidences of the Church. Some converts have been made, other hopeful cases exist, and there is a general spirit of inquiry abroad among the people.

BRIGHTON.—A pamphlet has been printed and extensively circulated here by one of the Dissenting churches, which contains a rarity for these days. It is a prophecy, foretelling that Popery will be re-established in Great Britain in the year 1845. But our readers need not be very much alarmed. The dominancy of the 'Lady of Babylon' is to last only two years—that is, to 1817, when the Pope is to be dethroned, and the Millennium, we believe, is to commence. A fiery persecution is however, to rage during the two years; and the sufferings of the "saints" will be extreme.—Brighton Herald.

LYNN—PUSHEYISM.—A few Sundays ago, the Anglican clergyman of this town preached a sermon on "Confession;" amongst other things that were inculcated by the rev. preacher, it is said, on good authority, that he exhorted the people "to come to him at Easter for confession, and he would absolve them!" As we may easily imagine, the sermon was considered to be quite "Popish" by most of his Anti-Catholic audience: several have refused to attend the church when the rev. gentleman preaches, giving as a reason, their dread of being made "Roman Catholics." The Dissenters here, on the other hand, are most violent in their invectives against the poor establishment; and what with Puseyism, and what with the new Catholic chapel about to be erected when sufficient funds can be raised, the whole town seems greatly terrified.

IRELAND.

THE REV. THOMAS MAGUIRE ON CONTROVERSY.—In one of these discourses which this clergyman has been delivering during the Lent to crowded congregations in the Church of St. Dominick, Dublin, we were struck with many matters of more than ordinary interest. Whilst recently dilating on the value and spirit of true Christian controversy, he observed, that he could not avoid noticing a remark attributed to the Rev. Tighe Gregory, a Protestant minister, at a meeting recently held in Dublin. That Gentleman is reported to have said that, on viewing some notices in the streets, he was reminded of a saying of the late Rev. Mr. Roe, that "where controversy begins charity ends." So far as the Rev. Mr. Roe was concerned this might be perfectly true. For more than twenty years before his death he had foully attacked and grossly misrepresented the Catholic Faith, and no doubt he felt perhaps before his departure for judgment, that the sooner he had ceased such unprincipled slanders the sooner might charity prevail. The same might be said by many other Protestant ministers, who, for various human motives, had so long reviled and misrepresented the Catholic doctrines. Where such controversy as this began, charity and justice too had ended. "But ~~my~~ brethren," exclaimed the preacher, "what is controversy with us Catholics? We do not assail much less misrepresent, the creed of others. We are placed on the defensive, and are satisfied to maintain the truth of our tenets against our maligners. Ours is a work of mercy, of justice, and of charity, for "Charity" (says the Apostle) "rejoiceth with truth." We seek, we pray, we desire the conversion even of our calumniators. Let no pretender to charity assail us for this. This was the controversy for which Christ, his Apostles, and his faithful followers ever contended—to lead men to the one sheepfold and the one Shepherd. It was this spirit of truth and charity made Athanasius desire to confute and convert the Arians; and St. Augustine to confuse and convert the Manichians, the Donatists, and other Separatists of his day. Let no Catholic, therefore, be ever seduced or misled by mistaken charity to condemn such controversy as this PROGRESS OF RELIGION IN ULSTER.—Some ten or twelve years ago, in the old chapel of Killaghtee, county Donegal, the ruins of which are still standing, there would not be more than two hundred persons upon a Sunday (generally) assisting at the sacred service of the Mass. The old building could not contain more than five hundred persons within its walls, and very seldom used to be full. Within the last six years, however, a new chapel has been erected, and made to afford accommodation, upon the ground floor, for two thousand persons. Every Sunday it is densely thronged, and there is now required a gallery for the convenience of the multitude. The new chapel is situated in the centre of the parish of Killaghtee, on the banks of a river, near to the seashore, and commanding as it does so rich a prospect of coast and mountain scenery, is very much noticed by strangers passing to Killybegs. It is in the Gothic style of architecture, and owes its erection to the exertions of the Rev. Mr. Stephens, Killybegs (the resident clergyman), and the Rev. Mr. Drummond, assisted as they have been so well by the generous contributions of the faithful flock of the parish of Killaghtee. It is expected that the Bishop of the diocese will consecrate this new chapel during the summer months, when the necessary funds may be procured for the erection of the gallery.

ENNISCORTHY CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL—PLANS OF MR. PUGIN.—"It is with extreme joy," observes the Wexford Independent, "we have to state, from authority on which we can rely, that our excellent Bishop, who has governed this diocese for more than 24 years with such firmness and piety, is about to hand down to future generations a true model of a Christian church in the town of Enniscorthy, and for this purpose the celebrated Catholic architect, A. W. Pugin, Esq., has been instructed to make the necessary drawings without delay, so that the works may commence almost immediately. The dimensions required, combined with the skill and talent of this distinguished architect, are a certain guarantee that this cathedral church will be, without exception, the finest in Ireland. Mr. Pierce, who acts under Mr. Pugin in all his works, is to have the constant superintendence of the works, and the skill and industry he has displayed in strictly carrying out the plans intrusted to him are fully demonstrated in this county, in the beautiful church and convent of Gorey, the church of Taggart—now erecting, as well the handsome collegiate Chapel of St. Peter's, Wexford—as also the magnificent church of Killarney, which he is superintending equally under Mr. Pugin."

ERREW.—RECEPTION OF RELIGIOUS BROTHERS.—On Sunday 19th, the ceremony of the profession of two and the reception of seven religious brothers took place at the monastery of Errew (county Galway) His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. M. Hale received the vows and assisted by ten Catholic clergymen, invested the postulants with the habit of the Order of St. Francis. On this very interesting occasion the monks, about ten in number; and upwards of a thousand children, who are educated there, met his Grace in procession on his approach to the place. The holy cross was carried in front by one of the monks, whilst each of the children bore emblems of enlightenment and religious joy. After the ceremony of investing the monks had been concluded, his Grace addressed, in the open air, the congregated thousands in the Irish language. His Grace then blessed the people, who had thronged every approach to the monastery, and passed a well-deserved and feeling eulogy on the historian of Galway and author of "The Irish Minstrelsy," James Hardiman, Esq., who, by his bountiful bequest of a site, and ten acres of best ground, besides his fostering patronage, had contributed to the revival of the monastic order in Mayo—a precedent well deserving to be followed by the larger Roman Catholic proprietors of the island. The Archbishops Mr. Hardiman, and clergy, were entertained at dinner by the good Superior of the monastery.—Freeman's Journal

The following paragraph is from the Herald of Tuesday:—"The Portuguese Government have hit upon a rather ingenious mode of compromising matters with the Roman see. The Pope steadily refuses to confirm the bishops of Aveiro and Madeira, and the Queen's advisers consider that it would be derogatory from the dignity of the Crown to retract their nomination. In this dilemma, the expedient resorted to has been to present a project to the Chamber of Deputies for the reduction of the dioceses in Portugal, Madeira and the Azores, to 12, on the ostensible plea, however, of economy. The measure has been approved of by the deputies so far as regards the reduction of the bishoprics, though the accompanying proposal, that each of the 12 retained should have a chapter or collegiada attached to it, is yet under discussion. Should the project pass both chambers, as doubtless it will, the Pope's sanction to it must be obtained before it can be carried into effect. In this, I should think, there will not be any difficulty, the number of 12 bishops being quite enough for the spiritual Government of a population of little more than 3,000,000, and the compromise being one which does not involve any surrender of dignity or prerogative on either side."

THE REV. T. GREGG IN BELFAST—A ROW.—This notorious individual recently attempted to get up a "Protestant meeting" in Belfast, and a regular "row" was the consequence—the meeting being finally adjourned by order of Mr. Coulson, the magistrate.

TYHOLLAN.—A correspondent of the Nation says—"The great Apostle of Temperance spent Sunday and Monday in this parish, and I assure you that I never witnessed so large an attendance or a better-conducted people. The general opinion was that there could not be less than 40,000 human beings present. The chapel was so thronged that the very rev. divine had to abridge his splendid discourse. After the sermon he administered the pledge to 10,000 postulants, though the greater part of my flock had joined his ranks about two years ago, when he first visited Monaghan; but a vast number crowded in from the diocese of Armagh. On Monday he stopped until five o'clock, giving the pledge to persons from the county Armagh. May the Lord grant him to live in the enjoyment of good health, until he sees Ireland once more an island of saints."

EXPENSE OF JEWISH BISHOPS.—Dr. Alexander, the "Bishop" of Jerusalem, went out upon a time on board the "the Devastation;" he embarked at Portsmouth, and took with him one wife, one companion, one governess, six children (all his own and his wife's); one chaplain, his wife and their child; Dr. Macgown; Rabbi Wolff, his wife, and their two children; altogether 13 persons and one half person, to make up a "Bishop," or 13 persons with "a little one in" by way of make weight. The eating and drinking of these persons, of this Bishop corporate, cost of the way out £623, 5s.; and the effect upon the people has been such, that there are already, within less than two years, 2½ conversions, making, with the "Church" as it existed before some 24 communicants in the Bishopric for all Syria.

UNITED STATES.

"The Rev. Father De Smedt," observes the New York Truth Teller of the 11th ult., "who has been recently among us, hopes, through the charity of the Catholics of the eastern cities, to obtain important aid for missions beyond the Rocky Mountains, to which he and his apostolic associates of the Society of Jesus have devoted themselves with so much generosity and success. The whole nation in which they live is composed of about 10,000, and already 2000 of them have been converted and baptized. The others are preparing to follow their example. But the good fathers are endeavouring to civilize them at the same time; and the object for which these are most solicitous is to provide and to transport a stock of seeds and implements of husbandry, so that these poor people may be enabled to give up their wandering life, and settle down into a peaceful Christian community. In Philadelphia, Boston, and New York, the appeal of Father De Smedt has been most kindly responded to by the Bishops and Clergy, as well as the faithful at large."

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

CONNEXION BETWEEN RELIGION AND MORALITY.

RELIGION and morality are like those two palm-trees that the Caliph Haroun passed by, one day, on the solitary coast of Chalcivane. To cure him of a contagious fever, with which he was attacked on his journey, his physicians cut down one of these palms, whose refreshing sap restored the Caliph to health. Some time afterwards, Haroun travelled the same road, and observed the solitary palm-tree, whose once verdant leaves had now contracted the melancholy tinge of their approaching death, while the tree itself seemed to be slowly pining away beside the mutilated trunk of its departed brother. The prince, affected even to tears at the sight, exclaimed: "Had I known that you could only live and flourish together beautiful palms! I would have spared you both, even at the hazard of my life!"

In our times there are many who, like the physicians of the Arabian caliph, imprudently wish to separate what God has joined together; and when they have felled, with sacrilegious axe, the palm tree of faith, they pompously seek shelter under the shadow of its companion—morality, without suspecting for a moment that, when the one has been destroyed, the other must languish and decay. Although these men do not profess to love God, and would disdain to serve him, they still pride themselves on their attachment to virtue. Accuse them of atheism, and they will feebly rebut the charge; insinuate that they have no faith, and they will complacently smile; tell them that they designedly violate the laws of God and of his Church, and they will good-humouredly assent to the accusation: but should you hint that they have infringed on any point, no matter how trifling, the arbitrary and sometimes barbarous laws called of honour, and your life may be the forfeit of your temerity.

The reason is obvious; the man who dare proclaim his irreligion, is not audacious enough to avow his immorality. This would be to put himself under the ban of public opinion—to excite well-founded suspicions against him—and entirely to ruin his credit; for the world, which mocks at faith, has not yet gone so far as to scoff at morality. This, on the contrary, is at least externally respected; it is warmly recommended; it is publicly praised; it is not designedly depreciated, and men would wish to see it flourish, provided it flourished alone—which, unfortunately for these theorists, is impossible.

Religion is to morality what heat is to the soil on which it acts; it fertilizes and vivifies it; and, accordingly, materialism has never yet originated one sublime thought, or produced one great virtue. All its showy systems bear within them the sting of death, which escapes, indeed, the observation of weak minds that are fond of novelty, but which fills the profound thinker with apprehension. The most brilliant moral creations of infidelity resemble those porticoes and palaces that rise in the ice-bound polar seas, under the cold ray which gilds their surface: they glisten with all the brightness of the diamond, while in reality they are nothing but—ice!

The Mephistopheles of the last century, who, thinking that the religious foundations of society were old and decayed, endeavoured to reconstruct the edifice by morality alone, did not perceive that this creation, if based on atheism, would be undermined by popular turbulence. The revolution which they had prepared, flourished, like the infernal zaccoun, which, say the Mussulmans, produces demon's heads. Its explosion awakened the attention of a great English statesman, Burke, who in a very stormy session of parliament exclaimed

—"I see the approach of universal anarchy, which involves in its destruction religion, morality, historical recollections, respect for all ancient authority, for all dignity, for all virtue, for all elevated feeling :—a monstrous regeneration, a horrible metamorphosis of the human race, which will bring it back to the savage state." The revolutionary legislators themselves, affrighted at beholding morality decline, while the instincts of ferocity were proportionally developed, could oppose no other dyke to the torrent of corruption, that threatened universal destruction than that very religion which they themselves had proscribed, and the undying torch of which they had endeavoured to extinguish in the blood of its defenders.* "The princes of disorder seized with a sudden terror, and feeling themselves hurried irresistibly to the grave, hastily proclaimed the existence of a Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul; and standing over the palpitating carcass of society, clamorously called on God, who alone would revive it."†

Atheism, then, is no less hostile to civil government than to religion; with the same breath it extinguishes the lamp of the sanctuary, and kindles into flame the most dangerous and destructive passions of the human heart.

But cannot the power of laws supply the place of religion, and force the people to walk in the narrow path of morality? This is the question proposed by the irreligious.

The fear of the law may, doubtless, prevent the open violation of moral duty: it may prevent highway robbery, and midday murder in the open streets—it may prevent public appeals to rebellion, and public attempts at incendiarism—it may arrest the arm

* "What were the designs of those who, amid the conspiracies by which we were encompassed,—amid the embarrassments of such a war,—at the very moment when the torches of discord were not yet extinguished, suddenly commenced a violent attack on all religion, erecting themselves into apostles of annihilation, and missionaries of atheism; Was it a desire to hasten the triumph of reason?—but no; reason was nevertheless outraged by absurd violence and extravagancies, calculated to render her odious:—she was only placed in the temples, that she might be banished from the republic. Who, then, has given you a mission to announce to men that there is no God—you who have an enthusiasm for this doctrine, which you have not for your country?—What advantage do you hope to secure by persuading man that a blind force presides over all his destinies, and strikes indifferently vice and virtue, and that his soul is a light vapour, which shall vanish at the gates of death?" (ROBERTS; Rapport fait au nom du comité du salut public. Seance du 18 Floreal, an. 11.

when impunity is not to be hoped for, or, at most, but extremely doubtful: and yet, if our police-reports be correct, it does not always prevent even these evils. This is, however, the limit of its power. The law may be eluded by a thousand artifices, and morality may be frequently and enormously violated, without subjecting the offender to its penalties. Let a man be a bad husband, a bad father, a bad master, a bad friend—let him be irregular in his morals—let him even be an assassin, provided it be in a duel—and let him honestly possess just as much as he can legally hold,—such a one is secure from the operation of the law; and the sword of justice must be turned aside from him. Is he, therefore, a moral man? The fear inspired by religion is much more efficient than the law's terrors; it embraces the whole man, as the cord entwines the sheaf. Not only does it forbid him to act iniquitously, whether he be in the desert or in the city, by night as well as by day, but, diving even to the bottom of his heart, it sounds all its depths, and extinguishes vice before it is fully conceived in thought.

But, it may be said by the advocates of morality alone, have we not instead of the buckler of religion, the helmet of honour, and the ever-warning voice of conscience? Can it be said that conscience is a bad counsellor, or honour an unsafe guide?

In the first place, it must be remarked, there are two kinds of honour, one of which has nothing in common with virtue, and is often nothing more than an absurd, and sometimes, atrocious prejudice, to which life is often sacrificed by enthusiasm, or which itself is often immolated on the golden altar of fortune. In France this false honour was, for a long time, pushed to fanaticism.

The exquisites of the age of Louis XIII, who boasted of despising their honest creditors, sold, without hesitation, their ancient castles, and the bones of their ancestors, to pay some gambling debt; they made no scruple of lying, when they wished to deceive others, but they would have cut the throats of their own brothers, had these dared, even remotely, to insinuate that they had spoken falsehoods; yet these men were, according to the phraseology of the time, the very quintessence of honour!* Such honour is no more; peace to its now cold ashes! As for the other—the honour that makes great men, of which I wish to speak, it is, unquestionably, a noble sentiment. Its sphere is in the highest regions of the soul; it prompts to great enterprises, to sublime sacrifices, to magnanimous resolves. Yes, honour is a noble sentiment!—it is worthy of all glory and admiration: it shines amid the other sentiments of the soul, like that eastern diamond* called the "mountain of light," which is of its late kings presented to a temple. It is the only thing that could supply the want of religion in man—if that were possible.

Although honour clothes itself in a more pompous and dramatic vesture than religion, still moves on in a parallel direction with

Religion prescribes morality as ordained by God; honour, which seems to legislate for itself, enjoins it as something that adds to the dignity of man. The believer fears, the man of honour disdains, to do any thing that is wrong. The one flies from vice, because it is an offence against God; the other avoids it, repugnant to his nature and offensive to his pride. Seneca made the highest chord of honour vibrate when he said, that were there

Gods to rule over men and see and punish vice, he would avoid it, as base in itself, and unworthy a magnanimous soul.

Can honour, then, guide man?

Yes,—if something* guides honour; for it necessarily needs a guide if it will not stray and involve itself in error and uncertainty. There is no indivisible point whence pictures can be seen to greatest advantage," observes seal; "some are too near, others too distant; some too high, others too low. Perspective assigns it in the art of painting; but truth and morality, who will point it out?"

RELIGION.

Yes, religion, which alone can be the polar star of morality; and, albeit the reclamations which may be made by Hindoos, Osmanlis, and the inhabitants of that Celestial Empire whose mandarins so cavalierly style us barbarians, we must add,—the Christian Religion none; because not only is this the only true one, but there is no virtue she does not teach, no barren spot in the human heart which she does not cultivate.

The tree is known by its fruits. Now every one must grant that the element of pure honour when combined with that of faith, produces a character more angelic than human in traits.

CEYLON.—The Columbo Observer of the 14th ultimo stated on the authority of private letters received from England, that the viceroy Pontiff had appointed the late Dean Maynooth College, named Russell, Bishop of Ceylon; and that his Lordship was about to embark, with ten British Priests, for that Island.

† Koh-i-noor.

MADRAS.—The Madras Athlete of the 24th ultimo states, that a little Chapel has been built by the Roman Catholic Priest, the Rev. Mr. Johana, at Cannanore at the Fishermen's village called Tahee, which was crowded by the Native Christians of the place on Tuesday last, the 13th ultimo; on which occasion the Rev. Gentleman consecrated the building and performed High Mass, in it—Being St. Anthony's Day, he dedicated the Chapel to St. Anthony.

CONFIRMATION AT CHANDERNAGORE.—We are informed that forty-four persons received the Sacrament of Confirmation last Sunday at Chandernagore and that upwards of sixty approached the Holy Communion, including the children of the Orphanage.

IRELAND.

The following is from a recent Convert in Dublin, to her friend, who by the blessing of God, has been an instrument to the former's conversion:

MY DEAREST FRIEND,—The zeal and affection of your letters will not permit me to defer answering them by this early opportunity, otherwise I should be inclined to do so, as I find myself every day becoming a worse correspondent, not, my friend, that you are any thing less dear to me, or my heart any degree less impressed with its mighty debt to you; but from a reason you will appreciate, and that is, that my time is fully taken up. To describe to you how I spend it—is not my present intention—it would occupy more room than I can afford; I will only tell you this, that I am very happy in not having hardly a moment to myself, and this letter is written at the cost of two visits to death beds and a third to ripen convictions for our holy faith. You will be surprised when I tell you that — has never made his appearance in Dublin, yet it is supposed he has stopp'd at Rome to try and get some Priests, for he is not likely to get any from Dublin, as there is really not one to spare here, it is most dreadful, the scarcity of them. I hope the Lord will open the hearts of the rising generation to come more abundantly into labour in his own vineyard. You know what I hope for, and I trust you pray for the same—and though our mite will be little, still if every mother with a family would make an offering of two to the holy Priesthood there would soon be no scarcity * * *

* * * Mrs. — and I send you our mite towards St. Thomas'; how gladly would I subscribe more largely, but the applications in our poor Island are incessant and each one more necessitous than the former * * *

I think I told you in my last of the Missionaries we have had at ——— who have really been the salvation of thousands of souls, they were with us all the Lent; we had Mass and Prayers at 6, Mass again at 7, and Mass and a Sermon at 8, a Lecture at 12, and Catechism afterwards for 2 hours for the poor children; a Sermon again at 7 in the evening; of such awful and tremendous truths as were held forth to the people, was the consequence that hundreds came to their duty, some who had lived for 20, 40, and 60 years without attending to it; the marriages too afterwards were endless between parties who had lived together for years. These holy Missioners were never less than 9 hours a day in Church and often longer, they were all good, oh, so good but one was a Saint. I assure you it was a meditation to look at him after he had communicated. They are gone, but they have left much good behind them; they have got up confraternities whereby the children will be educated. Over the ladies, one (your unworthy friend) is patron,—the number of female children who used to attend before the Missioners came was about 50, and last Sunday we had 500 girls. Every child's name and residence is down. I have about 29 ladies under me, each with 10 or 12 in a class, every child who is absent during the week ensuing must be visited, so you see I am not idle, besides we visit the sick in turns, and by and bye please God, we shall be half Sisters of charity. Our holy Church received 20 Protestants during Lent, 15 of whom it was my happiness to prepare for their duties.

My own dear mother is very ill at this moment and you may suppose my anxiety about her. I am praying hard for my relations and I cannot doubt but in God's good time I shall get them all; after which I shall be ready for my summons, for which I am working at this moment. You ask me if I still pray for ——— Yes! every day of my life, and I cannot but hope our prayers will yet be heard for him. I wish you would get a miraculous medal of the Blessed Virgin. if I could I would send you one, but get one and put a piece of ribbon in it and give it to ——— who will, I hope, wear it for the sake of old recollections,—he will bear with my superstition, and if he will meet me twice a day at the Throne of Grace, say 7 in the morning and 7 at night, or as may suit himself, and take the medal in his hand, and pray that God would direct him and give him the needful grace, there is no doubt whatever, he would soon have to turn his prayer into praises. I know a person who was favored as Ratisbone was, from bearing a medal of the kind. The good Missioners I spoke to you about recommended my opening a library, which I mean to do very soon, and to get no books but from the Derby Society, which is a new thing in our Holy Religion and a glorious thing; it is a Society publishing the best and most expensive books at a shilling a vol., the funds of the establishment are low at present, but the best books will be soon ready for sale. The Lives of the Saints are to be had in 12 vols. at 1 shilling each; Challoner's Meditations, for 1 shilling in 2 vols.; Milner's End of Controversy at 1, and so on. Now what I mean to do is to get £10 worth of these books and sell them to the poor and let them pay me by instalments of 1d. or 2d. a week; in this way these poor creatures will be able to have such a great comfort secured to them as religious reading * * * * *

I am not able to tell you I am strong, because indeed I am not, but please God I shall soon be better; you will excuse the haste in which this is written. I left it to the last, but as an invalid I am not fit to write letters with any justice to the subject most dear to our hearts.

Believe me my dear ———,
Your affectionate and truly grateful Friend,

Dublin, April 28, 1843.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE'S CORRESPONDENT.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—They say, that Hercules could not succeed in killing the famous Hydra, unless kept the beast high up in the air; the contrary happens to me. I will be unable to do any good execution to "A Protestant" who remains ensconced in his "castle high the air" unless I get him down to the ground, viz., on the substantial ground of acknowledged doctrines and admitted facts. I thought I had (as the common saying is) pinned him down into sobriety by those seven questions I had proposed; but no, it was a vain endeavour to try it much less to expect it, I (albeit in my simplicity) thought, "yea, yea, or no," would have been the required simple answers to so simple questions; but, ah! I I cast up my accounts, without... mine he Good gracious! instead of the simple answers which my inexhaustible adversary himself declared sufficient, and promised give, we are surrounded by almost an ocean of... words, mere words, words altogether unconnected with the subject under discussion. Verily I could not help recollecting a trick of certain lawyers, who to gain time rather kill time) talk whole hours of long unconnected nonsense. I am sure the Advocate's correspondent "A Protestant," is scribed, as the Latins would say: "ad unguem" which the rougher English Vulgate translates "to the backbone" in the following words of Father Horacé; which, as I have not his works with me, I must quote from memory:

Si quem vero arripuerit, hunc tenebit, occiditque legendo, non missara catem, nisi plena moris hirudo Hunc tu Romane caveto." Which means: "But if he (viz., the Protestant correspondent of the Advocate) catches hold of any one, he will not let him so easily slip out of his clutches, murdering him by the sheer dint of talk; like a horse-leech, unwilling to separate from the skin, unless gorged with blood.

For Heaven's-sake, keep at a civil distance from him thou Roman (Catholic)! My adversary cackles about my having "lowered my flag" and about my "crying for quarter." In good truth then I confess myself buried in the storm of words, coming as thick and fast over my arguments and simple statements, as a sandstorm in the desert, that buries in its remorseless fury flourishing cities, and precious caravans. Yes, Mr. Editor, I must confess, I have been fairly overpowered by talk, and I am determined, not indeed, to lie a prostrate enemy, as "A Protestant" wishes me for an object of his pity (?) no, but to give him "leg-bail;" for I would as soon, aye, even sooner lie "a prostrate enemy" before the clattering tongue and upraised fish-tail of an enraged Billings-gate lady, as before the pity-swollen heart of "A Protestant." Yes, Mr. Editor, I now sound a retreat, and am not ashamed of it either. For there is no necessity to battle against a man in whose heart there is not one grain of honest dealing, and in whose head not one ounce of common sense. Can he be entitled to the appellation of an honest adversary, who in the same breath grants you that your religion is to be judged by her own universally acknowledged doctrine and practice, that you know the universally acknowledged doctrines and practices of your Church; that you possess moral courage and honour enough, not to flinch one iota from their public profession and defence; and yet charges you, among other things, that in spite of disclaiming such doctrines, your Church is guilty of giving indulgences for sins, of giving a licence for the commission of future crimes, that indulgences are a release from eternal damnation; that these permissions and releases may be had for round sums; &c. &c? Shame, eternal shame, to so dishonorable a proceeding! This is just the manner, in which the wolf dealt with the lamb in the fable; when he accused the poor innocent creature with disturbing the clearness of the brook, of which both were partaking, when he charged her with the murder of his brother, &c. No excuses and reasonings would satisfy the wolf; for he thirsted after the blood of the Lamb. Is there a man having one single ounce of common sense in his head, could as "A Protestant" has done, write such a farrago of silliness and rant (not to say of designing roguery, in order to parry the impression the seven questions would make on the hearts of the not over-wrong minded) in the suit of his answer to my simple queries; a farrago of words, that has as much to do with the elucidation of the several questions and answers, as the rings of Saturn have with illumining the moon. Is he a man, that can even be said to be blessed with brain, who can be guilty of such flights into the regions of the absurd, as the Correspondent of the Advocate has done, e. g. by the following choice-bits of making consequences.

"If His Holiness really possesses the prerogative of "loosening and binding", and "forgiving and retaining sins", it is but reasonable (!!!) to believe, that he has also the power to grant permission to commit them."

By all that's sacred, this is one of the grossest insults to common sense I ever saw, read or heard of.—Again:

"If an indulgence be not a release both from temporal and eternal punishment,.... and (thus) virtually a "forgiveness of sins," it is an useless and unprofitable doctrine."

This is monstrous! I always thought "half a loaf better than no bread at all." But again:

"If an indulgence be not capable of obtaining the forgiveness of sins, and the consequent remission of eternal punishment, it is an unmeaning and delusive dogma in the popish Church, and a mockery of the sinner's hope. If again, an indulgence be a remission of temporal penalties only, and not of eternal ones also, it is a melancholy refutation, that leads Romanists to trust to its efficacy,.... since it is found to be utterly incapable of protecting them from the consequences of their transgression hereafter."

This is insupportable. Actually such stuff makes speech utterly ridiculous. This is the topmost height of rant. No, Mr. Editor, I blush for such empty-headed adversary! If St. Jude, the Apostle, had not the Advocate's Correspondent in view when he penned the following pithy sentences, it must have been some one as like him, as one egg is like another. "But these men blaspheme (i. e. speak ill) whatever things they know not; and what things soever they naturally know, like dumb beasts, in these they are corrupted. Woe unto them, for they have gone in the way of Cain (viz. slaying their neighbours with the club of calumnies), and after the error of Balaam

(viz. by trying their best to curse and abuse the Holy Catholic Church of God) they have for reward poured out themselves and have perished in the contradiction of Core (as all sects and heresies, impugning the Church of Christ did, and will do) These are . . . clouds without water (or as in the Protestant's case, words without point or meaning) . . . trees of autumn, unfruitful (viz. writers to no purpose) . . . Raging waves of the sea foaming out their own confusion, (by vainly trying to prevail against the rock-built Church of the Redeemer) wandering stars (ignis fatuus) to whom the storm of darkness is reserved for ever." (Alas! this last sentence leaves me but little hopes of "A Protestant's" conversion.)

Yes Mr. Editor, as I am thoroughly ashamed of my quick-tongued antagonist, and find him prepared with no substantial weapon offensive or defensive, I now leave him the quiet undisturbed possessor of the field of "λογαρχία" I came prepared for a fight of hard blows; a battle of quick talk and silly words I always avoid, because I despise it; and am of opinion that none except low women and religious swaddlers have a right to use them. His denial of the assertion made by "Master Harold," that the British Peerage possess the privilege of screening themselves once in their lives, from a capital punishment, incurred by any other fault except high treason, I beg his permission of gainsaying. I hope, on due enquiry, he will learn, that our British Peerage have such a privilege. . . . His seven counter-questions I leave unanswered for the simple reason of their being foreign to our present subject of discussion. They have as much to do with our present case, as if I were to ask him the following less silly ones: 1. Whether he had said his morning and evening prayers. 2. Whether he had paid for his shoes and boots. 3. What warrant the Independent preachers had for calling themselves Reverend. 4. Whether his tailor's bill had been discharged. 5. Whether he was a married man. 6. Whether he thought the Pope of Rome (at present Gregory XVI.) sported a pair of horns, and walked upon cloven feet. 7. Whether the Bishop of Calcutta, Dr. Daniel Wilson, was a Puseyite or not. Of course, as I would be at liberty of making a fool of myself by drawing my own conclusions from such questions, in case my opponent should decline answering such trash; so "A Protestant" may cut as many capers, as he pleases, in drawing conclusions (?) from my "apparent reluctance" (no Sir, undisguised unwillingness) of answering his impertinent, no less than school-boy-like queries. Pauch's judgement passed some time ago upon Lord Wm. Lennox, viz., "hard reading for ten or sixteen weeks," would be well to apply to "A Protestant;" condemning him to 10 years hard study of logic and theology. Perhaps at the expiration of that time he may be capable of understanding what a Catholic indulgence is, and have learned to despise his present Protestant notion of it as a piece of designing imposture, and a despicable bugbear. As yet it seems impracticable to get the crotchet out of his head. I verily think the words of the poet are applicable to him: Errorem expellas furca, redibit; which means in plain English: Though you swore by the cross, that he is in error, and that the Catholic meaning of an indulgence is not a pardon of sins, a release from eternal damnation, a permission of committing crimes with impunity at present, and in future, in short a "magna charta of wickedness," yet; "A Protestant" won't believe it, but will ever return to his unnatural charge. Any way my antagonist is quite right in telling me that famous sentence of the merry Sir John: "discretion is the better part of valour;" as in fact I prefer now discretion to farther fighting, in the same manner as the valiant Scythians did, when they found that the invading swarm of Armies, were only Amazons (Herodot. Melpomene.) "A Protestant's" concluding flourish is in goodly keeping with the rest. He talks about personalities—which is absurd; as I know nothing at all about his person. About his conversion—humph! I have my doubts, though sincere wishes for it. Neither argument nor good reasoning, neither ridicule nor personality (?) will, I suspect, do him any service. To the first he is insensible, against the latter he is too sensible. Any way, that all happiness of soul and body may attend him, is the cordial wish of, Mr. Editor, your and his sincere well-wisher,

THE FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CHARITABLE SOCIETY OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY OF DOLOURS.

March 1842 to March 1843.

In presenting the first annual Report of the Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Dolours, your Committee have much pleasure to state that although they had many difficulties to encounter in the course of their labours during the past year, yet, by the aid of that Omnipresent Being who has promised "when two or three are assembled in my name I shall be with them,"—they have nothing but encouraging accounts to give.

As the mustard seed in the Gospel, small in its beginning, the Society will they hope with the divine blessing eventually spread its shady branches throughout the Island, and that many indeed will have cause enough to remember the 27th day of March 1842 with feelings of pleasure and gratitude.

The Committee as you are aware have three objects in view, and how far they have succeeded in them will appear to you by the sequel.

I. Repairs of the Church of B. V. Mary of Dolours

In this part of the Committee's labours they have to state—that the dilapidated state of the above church (the roof of which was nearly crumbling down) called for a speedy repair of almost the whole of the upper part of the Building—But as the Committee thought that the whole of this work could not be effected without appropriating a large part of their funds, they have raised an additional Subscription, independent of the one for the Society, amounting to £160, with which sum and the £15 granted out of the Society's funds they have repaired the whole of the top part of the Building, have built two rows of Stone Pillars on the two wings of the chapel, and erected an Altar of a new fashion, adding much to the beauty and neatness of the chapel—But the Committee regret they cannot complete the work without some further aid for which they confidently look to the Christian Public.

II. Printing Press—This though second, is the principal object the Committee have in view of accomplishing, and accordingly they remitted in the month of November 1842 £60 in advance, to the commercial agent of Messrs. Fernando and Son in London for a Press, English Type, paper, &c. all which the Committee are happy in being able to state, have been shipped on board the Tigris, which will reach this Island very soon.

A quantity of Cingalese type also has been obtained—But the Committee are sorry they cannot say anything here about the Tamil Type, to obtain which from Scrampore they have written to Simon Casie Chetty, Esq but they have not as yet been favored with a reply.

III. Charity Schools, &c.—Regarding the third object nothing has yet been done except the celebration of a few Masses, owing, as it may be easily known, to the want of pecuniary aid, they hope therefore that the Christians of Colombo and of other parts of the Island will feel disposed to assist the Committee to further this laudable object, and in the ensuing year see it accomplished.

Fund.—The receipts of the Society since its establishment in March 1842 is £151. 7. 11. and the expenditure £76. 16. 6½. leaving only a balance of £74. 11. 4½. in the hands of the Treasurer—It may not be out of place here to mention that exclusive of the subscriptions paid by individual members, most, if not all of them, have very laudably undertaken to collect subscriptions from their friends and those with whom they have to deal, in aid of the funds, which were paid over to the Treasurer at each monthly meeting.—It will therefore afford you much pleasure to hear that the small sums thus collected have amounted to £11. 8. 1.—Thus having stated to you the above circumstances it will appear to you that the members of your Committee have not left any thing untried to ensure success to their labours—and to acquit themselves honorably of their Stewardship in the first year of their labours.

The anxiety evinced by the Catholic Ladies in promoting the Society's objects by their contributions is another cause for the Committee to be thankful.

II. Correspondents.—Observing the dormant neutrality of our countrymen for their own interests, the Committee made an appeal to the Catholic Institute of Great Britain for aid, and they are happy to say that a supply of their publications has been granted, as appears in the "Bengal Catholic Herald," for distribution.

III. Meetings.—Your Committee have the pleasure further to add another very distinguishing feature of its members, which is the regularity, peace, and good understanding, that pervade among the members in their monthly Meetings, and the anxiety they all evince, to vie with each other in promoting the objects of their infant Institution.

Thus having given you a brief but a true account of the operations of the Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Dolours, the Committee have, in conclusion, to tender their best thanks to all Protestant and Catholic Ladies and Gentlemen who have contributed to the Society, and to request them all to continue steadfast in co-operating with the Committee by their prayers and contributions for its prosperity.

WHO ARE CLERGYMEN?

(From the Hereford Times)

I venture to think, that the pastors of Dissenting churches are not clergymen. A clergyman is generally understood to be a member of a hierarchical corporation, which constitutes an order distinct from and superior to the "laity;" and every such clergyman of the English Establishment is endowed by the law of the land with certain rights and powers, civil and religious, in the parish over which he is appointed; and he claims to be the spiritual functionary for all men, good, bad, and indifferent, within the limits of that ecclesiastical cure. His clerical character is indelible: he is a clergyman wherever he goes, and in whatever he does, as long as he lives. But the pastor of a congregational church possesses no such hierarchical character. His office is discharged in an assembly of faithful men, and beyond that limit he has no office at all, except as evangelist. He pretends to no "clerical" character, in the right use of that word, which is not possessed by the humblest member of his flock, who are all "the clergy of God" in the language of St. Peter—see the Greek. He does not pretend to administer sacraments to the irreligious, nor to perform religious services for the profane, nor to impart efficacy to his ministrations by any mysterious virtue resident in the order to which he belongs—all of which are qualifications contained in the popularly received idea of the “clerical character.” His business is to explain the Bible, and to promote its influence over the hearts of his hearers by his example and advice; and he trusts to the power of the truth for his success, much rather than to the “authority” of his office.

Now, possibly; in the estimation of some persons, this latter position is not nearly so dignified and respectable as that of the “clergyman” referred to above; and probably, in the eyes of that part of the English population, which is drenched with the superstition of Puseyism and its congeners, this is the case. Amongst ourselves, however, it is customary to regard the office with feelings of much deeper veneration than those which we indulge towards the “authority” of a clergyman, the fiat of a dean, or the dreadful tribunal of a pastoral baron; and so far from desiring to be considered as setting up for competitors with the latter in the vocation which they have chosen, we should (most of us, at least) at once disclaim the contention, and should refuse to be sharers either in their practices, or in their unscripural claims.

POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS.

A NECESSITY FOR EDUCATION IN LONDON.

A few days ago a young woman, named Hannah Eliza Manning, was brought before Mr. Broderip, at the Thames Police Court, on a charge of stealing two shawls, the property of Eliza Dowling. It appeared from the evidence, that the two females are cap-makers, and had lived together in the same room, in Love-lane, Shadwell, and the property was stolen from the apartment during the absence of the prosecutrix from home. Suspicion fell on her companion, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether those suspicions were well-founded or not, she had recourse to the Bible and key. She assembled some other women in her room—

“At the witching time of night,”

When church-yards yawn and graves give up their dead;”

And with due solemnity, a large key was inserted between the leaves of the Bible, and made fast by the garter of one of the females, taken off her left leg. The wards of the key were made to rest over the 16th verse of the 1st chapter of Ruth, which was repeated by one of the party:—“And Ruth said, intreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God, my God.” The Bible was then lifted by the key, and the name of the prisoner was mentioned three times; when, lo! the key turned, and it was at once concluded that the prisoner was the thief, and she was given into custody on the following day. Portch, a police-constable, No. 91, R, who had made the usual inquiries, said that there was no evidence to implicate the prisoner, except that a pin, of rather unusual size, was found upon her dress, which Dowling said was fixed upon one of the shawls she had lost. He understood that the key turned when the name of some other woman in the house was mentioned. (Laughter.) The prosecutrix—“Yes, but it turned twice against the prisoner, I know she is the thief.” Mr. Broderip was surprised that, in the 19th century and in London, any one should put faith in such nonsense, and hoped that he would never hear of the thing again. He had before heard of the absurd superstition of attempting to discover thieves by means of the Bible and key. Portch said that some of the women were so terrified when the key turned, as their weak fancies led them to believe, that they fainted away and one of them declared she saw the devil in the room. (Laughter.) Mr. Broderip—“Is there any evidence against this woman?” Portch—“None, Sir, to connect her with the robbery.” Mr. Broderip—“Well, then, I have no faith in the miracle of the Bible and the key, and this woman is discharged.” A man named Gilbert was recently charged by his wife with striking her, and it appeared, from her statement, that she was exceedingly jealous, and for the purpose of testing the truth of her husband's love, she tried the Bible and key, and recited the 6th verse of the last chapter of Solomon's Song.—“Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm, for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave; the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame.” “Well,” said the complainant, “as sure as I am a born woman the key turned, and I know he is false to me. I accused him of it, and he struck me, your Worship.” The accused, a decent mechanic, said his wife had taken it into her head to be jealous of him, and was always annoying him with her nonsense about the Bible and key. He had found to his cost that the coals of jealousy were coals of fire, for he had no peace of his life; and in the heat of passion, after receiving a lecture from his wife, he certainly did strike her. The Magistrate said the complainant was a very foolish woman, and, instead of trying her husband by the ordeal of the Bible and key, she had better attend to his domestic comforts, and let him find a clean hearth and a cheerful countenance when he returned from his daily labour. He ordered the defendant to enter into his own recognizances to keep the peace towards his spouse.—Weekly Despatch, April 9.

THE MODERN PHILOSOPHERS OF FRANCE AND THE BISHOP OF CHARTRES.

To the Editor of the Orthodox Journal.

SIR,—The philosophic doctrines of the University of Paris, and the disputes which have lately sprung up between the leading members of the eclectic school, of which some of your readers may have heard, have induced the Bishop of Chartres to address a letter to the clergy of his diocese wherein he denounces with virtuous indignation the promulgation, by the philosophers of the present century, of opinions calculated to unsettle all Christian belief. To that letter he has appended an exposition, which may appear to you of sufficient interest to be communicated to the public through the pages of your excellent Journal. I have ventured to translate it accordingly, and to submit it for your approbation.

Your constant reader,

IGNOTUS.

EXPOSITION.

Let us consider for a moment the mighty spectacle displayed in the harmonious and gigantic circle of the lofty, useful, consoling, in a word, the varied truths which the Almighty reveals to us through the simple light of reason; let us cast a glance at Christian philosophy. I shall rapidly sketch its plan, and its exact proportion with the convictions so essential to man, and the principles so indispensable to his true happiness. You will then be left to judge whether any thing can vie with it in consistency, clearness, and solidity. I denominate it a Christian doctrine, because its substance and groundwork have been religiously preserved in our Saviour's church since its first origin. It essentially consists of unerring truths respecting God and man. Now in despite of the subtleties of the middle age, those truths have ever maintained themselves, unimpaired beneath the shelter of faith. Any innovator who should have dared to infringe them would have been forthwith rejected out of the sacred society, and all would have turned a deaf ear to him.

It is evident that whosoever desires to penetrate the depths of philosophical science must, in the first place, endeavour to discover where certainly resides, what constitutes certainty, or the means by which he may acquire the conviction of its presence. To deviate from this course would be tantamount to building a castle in the air. We have not far to go in search of those striking landmarks which indicate what does not admit of doubt; such characteristic features are deeply engraved in an innocent nature. With a view to explain my meaning, and to remove the slightest obscurity from so grave a question, I shall bring the clearest terms and the most obvious examples in aid of my object.

When I hear these expressions: a circle is not a triangle; the sun rises in the east, and closes its course in the west; Rome or Constantinople exist—I feel within me a deep and invincible impression which excludes every doubt from my mind. I do not say that my nature disposes or inclines me to believe. Assuredly not; it conveys to me a far livelier and more powerful impression, and utterly excludes all hesitation; it bears away my consent in spite of, and as it were, without me. This is, unquestionably, an all-sufficient motive for my firm and absolute acquiescence. The instances I have just adduced exhibit the resistless power of evidence, of the assent of our inward feelings, and in countless instances of the testimony of men. The other principles of certainty, two or three in number, are readily discovered by a similar process; who would venture to demand a firmer basis whereon to establish his judgement? what blindness to mistrust such solid supports! It were easier for us to divest ourselves of our being than to refuse our belief, when possessed of such warrants, which regulate alike the determinations of the learned and of the people; and any one who should disown them, would be deemed by common accord as standing more in need of medical care than philosophers' reasonings.

Certainty can go no further in this world; and that light is amply sufficient to guide us. If it fail to satisfy, the very sun would be cavilled at; we should be affirming that we were in darkness, because other rays emanating from another world, the creature of our imagination, have failed to convey their light to our eyes.

This has been the point overlooked by the German school, which has too many proselytes amongst us. How can it have escaped them that this separation of self from non-self, so much talked of, is removed by nature, which has dispelled the fancied bridge invented by them; an empty and frivolous labour? How truly we may apply in this place the language of scripture in reference to certain minds: they give birth with much labour, to inventions which the wind blows away, (Eccles. v. 15.) and again:—they have vanished away in their thoughts, (Rom. i. 21).

I have therefore unerring means of becoming assured of the truth. But what is the first use I should make of those lights and resources? Can there be a moment's hesitation in a heart conscious that its existence is not self-derived? Impelled by a sense of gratitude and dependence, does not man first raise himself towards his Creator, in order to feel impressed with the reality of that Creator's existence, his greatness, his favours, his infinite perfections? How great is this treasure, this indescribable conquest of the knowledge of God, so easily derived from the consideration of the great first cause, of the self-existing supreme being! What, in fact, do we see in this abyss of life and glory! The being who unfolds himself, and spreads on all sides, without ever encountering any limits. The plenitude of existence is His lot: He discerns in himself, without measure and without end, and all that brightens existence embellishes and perfects it; in other words, His infinite and adorable attributes. These truths are by turns proclaimed by the harmony of nature, and the wonders of the visible world. Lastly, they are consecrated and rendered perpetual by the faith of mankind and its canticles of adoration. I no sooner hold this first link than the rest fall readily within my grasp; I proceed from light to light (2. Cor. iii. 18); a crowd of truths unfold themselves before me, and nothing is left for me to fear but my own voluntary blindness.

After reaching this comprehensive and majestic point of view, I stop a moment to contemplate the course I have already run. I was aware that my nature had been my faithful and assured guide; nevertheless, I admire the splendid gifts bestowed upon man, whilst admitting that divine truth bestows a fresh authority upon the evidence and other legitimate motives of belief; since those impressions which a God, eminently true, has implanted in my breast, and never be a snare nor an instrument of error.

God is known to us; he is the source of all truths; all that are necessary to us may be said to present themselves spontaneously to our acceptance.

Does there exist another life? Yes, for it is impossible that, under a just God, virtue, ever persecuted and bathed in tears, should in the end share a kindred fate with the uniformly successful criminal. Our moral world is a frightful picture. In order that it may be rendered worthy of God, it is requisite that the Supreme Being should re-model, correct, perfect it, in short, in a future existence.

Is Christianity divine? Yes, because if numerous prophecies fulfilled, well authenticated miracles, other causes which have converted the world, and are therefore so much within the reach of my natural intellect, were to deceive me, I should be entitled to impute my error to God himself—an impossible thing.

Lastly, is the ancient religion of our country entitled to the respect and love of so great a people? Who can doubt it. For what are we told? That the true Church of our Saviour fell to pieces a few centuries after its birth! and that Catholicity has, for a long time past, been no more than a corrupted, disfigured, broken-down Christianity. Let me ask, however, how can we suppose a God to have been so unskilful an architect as to raise a tottering edifice, which was calculated to crumble to ruins, shortly after its being erected by His adorable hand? It is moreover attested by a thousand indications that nothing essential has been changed; and the series of Peter's successors, which unquestionably ascends to its first origin, is ample warrant that all has been transmitted to us through that channel—the authority of the word, the remission of sins, the grace of the sacraments, and generally all spiritual gifts brought by the Man (God) into the world. It is readily understood that I do not aim at sifting the proofs on which I rely, and that my only object is briefly to demonstrate the link of ideas composing the philosophy of true Christians, and afterwards the perfect harmony of their belief.

Let us conclude. Reason is a splendid vestibule, in which we could wish to find more majesty, elevation and extent. When I consider nature's rapture towards an infinite object, I find the dimensions of man too great to be kept in their first boundary: should he in fact make a proper use of his intellects, he steps beyond the threshold, and that portico where he at first tarried introduces him into a venerated sanctuary, which is religion. He has no sooner entered than his sight takes a far wider range; his looks penetrate to the skies, where a throne arrests his view. It will be the limit of his cause, and the reward of his virtues. Yes, religion is that house of God (Gen. xxvii. 17), which leads us to our end,—that of rest after fatigues, of joy after sorrow, of immortality and perfect bliss.

Happy is he, I venture to assert, who can feel impressed with the doctrine I have just laid down. It has ever been that of the church, and I add, in the words of St. Paul: Promissionem habens vite que nunc est, et futurae, 1 Tim. iv. 8.—Orthodox journal, Feb. 1843.

MEETING OF CATHOLICS AT LIVERPOOL.

On the 6th inst. a meeting of the Catholics of Liverpool and its vicinity was held in the Music-hall, Bold-street, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of petitioning against the Factory and Education Bill, recently introduced into the House of Commons by Sir James Graham. The spacious hall (says the Liverpool Journal, from which this report is chiefly taken) was densely crowded. The Very Rev. D. Youens, D. D., Vicar-General of the Northern District, was called upon to preside. Amongst the gentlemen on the platform we observed the Revs. W. Dale, Dr. Appleton, R. Gillow, W. Parker, J. Margieson, W. Walmsley, J. Frith, and P. Wilcock; Thomas Weld Blundell, Esq., Ince, John Rosson, Esq.; Dr. Collins; Messrs. R. Sheil, J. G. Unsworth, Morgan O'Connell, Duarte, the Messrs. Hore, E. Bretherton, the Messrs. Lynch, J. Fletcher, J. Gibson, Warwick, T. Bury, J. E. Drysdale, C. Perry, Corbally, D. Powell, J. Roskell, Christopher Dugdale, &c.

The Chairman, in opening the business of the meeting, read a letter from Mr. Blundell, of Crosby, regretting his inability to attend the meeting, in consequence of illness. He then said they were all aware that they were convened that evening in order that an opportunity might be afforded them of expressing their sentiments with reference to a bill now before parliament. The object of this bill was twofold. In the first place, it proposed to pass some regulations respecting the employment of children and young persons in factories. With that portion of the bill they would have nothing to do that evening. The other part of the bill referred to a scheme of national or parliamentary education, which it was intended to establish through all parts of the country, but particularly in the manufacturing districts. This was the portion of the bill to which their attention would be specially directed. He believed he would be expressing the sentiments of the meeting, and the sentiments of the community at large, when he said that this bill did appear to be one of a highly objectionable character. (Hear, hear.) He might characterize it as one that was exclusive and partial in its provisions. (Hear, hear.) It was unduly favourable to one portion of her Majesty's subjects—the members of the Established Church, and it was unduly harsh and oppressive to every other class of the community, whether they be Catholics or Dissenters. (Hear, hear.) He might state, that while the bill required all of them to support it indiscriminately, it placed the education in the schools almost entirely in the hands of the clergy and members of the Established Church. It could not but be looked on with jealousy that the members of all the different denominations of Christians in this country be required, by legislative enactments, to place their children under the guidance, control, and education of individuals who were of a different religion from them. (Hear.) In this respect it was highly objectionable to all classes of her Majesty's subjects not belonging to the Established Church; and as such, it ought to be reprobated both by Catholics and Dissenters. (Applause.) But the provisions of the bill pressed still more hardly on the Catholics than on the members of any other denomination, because the education which was proposed to be given in this bill was granted in such a manner that it could not be accepted by the Catholics without a violation of their religious principles. In order that the Catholics may be educated in these schools, it would be necessary that they should read the Protestant version of the Sacred Scriptures—a version which was not acknowledged or recognised by their own Church, which would be taught by men differing in religious principles from themselves; and it was also requisite that they should unite in the act of religious worship with those with whom they had no communion. In order, therefore, that the Catholics should participate in the benefits of this bill, it would be necessary that they should violate their religious principles in these particulars, and it was highly incumbent on the Catholic body to express their feelings and sentiments to the Legislature with regard to this bill, and to use every legislative means to prevent that portion of the bill from becoming law.

The Rev. Dr. Appleton being named by the chairman to propose the first resolution, said, that assembled as they were publicly to record their sentiments on a subject of such vast importance, the education of the poorer classes of the community, to attest that they were on the alert, that they were watching with jealousy the interests of those classes—the interests of the many connected not only with education, but education, as inseparable from Faith and Church—(hear, hear)—to lend their strenuous support, not only in promoting that education, but, at the same time, prominently, energetically, and strenuously to stand forward against monopoly of education—(cheers)—against a party and domineering system of education—(applause)—against proselytising education—(cheers)—against a system of education insidiously and vilely planned and concocted for other purposes than education, under the mask of that attractive name—(loud applause)—assembled as they were for duties and objects such as these, and yet standing there as the strenuous and determined advocates of education and the extension of knowledge, they found themselves, as regarded the specific Government measure then in consideration, in an unfortunate position, of having more to oppose than to support; of having more to condemn than to sanction; for beyond the mere recognition of a principle, the paramount importance of religious education, the bill before Parliament contained little which they could either sanction or support. (Cheers.) Assembled then for these momentous duties; what, he would ask, was the position on which they should first take their stand?—what the principles they should first put forward?—what the sentiments they should first record in their resolutions that evening? They must bear in mind that this was a calumny which the enemies of their church and faith had long and untiringly laboured to fix as an indelible stigma on them. They must remember that their enemies would watch their proceedings—that they would scrutinize them with severe scrutiny—that they would be glad to fix on something in the resolutions which they adopted that might countenance and perpetuate that calumny. They would endeavour to interpret their opposition to the details of the bill into an opposition to the spirit of the bill. (Cheers.) Under those circumstances, he asked, what was their duty?—what was the first sentiment they should record? He was sure every one present would agree with him that their first duty was to meet that false assertion with a loud and unanimous denial, fearlessly challenging proofs to the contrary. As a body they were not—by their principles they never could be, never had been—opposed to the education of the poor; to the education of the masses. (Applause.) The very principles of their faith—the very principles of the Catholic Church, were not unfavourable, but most favourable, to the extension of knowledge and the education of the poor. (Hear.) The Catholic Church opposed to the education of the poor! why; she was their guardian angel! (loud applause) she was their protectress! (Cheers.) But it was her zeal with regard to the education of the poor that was the point at issue now. The Catholic Church, since her foundation, had ever been distinguished for the foundation of societies, whose sole and paramount object had been the education and improvement of the poorer classes. (Hear, hear.) Such societies had spread over every part of the earth—from Italy into France, into Spain, into Ireland—which had never been lost, but was always among the most forward. (Loud cheering.) The Church in which there existed such a principle of energy to give birth to—to nurture—to bring to maturity and to perpetuate—ate—that Church may safely and with scorn repel the charge of being adverse to the education of the poor. (Cheers.) At a period when the education of the multitude, before the invention of printing, must have been a work of great difficulty, did not all the hierarchy of the Catholic Church, from the highest to the lowest, devote themselves to the education and improvement of the masses? Did not every Bishop establish a school in his palace for the education of those who might become fitted for any station in the Church (hear, hear); and how many illustrious orders had principally for their object, beside attainment of evangelical perfection, the education of the poorer classes (cheers); and the propagation of that knowledge of the gospel so much required by all. (Cheers.) Could the Church which accused them of being adverse to the instruction of the poor produce any institution which might be put on a parallel with those founded by the Catholics? (Hear, hear.) Were not the schools of the land, the grammar-schools, first established by the Catholic Church, and were they not then open to the poor?—and, he would ask, who had closed them against the poor? (Loud applause.) The Anglican Church was a poor, helpless, paralyzed fondling of the Government, and could neither act nor move without the aid of civil power. (Loud cheers.) Whenever any thing was to be done for education, had it not the civil arm to aid its operations? (Hear, hear.) Not so the Catholic Church! Were he inclined to recriminate, a fearful case might be made out against the asperser of the Catholic Church. What was of so much importance for the formation of men's minds and characters, as truth; and yet this stream of truth had been poisoned and polluted! What a mass of calumnies and false assertions was contained in the long range of elementary works for the education of youth, published by the opposers of the Catholic Church! (Hear, hear.) Before there could be a proper system of education, all the errors, the prejudices, and mistakes, concerning the doctrine of the Catholic Church, must be overthrown and eradicated. (Loud applause.) The rev. gentleman concluded by proposing the first resolution.

R. Sheil, Esq., in seconding the resolution, said they had heard from the rev. and learned gentleman who preceded him what the Catholic Church had done for education in its early days down to the present time, before the Reformation was heard of, and he, (Mr. Sheil) would now call their attention to a few extraordinary facts which he had collected in the course of his very slight reading, illustrative of the exertions since made by the Protestant Church and the Protestant clergy to extend education throughout the country, and most especially to the poor. (Cheers.) They were told that wherever the Catholic religion prevailed, there was ignorance—(laughter)—in fact, that Catholicism was founded on ignorance, and that if the people were enlightened they would become Protestants. ("Hear, hear," cheers and laughter.) And they were further told that Protestantism was founded on an enlightened education, and in extended knowledge. (Hear, hear.) Now, they must wish that all should become Protestants; and why then, he asked, did they not allow to Catholics a fair share of that education which belonged to all, since all were taxed for its support? (Loud cheers.) But no, they could not think of allowing the Catholics to educate their own poor; they knew that the Catholics could not accept education on their terms, and therefore the offering of it on those terms was a most contemptible subterfuge on the part of the Government. (Loud cheers.) Look to Lord Ashley's account of the state of education throughout the several counties in England! The great majority of the people were described to be in such a state of deplorable ignorance, that many of them never heard the name of God or Jesus Christ, except as used in oaths and imprecations. Now that was the state of England. He referred them to Parliamentary Reports; and he asked them if the Clergy of the Established Church, who enjoyed a greater portion of the public wealth than any other establishment in the world, could have performed their duty, when the country was in such a state of ignorance? (Hear, hear.) That was the state of England; let them now look to Ireland. In the twenty-eighth year, of the reign of that very pious and worthy king, Henry VIII., the head of the Protestant religion—(laughter)—well, bad as he was, he was not so bad as some that followed him, for he did make an attempt to extend religious education, and particularly to Ireland. He caused an act of Parliament to be passed, directing that every beneficed clergyman in Ireland should, on his induction, take an oath to establish and maintain a school in every parish, for the education of all classes. This continued, though it was never acted upon, till the reign of William III., when another act was passed ordering that its provisions should be enforced; but that act also remained a dead letter; and the result of an inquiry in 1781 was the discovery that, in a great majority of these parishes, the schools had never been established; whilst some clergymen, anxious, no doubt to fulfil the duty they had sworn to perform, allowed 40s. a year to a few schools to educate the people of Ireland. (Cheering and laughter.) In the reign of Charles I. seven royal schools were established in different towns in Ireland, with a grant of about 13,700 acres of land for their maintenance. (Hear, hear.) About 40 or 50 years ago an inquiry was made into the state of these schools, and it was found that from these 14,000 acres of land there were just five and twenty scholars receiving a free education (Cries of "Shame.") He was not drawing upon his imagination for these facts, he was quoting from Parliamentary records. For 14,000 acres of land there were five-and-twenty scholars. There was a fine specimen of national education for them! (Cheers and laughter.) Queen Elizabeth, bad as she was, was not so bad as some of the clergy, for she ordered diocesan schools to be established in every one of the 34 dioceses of Ireland; but in the whole of them it was found that there were only 13 schools, and these in a deplorable condition. To these schools both the bishops and the clergy were ordered to contribute; but the report stated that the clergy paid with great reluctance, and that never more than a very small sum was collected from them, though the Established Church of Ireland was the richest in the world, taking the number of its members into consideration. In these diocesan schools there were just four-and-twenty free schools. (Hear.) They were perverted for the use of the sons of the gentry;—being endowed, they did not depend on the number of scholars; and the terms were kept so high that none but the gentry could afford to have their children educated there. (Hear, hear.) In 1733 the charter schools were established, and these also were intended for the education of all, without distinction of politics or religion; but from the very commencement only Protestants were admitted. (Hear, hear.) That did not answer the purpose of the Institution; and in 1775 a law was passed prohibiting the admission of any but Roman Catholics, the object being clearly proselytism, for they were bound to bring up all the children as Protestants. What was the result? Why, that up to 1825 they had educated 8000 pupils, at an expense of a million of money from the public funds, besides £10,000 a year from other sources. From a report in 1828, it appeared that 196 of these were young proselytes, and that out of these only 101 were described as doing tolerably well. This was the way in which these worthy gentlemen had proceeded; and now, having plundered the state and defrauded the poor, they came and said that they were the persons who had a peculiar right to be trusted with the management of the funds raised for the general education of the people. (Vehement cheering.) How had they managed to expend such an enormous amount of the public money, and yet to leave the people in such a state of ignorance? They had the explanation in the answer of one of the schoolmasters before a Parliamentary committee. When asked how it happened that the children in his school came to be so very ignorant when they attended regularly, he said, "Well, I'm sure I don't know, for God knows I wallop them as often as I can." (Roars of laughter.) And so when they asked a clergyman how the Catholics came to be so ignorant, he might say, "God knows, I cannot tell how it is; I have gone to every public meeting and abused them, I have resorted to most unwarrantable falsehoods to show that they are in a state of the grossest ignorance and crime,—and if they have not earned better, how can you possibly blame me for it?" (Loud cheers.) He maintained that if any part of the national funds were to be appropriated to education, the Roman Catholics of this country were entitled to their fair share, without violation of any of the principles of their religion, or any of the rights of conscience. They had no right to ask that the Protestant should read their version of the Bible or learn their catechism; and the Protestants had no right to insist that the Roman Catholics should learn theirs. (Loud cheers.) There was no neutral to decide which was right, and therefore they must maintain their rights, and insist on such an alteration of the clauses of this bill as would place them on the same footing as other members of the community; that they should be taught jointly, if they pleased, in secular instruction; but that there should be separate religious instruction given by members of their own religion, after their own way, and according to their own principles. (Loud and continued cheering.)

The resolution was then proposed from the chair, and passed unanimously.—Tablet, April 15.

BIBLEMEN.

GUILDHALL.—John Mannering, a man about 40 years of age, who goes about soliciting orders for Bibles, was charged with stealing a clock from the Globe Insurance office. J. Hussey deposed that about five minutes before four, as the gentlemen were leaving the office, he saw the prisoner go up stairs to the secretary's office with a blue bag under his arm. He soon came down with the bag, which appeared to be full. Witness stood before him to prevent him from going out, and asked where he had been. He said he had been up stairs to see a Mr. James, who had had hooks of him. Witness told him he must be mistaken, and requested him to show him which room he had been into. On reaching the secretary's room, the prisoner was about to enter, but turned back and said, "No; it is higher up." When the door of the secretary's room was pushed open, witness instantly missed the clock, and charged the prisoner with stealing it. The prisoner assumed a high tone, and replied, "Clock! what do you mean, Sir? Let go my collar directly." Witness called for assistance, and the clock was found in the Bibleman's blue bag. The prisoner made no defence, and was committed.—Tablet, April 29.

REVIEW.

A Practical Exposition of the Sacred Ceremonies prescribed by the Rubric to be observed at Solemn Mass, and at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, also at Solemn Mass of the Dead, at Absolution, and Interment; to which is added, the Ceremonies of Mass sung without Deacon and Subdeacon, the Ceremonies of the Choir, &c (permissu superiorum). Ceremonies and Responses on Serving at Mass. Third Edition. By the Rev. J. Hughes, &c. Coyne, 1843.

We have had very great pleasure in turning over the leaves of these useful works, the author of which is, we believe, very well known to most of our clerical readers by some former compilations of a similar nature to the above, which have met with very general acceptance. From the preface to the former and more important of the two works, we learn that it has been printed "for private distribution among ecclesiastics;" and from the advertisement, which appeared in the Trautner of the 8th and 15th inst., we observe that it is to be had "not from the booksellers," but of the Rev. author at Carlow College, on the receipt of a post-office order for the proper amount. It happens to be within our knowledge that this work, like the former productions of the same author, rejoices in the approbation of ecclesiastics competent to pronounce and judge on such subjects. We simple laymen hesitate to pronounce an opinion on the accuracy of a work of ecclesiastical ceremonies, but we can speak in praise of the clear, concise, and business like way in which the matter of the book appears to be put together. It appears to be very full and complete on the subjects of which it professes to treat. From the appendix we take the following recent instructions to his clergy from the Cardinal Archbishop of Malines:—

The clergy are particularly desired to pay attention to the following points, which are, for the greater part, drawn from the synods and decrees of the Sovereign Pontiffs, and above all, from the constitution of Benedict XIV., February 19, 1740. 1st. The full chant, which is called the Gregorian, if it be sung as it ought to be, with care and attention, is always heard with pleasure by pious persons. It is not without reason that they prefer it to the one called harmonious or musical. We, therefore, order that it may be continued in those places where it is still used; and that it be re-established, propagated, and cultivated, where it has been abolished; particularly in Advent and Lent, in the Matins of Passion Week, and the service of Good Friday; in the Masses for the Dead, and more especially at interments and funeral obsequies. 2nd. In those places where the musical chant is used, the clergy will take care that it be grave, decent, sweet, and solemn; and also that no profane airs be introduced, or any passages that would tend to dissipate, rather than to excite pious feelings. 3rd. The words that are sung should always agree with the service. They should be taken from the Missal, the Breviary, and the holy Scriptures: they should very rarely be used in the vulgar tongue. 4th. The singing should be conducted in such a manner that the words may be heard and perfectly understood. 5th. What is sung at the commencement, the Offertory, at the Elevation and the Communion, ought not to be prolonged so that the Priest should be forced to wait, or interrupt the sacrifice. In the same way, the Gloria and Credo ought to be sung; that the Mass without sermon should not last more than an hour. 6th. If the chant be accompanied by musical instruments, they should be used only (after the Council of Benedict XIV.) in strengthening the chant, so that the sense of the words may better enter the hearts of those who hear them, and that the minds of the faithful may be excited to the contemplation of spiritual things, and elevated towards God. Care should also be taken that the instruments should not exceed the voice of the singers, or sully the sense of the words. 7th. The symphonies that are executed by instruments alone, and without chant, ought to be grave, and calculated to excite devotion; but they should not become wearisome from their length. 8th. We recommend to separate from sacred music all that does not contribute to promote its aim: all that would serve only to satisfy the curiosity and pleasure of the public, or even to create a reputation for the composers. We expressly forbid introducing into the Church any theatrical airs, military or worldly music. 9th. We charge all the clergy to explain and carefully inculcate these dispositions to the organists, singing and music masters, and to entreat them to have constantly before their eyes the end the Church proposes by chanting.

Given at Malines, in the congregation of the Archpriest, April 26, 1842.

ENGELBERT,

Cardinal Archbishop of Malines.

By Order of his Eminence,

J. J. G. BAGNET, Secretary.

The second of the above compilations has reached a third edition, and therefore needs not so much our praise as to bring it anew under the attention of our readers, by whom, we doubt not, it will be found of much utility.—Tablet.

SCOTLAND.

REVIVALS IN ROSS-SHIRE.—We are favoured with a letter from Ross-shire of the 4th inst., which contains a very curious exposition of the prevailing monomania of the "Revivals." "We have had further particulars of the 'Revivals' from the West, and it appears that the parishes of Kintail, Glenelg, Lochalesh, and Lochcameron, are now labouring under BLACK MAIL. These poor and, hitherto, harmless, people, the most primitive in Scotland, seem to be carried along by some hidden power that puts them beyond the influence of argument or common sense. We thought, by the last accounts, that they had reached the climax, but it now appears that they are little more than in the beginning, though progressing rapidly and fearfully in the knowledge of the mysterious 'working of the spirit.' They have, however, got quite unsettled, and ceased from their accustomed industry and daily toil, and are doing nothing but travelling backwards and forwards, over hills and mountains, after their 'inspired' preachers, sickling and groaning, and evidently in a state of great mental suffering, from whatever cause. It is remarked, also, that many of them have acquired a most appalling expression of countenance—a scowling stare of the eye which almost lays the gazer prostrate with horror. The impression made, by the preachers upon the minds of the revived is awful. They are cast prostrate and thrown into convulsions; and this state is now so common, that the usual expression is, 'Suah and such persons fill to-day, they were tumbling down in numbers all round us.' The hearer probably replies—'Where I was I saw twenty fill; tall strong men were rolling on the ground and foaming at the mouth,' &c. Another says, 'Well, I tell you that was nothing to the frightful appearance numbers of the men had, when their faces became distorted in the convulsion—and the dreadful language they uttered—Oh! if the ministers did not tell us that it is the spirit of God that brings them to that state to prepare them for heaven, and keep them from committing further sin, I would feel quite sure that it was the devil himself that had entered into them.' One of the Revival preachers is an old pensioner, who is compared by these enthusiasts to St. Paul, ay, set above the apostle of the Gentiles. He has perfected Skye, and is now purifying the mainland. He slays his thousands, and is often complimented after this fashion—'You have a long list of killed and wounded to-day.' He prohibits dancing and all amusements, and makes frights of the women by forcing them to abandon all head-ornaments save their own hair; when they fall, seized with the religious fit, a new falling sickness, the prophet says the devil within them is yielding to his power, and they are in the way to sin no more. At a late wedding one of these prophets rushed among the merry-makers, and, opening his mouth with a hollow groan and a loud voice, told them, 'they were all on the road to hell! to hell!! every one of them: they had not yet been regenerated by the spirit of grace, and so seemed from their cantrips and capering, and devilish trappings of plaids and ribbons.' The poor bride fell motionless, and was the first carried off in the fit; the bridegroom became frantic, and was but little consoled by seeing more than half the assemblage, one after the other, affected in the same way; by what influence we know not, but the scene of innocent, happy mirth was soon changed into a den of howling and moaning that would be tedious to describe. The effect of the power, real or pretended in the preacher, is painfully and frightfully manifested in the yellings, tortures, convulsions, and appalling looks of the sufferers; but the cause of this effect is unknown. Divines are silent, and scientific men talk of the mesmeric influence. It appears important that the facts should be submitted, if not to the General Assembly, at least to the general public."

NO SOUND PREACHING IN THE KIRK—The following passage of the Scottish Kirk debate, omitted last week, is sufficiently important for a special notice:—The Rev. Dr. Candlish followed the Right Hon. Chairman, and in the course of a long, and certainly an eloquent speech, observed—"It could not fail to strike us, the members of the deputation, who were sitting as witnesses in the House of Commons when this question was debated, that this, though almost the first time in modern days that the House of Commons had resolved itself into an ecclesiastical assembly for the discussion of ecclesiastical matters, yet, in all probability, judging from the signs of the times, would not be the last. We could not but remember the days of old, when almost the same question had been discussed in that House. We could not fail to remember that, both in Scotland and in England, matters were tending to a great similarity of proceedings with those of ancient days; and the great probability was that if the House has been compelled, for the first time, to entertain this question of religion for two nights, the ominous signs of the times indicate that other questions of religion, or the same questions in other forms, will trouble them, not only for nights, but for weeks together. If they were afraid of our demands crossing to England, their wisdom and policy was to grant the Church all her reasonable demands; but now they have allowed the flame to kindle, and they have no power to arrest its progress." After entering very fully into the general question, the Rev. Gentleman continued: "The real principle for which the Church of Scotland is called to contend is not the principle of Non-intrusionism. I have thought of late, since we have been compelled to make ourselves acquainted with the stories of the martyrs of old, that we have not got a suitable watch-word—a fitting phrase to emblazon on our banner in the day of battle, when the stormy wind shall blow. It is not Non-intrusionism, or spiritual independence, that will do, but the old time-worn and hallowed watchword of our fathers—the Crown Rights of the Redeemer! By God's blessing on our free and faithful preachings—in the high ways and hedges, in barns and stables, in sawpits and tents—we shall yet regenerate Scotland. Oh! this will be a blessed reward for all our agitation, well worth the overthrow of the Establishment, if in the district of Scotland, where no sound preaching has been heard for ages, we are forced, by the disruption of the Establishment, to carry to them the glad tidings of the Gospel!"—Tablet.

FRANCE. ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH—It is a most cheering reflection to every sincere Catholic, anxious for the promotion of the Faith, to think on the success which has crowned the thrice-hallowed work of this Association. The gross receipts, by the Central Committee in France, for the year ending March, 1843, have exceeded three millions of francs, or above £120,000; being about £10,000 more than the receipts of the preceeding year ending March, 1842.

THE HURKARU AND ITS CORRESPONDENTS “NO PUSEYITE,” “PROTESTANT,” &c. &c.

Many of our readers must have remarked the lengthened correspondence, which, under the signatures above recited, occupied during last week the columns of the Hurkaru. To the parties immediately concerned in the correspondence, and to their religious Brethren, these letters must prove very interesting. Indeed to every adherent of the English Protestant Church, they must not only supply ample matter for serious reflection, but also a strong incentive to earnest inquiry. For, assuredly, when it has become, as it now has, as clear as the noon-day Sun, that the Bishops and Clergy of the English Church are at variance with each other on the right understanding of the Articles, on the doctrine, which is to be taught respecting the Sacraments, on Tradition and the value to be attached to it, on the sacred Ministry and its powers, and the medium by which those powers are to be transmitted and perpetuated; when, we repeat it, the English Protestant Bishops and Clergy notoriously differ from each other on all these important tenets, and even on the sacrificial nature of the Eucharistic Institution, it behoves their followers to reflect, that they have evidently failed to secure to their flock that great and paramount benefit, for the attainment and maintenance of which, St. Paul teaches, that the Pastoral office was ordained by God. “And he gave some Apostles, and some Prophets, and other some Evangelists, and other some Pastors and Doctors, until we all meet into the Unity of faith,..... That henceforth we be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine”..... It would be easy to show, that from their very origin, the English Protestant Hierarchy never imparted to their people the blessing of religious Unity—never saved those confided to their Pastoral care, from being tossed to and fro, by every wind of doctrine. Indeed the only circumstance peculiar to the present religious strife is, that, now, the war of dissension is openly carried on, and that, on one side, the combatants distinctly repudiate those maxims, which, hitherto, were universally regarded as primary fundamental principles in every system of Protestantism. We have said that the letters which have just appeared in the Hurkaru, supply not only data for serious reflection, but also an incentive to earnest inquiry, to the adherents of the English Protestant Church. It is hardly necessary to assign a reason, in support of so obviously reasonable an observation, as the preceding. It will, doubtless, be readily conceded, that it is high time for English Protestants to inquire earnestly into their religious position, when it is known to the whole world, that their Pastors have not only failed to conduct them into unity and save them from being tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine, but are, moreover, themselves, engaged in interminable religious disputes, on the most grave doctrines of the Gospel, and are tossed to and fro, for want of some competent tribunal, to whose decision all concerned in these controversies would feel it incumbent to submit, not only externally for this alone, would not in such a case be of any consequence, to the decision of the points at issue, but internally also. It is in vain to search for such a tribunal as we have just referred to, in the constitution or composition of the English Protestant Church. For no tribunal, but one divinely constituted infallible, could effectually set at rest the minds of men, learned and unlearned, on the controversies which agitate the English Protestant Church, and cause those, whose doctrines that tribunal might proscribe, not only to reject the censured dogmas and condemn them sincerely, but even to recognise as divine those tenets, which they had previously regarded as the certain offspring of error. Now, to recur to a tribunal possessed of the prerogatives requisite to effect all this is, for the English Protestant, manifestly impossible. His Church repudiates the idea, that she is infallible. In fact the recognition of such a tenet as that of the Church's infallibility, is ordinarily treated as a popish superstition by Protestant writers and preachers. The Scripture alone is the sole infallible tribunal, by which according to Protestant principles, the accuracy or error of any doctrine must be determined. Hitherto this tribunal has contributed but little, to allay the disputes which rend in twain the English Protestant Hierarchy on what is called the Puseyite controversy, and there is not the shadow of a reason to conjecture, that for the time to come, it will interpose any more salutary influence than that which it has previously exercised.

In a word it is impossible to arrest the progress of any error whatever, in a Church constituted as the English Protestant Church is, the mere creature of Parliament and the football of the crown,—its Bishoprics liable to be reduced and abolished at the pleasure of the Legislature, its Bishops dependent for the extent and continuation of their authority on the royal will,—its acts or decisions, however spiritual or doctrinal, having no force, except with the concurrence of the civil power—its own internal principles at conflict with each other,—for, by them, the English Church has authority to decide controversies, and by them, no man is to believe any thing except what may be proved by the most certain warrant of Scripture; by them it is laid down, that Scripture alone contains the entire deposit of faith, and by them, our faith respecting the Scripture itself is to be regulated by the consenting testimony of past ages declaring, that such and such books were always received as canonical by the faithful. Thus by this admirable combination, are united together in the English Protestant Church, on the one hand, authority in the Church to teach—and on the other, the right of private interpretation in each individual; on the one hand, the all-sufficiency of Scripture with respect to the deposit of faith,—and on the other, the necessity of recurring to the testimony of the Ancient Church, in order to regulate our belief of the Scripture itself. In a Church thus crippled, if we may so speak, by its internal and external relations, and by its contradictory principles, there never can be the authority, energy, unity and decision requisite to crush the audaciousness of Innovators.—Let the past history of the English Church decide upon the justness of the position here laid down. What sect, from the first day of her origin to the present, has the English Protestant Church ever successfully repressed or reclaimed? She has seen Sectarians of every denomination springing out of her own bosom. She left nothing indeed undone to exterminate them, but it was by the sword of the spirit, and not by that of the Magistrate.—She has seen her temples left desolate and her children hastening forth in crowds with emulation, to hear the outpourings of dissenters, who publicly reviled her doctrine and discipline.—She has witnessed these and a thousand other similar scenes, and in every instance, she was found powerless, wholly inefficient in the suppression of error, even when that error emanated from ignorance or fanaticism. And, if this be so, how shall she be able to contend successfully with Puseyism, when its proud and gifted champions are seated in her own high places, in her chiefest strongholds and on the very pinnacles of her Temples,—when shaking off the lethargy and incrustation of indolence, with which idleness and a plethora of riches and luxury had oppressed the establishment, the Puseyites (as for brevity sake we shall name them) bring forth to public gaze the sacred and learned treasures of venerable antiquity, displaying to the world, that the Liturgy, the rites and the ceremonies still cherished in the Church which holds communion with the See of Peter, are in accordance with those venerated in the earliest ages of Christian antiquity, and are moreover sure indications, that the mysterious doctrines of Catholicity, of which these are at once, as it were, the key stone and the ark, have been safely embalmed in them for ages and have thus come down to the present time, breathing still freshly the sweet odour of their Divine and Apostolic origin.

Before we close our observations, it may be well to admonish one of the Correspondents, the writer signed No Puseyite in the Hurkaru, that whilst he is naturally anxious to sustain his own cause, he is bound in charity and justice not to misrepresent the doctrine of his Catholic Fellow-Christians. Ignorance may, indeed, be perhaps, pleaded in excuse, but as, when there is question of the character of an individual, he who accuses is bound to inform himself of the truth of what he alleges, so and even still more strictly, is the writer who stands forth as the impeacher of the Catholic Creed, obliged to study attentively in approved authors, the principles of that code of doctrine, in order that, to the prejudice of truth or to the injury of his neighbour, he may not mistake tenets, which he undertakes to discourse upon. To come to the point, to which we would direct attention, we must inform our readers, that in the letter of the Correspondent just referred to, which appeared in the Hurkdru of, we think, the 6th instant, the writer enumerates among the corrupt doctrines of the Roman Church, that the efficacy or effect of a Sacrament is made to depend on the morality of the Minister of that sacred rite. Now this is a gross, a palpably gross misrepresentation, or rather a grievous calumny against the Catholic doctrine. So far is the statement here referred to, from being really a Catholic tenet, that it would on the contrary, be openly erroneous and at variance with orthodox Theology to teach such doctrine. But it is of little use to point out to those whom bigotry has blinded,—either this or any other misrepresentation of the Catholic faith, they may think proper to indulge in. Instead of retracting their calumny against the truth or repenting of their wickedness, they shall, agreeably to St. Paul's prediction, "grow worse and worse erring and driving into error."... "But they shall proceed no farther; for their folly shall be manifested to all men."

OBITUARY.—It is with sincere grief we have to record the painful intelligence of the death of the Rev. M. Irwin of St. Xavier's College, which melancholy event occurred on his passage to Singapore where he was proceeding for the benefit of his health. May he rest in peace!

There will be a solemn High Mass and office on Tuesday, July 18, at 6½ o'clock A. M. in St. Thomas' Church for the repose of the soul of the deceased. The Bishop will officiate at this solemnity.

NEW CHURCH AT SINGAPORE.

We have been obligingly favored with a copy of the Singapore Free Press of the 22d ultimo, and from which we borrow the following account of the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Church of the "Good Shepherd."

"On Sunday last the Catholic community of Singapore had the gratification of witnessing the solemn ceremony of blessing and laying the "Corner Stone" of their new Church. It began at half past six A. M. The congregation being assembled in the present chapel, the Right Rev. D. D. HILARY COURVEZY, robed in his Pontificals, proceeded in procession to the spot, where the Church is to be raised.

The Procession was formed by a Cross-bearer, two acolytes and 9 children, all robed in white; by the Wardens & Trustees of the Church, with their insignia; by the Architect Mr. D. L. McSWINEY, carrying a Silver Trowel; JOHN CONNOLLY, Esq. the Gentleman appointed to lay the Corner Stone, and the Right Rev. Dr. HILARY COURVEZY, supported by the Rev. J. M. BEUREL and the Chinese Clergyman, the Rev. JOHN CHOO, followed by the rest of the faithful.

His Lordship, the Bishop, being on the spot, addressed the assembly in a brief but very impressive and edifying discourse, explaining why the place where a Temple is to be erected to Almighty God, ought to be blessed and sanctified by Prayer and thanking God for the various donations received from charitable persons, which had enabled the Catholic community to begin such an undertaking, &c. &c.

After the discourse the Right Rev. Doctor performed the prescribed religious ceremony. When the corner stone was blessed, it was carried by two Chinese Christians from the altar erected for the occasion to the left corner of the frontispiece of the proposed edifice. Then the Rev. J. M. BEUREL read in an audible voice the following inscription:—

To the Greater Glory and Honor
Of the Holy and Undivided Trinity.

In the Year of our Redemption
MDCCCXLIII.

On the Feast of Corpus Christi,
The Eighteenth day of June;
In the thirteenth year of the Pontificate
Of our Holy Father,

GREGORY THE SIXTEENTH;
In the sixth year of the happy reign
Of Her Most Gracious Majesty

VICTORIA.
Queen of Great Britain and Ireland;
In the thirteenth year of the reign

Of His Christian Majesty,
LOUIS PHILIPPE,
King of the French;
And during the Governorship of
The Honorable SAMUEL GEORGE BONHAM, Esqre.,
In the presence and with the approbation
Of the Right Rev. D. D. HILARY COURVEZY, Bishop of Bidopolis and Vicar Apostolic of the Malay Peninsula, &c. &c.

Of the Rev. JOHN M. BEUREL, M. A.
Of the Wardens and Trustees of the Church
And of the Architect DENIS McSWINEY,

JOHN CONNOLLY, Esquire,
Laid the Corner Stone of this Church,
Which is to be dedicated to Our Divine Saviour
Under the title of
"THE GOOD SHEPHERD."

Complete, O Lord, this undertaking;
And when completed, protect it.

This inscription was translated into five other Languages viz., into Latin, French, Portuguese, Chinese and Malay, and signed by Dr. COURVEZY Rev. J. M. Beurel, John Connolly, D. L. M

Swiney, by the Wardens and Trustees of the Church and some other Gentlemen. These documents together with British, French, Spanish, and various other Coins, and a Copy of the Singapore Free Press, the Strait's Messenger, the Bengal Catholic Herald, the Mudras Catholic Expositor, &c. &c., were put into vases which were deposited in a place, beneath the Corner-Stone, prepared for their reception. Immediately after, the Corner-Stone was laid by JOHN CONNOLLY, Esq., with the approbation of His Lordship the Bishop, that Gentleman reciting at the same time the following prescribed prayer:—
 "In the faith of Jesus Christ, we lay this first stone in this foundation in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; that the true faith and the fear of God and fraternal charity may flourish here and that this place be dedicated to prayer and to invoke and praise the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, who liveth and reigneth with the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost, world without end." Amen.

The remainder of the ceremony being performed, the procession returned to the old chapel in the same order in which it had first proceeded to the site of the intended Church, when the Bishop ascended the altar and celebrated a Pontifical High Mass.

The weather was remarkably fine and had not the Band of the 4th Regiment M. N. I. whose attendance had been requested and kindly granted by Major Haldane, failed to arrive at the appointed time, nothing would have been wanting in the ceremony.

SCOTLAND.

We have been kindly favored with the following extract of a letter from a lady, in Edinburgh, a recent convert, to a friend in Calcutta, who has also recently renounced Protestantism:

MY BELOVED FRIEND,—I need not occupy my paper in telling you the joy I experienced in reading your letter of the 18th January. I had heard of the arrival of the ship sometime before and also it was stated in a letter to — from a friend before yours had reached her or myself, that you were so changed, that the writer thought the religion which had produced this change must be the true religion. Here is the fulfilment of the command of our Lord: "Let your light so shine before men that they seeing your good works may glorify your Father who is in Heaven." What encouragement to you also to be made the instrument in young —'s conversion. How good it is in God to support you by these outward things as also to give you such delight in prayer. He suits his dealings to the temperament and circumstances of each individual, indulging some and feeding them with sweets, while with others he takes a different course, treating them with more rigour, placing them as it were in the front of the battle; but in all cases we recognize His gracious Hand; he is ingenious in the different crosses he makes for us; He makes them of lead which are grievous of themselves!

He makes them of straw, which seem to weigh nothing and which are not the less difficult to carry. He makes them of gold and precious stones which dazzle the spectators, which excite the envy of the public, but which crucify not the less than the others that are despised. The cross is never without fruit when one receives it in the spirit of sacrifice—happy are they who are ready for all and who never say it is too much, who count not on self but on the all-powerful; who wish not for consolation, but in as much as God Himself wishes to give it, and who nourish themselves with the pure will of God, there are in the cross such marks of the mercy of God and so great a harvest of graces to faithful souls that if it be afflicting to nature, faith ought to rejoice in it, one finds peace by submission and by the sacrifice without reserve of the most pure pleasure; it is thus God pushes a soul in order to detach it from all that is not himself. — is in that same state of mind with many at the present day: he wishes to persuade himself that he believes enough, and that in this state of partial doubt he would be in danger of acting rashly, but this is not a true doubt on the truth of Christianity but a kind of irresolution which serves as a pretext to defer to do what nature fears. All men in this state of mind exaggerate the difficulties without looking at the consolations—no, there would be no void left in the heart—true religion only makes us do the things which we ought to do, and that we ought to prefer to all the others that have so long kept us back—no miracle would take away this state of irresolution which is a sort of self-love, reasonings without end would do no good when the conscience tells what God has a right to demand—reasonings lead not to conclude and to execute but to doubt the more and to continue in the possession of self. I pray then that God will give a large grace to end this state of suspension and comfort to enable him to submit himself to the obedience of faith and so with the rest of his family be a inheritor of the promises. You will see by the Tablet, the Catholic faith is every where gaining ground, and in England to a far greater extent than most people imagine, for as the kingdom of Heaven cometh without observation, so there is an under current going steadily on, silently preparing men's minds for a return to the unity of the faith, in quarters and to an extent that very few are aware of one of the wonderful and consoling features this great movement is, that it is not the work of man, and even that Catholics have little to do with it, but it seems to show that the heart of all are in the hands of God and to teach that we are or ought to be only his instr ments to promote that glory, which he can nevertheless forward without our aid in a manner that we could never have devised. A few days ago the son of the celebrated Mrs. Hemans, the poetess, was received into the Church at Oscott by Dr. Wiseman. In this city which is to you the most interesting, we had about 18, all at one grasp this winter; they were of a sect who took their name from their leader a Mr. Sankie, who was an ordained minister of the English Church, but who 20 years ago left it and made a code of laws for himself,—they were very heavy laws, nevertheless he got a few followers who were anxious to save their souls, as they did not think they could do so by adhering to the law establishment of England or Scotland. By some circumstance this leader was converted to the true faith a few months ago and about 18 of his flock followed him,—they are sincere and find themselves now in a good and pleasant land. I have had to do with one lady in the line of instructor and it is delightful to me to mark the rapidity with which the light dashed in upon her, and her consequent peace and joy. They find Dr. — a true shepherd. — goes on steadily amidst persecutions unabated: she has learnt now however that the pains of all her crosses shall pass away and the fruit that will return from them will be eternal. She was greatly gratified by your remembrance of her and begged her's very affectionately in return. Our — is quite an Apostle, she will write you of the many converts of her own—13 during lent. Archbishop Murray gives her all the help she asks for towards benefitting

* * * * *

Mr. — is better and was delighted to hear your letter read to him. The Bishop rejoices in you as one of his own rearing who shall stand side by side with him on the great day when the ransomed myriads shall take their stand in a larger community than we have yet seen, and when we shall understand clearly what we now only perceive through faith; what a meeting that shall be, when we shall be blended in a degree with the universal family of Heaven.

Our Church and little side Chapel are just as you left them—Mr. R. and Mr. M. were happy to hear of you—all you tell me of Calcutta is most cheering—Bishop Carew is getting on faster than our British Bishops with his institutions. I send my mite towards his Lordship's new Church—I am truly thankful you have found such a friend in the Bishop and that the good Superioress and her Nuns are so often your companions. I will make an effort to see Dr. — during his visit to our Islands. He will succeed in getting

Sisters of Charity for Bishop Carew, for Ireland is the storehouse for the Church at present; God I verily believe will make the Repeal of the Union to be the cause of the downfall of proud England, heresy. The fidelity of faithful Ireland shall meet its reward—The Kirk is now in the most dreadful position; all the non-intrusionists, are split from the establishment and are to have a general assembly next month of their own, and they are flying from shop to shop throughout the city to gather money to build shells of kirk for the rejected ministers; it is very wonderful that men sensible and even clever on other topics should on this point be utterly beside themselves,—while one plank of the oldboat (the kirk) is above water they will cling to it and then when it disappears altogether, they will either come into the Catholic Church or be dashed on the rocks of infidelity—Every Friday and every Sunday Mrs. — meets me at the sacred altar. I never forget you there and I want you to join us and to unite in our intention. I have a few friends in France, who are united with me also and I fixed on these two days, and I feel a particular pleasure in the thought that though separated by a little space of sea and land, we still meet, the same heavenly manna feeds us, the same spirit of grace animates us; we ask on the Friday especially for the conversion of our relations; I shall copy the Novena that we always use; the whole of the seven parts I say every day—they, sent it to me from France; now my dearest friend write me soon, and when I have any thing that will interest you I shall be sure to do it in return. Will you make my respectful duty acceptable to Bishop Carew.

Your's affectionately in Christ,

April 25, 1843.

P. S.—I have got my little Chapel beautifully done up now with a new Altar and Tabernacle and my Roman Pictures; in short the people think me quite an Idolator.

SEVEN OFFERINGS.

1st. Eternal Father! I offer to you the merits of the most precious Blood of Jesus Christ your well beloved son, my divine Redeemer, for the propagation and exaltation of the Holy Church, my most tender mother, for the comfort and prosperity of the Sovereign Pontiff, Bishops, and Priests, and all the other members of the sanctuary, and in order to obtain the desired grace, praise and thanks be for ever to Jesus who hath shed his most precious blood.

2d. Eternal Father! I offer to you the merits of the most precious blood of your divine son my beloved Redeemer, for the union and race of kings and christian princes, for the humiliation of the enemies of the faith, for the happiness of the christian people, and to obtain the desired blessing, praise and thanks be for ever to Jesus who hath shed for us his most precious blood.

3d. Eternal Father! I offer to you the merits of the most precious blood of Jesus Christ your well beloved son my Divine Redeemer, for the enlightening of unbelievers, for the extirpation of heresies, and to obtain the desired blessing, praise and thanks be for ever to Jesus who hath shed his most precious blood.

4th. Eternal Father! I offer to you the merits of the most precious blood of your divine son my beloved Redeemer, for my relations, friends, enemies, the poor, the sick, and for all for whom I am bound to pray, and to obtain the desired blessing, praise and thanks be for ever to Jesus who hath shed for us his most precious blood.

5th. Eternal Father! I offer you the merits of the most precious blood of Jesus Christ your well beloved son my divine Redeemer, for all who shall die this day in order that they may be delivered from the pains of hell and admitted soon to the happiness of possessing thee and in order to obtain the desired blessing, praise and thanks be for ever to Jesus who hath shed for us his most precious blood.

6th. Eternal Father! I offer you the merits of the most precious blood of your divine son my Redeemer, for all those who know to appreciate this immense treasure and for those who unite with me in adoring it and who are engaged in spreading the devotion, praise and thanks be to Jesus who hath shed for us his most precious blood.

7th. Eternal Father! I offer you the merits of the most precious blood of your divine son, my beloved Redeemer, for all my spiritual and temporal wants for the relief of the souls in Purgatory and for all in particular who are most devoted to this most precious blood, and to the Dolors of the most Holy Virgin Mary our blessed mother, and in order to obtain the divine grace, praise and thanks be for ever to Jesus who hath shed for us his most precious blood. AMEN.

This Novena was originally sent from France where it is usually said on Fridays and Sundays, by any number of persons.

VERSION OF A SYRIAC PRAYER.

Grant me O God that grace of thy Holy Spirit which thou vouchsafest to thy holy Disciples in the upper chamber on Mount Olivet, nor take it from me either in this world or the next, for from thee is every good and perfect gift. O Light of lights, Creator of the world, Thee we glorify, thee we adore for ever and ever unto endless ages.

Farewell in peace, oh altar most holy! may I in peace return to thee again! The victim which I have received from thee, be to me the forgiveness of my sins, and obtain for me to stand without shame or blame before the judgment seat of Christ; for I know not whether I shall ever offer sacrifice on Thee again.

The following paragraph is taken from the Tablet :—

On Sunday 19th March, the Right Hon. Judge Ball attended at the celebration of Divine mysteries in the Catholic chapel of Tralee. This is the second time since the Emancipation Act that a Catholic congregation in Tralee has had the happiness of witnessing a Catholic judge assisting at the solemn worship of the Almighty in a Catholic temple.—Kerry Examiner.

Let us now proceed to investigate, Mr. Editor, how far the second eminent writer in the 3rd century of the Church, viz., the glorious martyr of Christ, St. Cyprian, was either Catholic or Calvinistic in his sentiments and doctrines about the Eucharist. We will find Cyprian's language couched in terms very similar to those of Tertullian, and his strictures elicited by almost the same causes, which is to be wondered at so much the less as both these great writers of a venerable antiquity lived in the same century, had consequently to combat the same irregularities; and especially because, St. Cyprian was an enthusiastic admirer of the great Tertullian's writings. Yet, whilst the former is equally as fiery and explicit as the latter, he is less chargeable with bad grammar and obscure phrases. One of his most conclusive and not to be evaded arguments in favor of transubstantiation occurs in his book concerning those who had relapsed into idolatry. "Returning, he says, from the altars of the devil, they approach the Most Holy of the Lord with hands soiled and infected with the smoke (from the idolatrous meat-offerings); belching up almost yet the deadly viands of idols; their jaws even now exhaling their crime, and smelling of destructive contagion; they assault the body of the Lord... before their sins are expiated... before their conscience is cleansed by sacrifice and the hand of the priest,* before the offended Majesty of a wrathful and threatening Lord is appeased, they use violence towards his body and blood, and sin now worse against the Lord with their hands and mouths, than when they denied Him." "A diaboli aris revertentes, et Sanctum Domini sordidis et infectis nidore manibus accedunt. Mortiferos idolorum cibos adhuc pene ructantes, exhalantibus etiam nunc scelus suum faucibus, et contagia funesta redolentibus, Domini corpus invadunt ante expiata delicta.... ante purgatam conscientiam sacrificio et manu sacerdotis, ante offensam placatam indignantis Domini et minantis, vis infertur corpori ejus et sanguini, et plus modo in Dominum manibus et ore delinquant, quam cum Dominum negaverunt." After so pithy a testimony every sensible, every thinking, every unprejudiced enquirer must rest satisfied that Calvin, with his satellites, is not and cannot be united by the ties of theological brotherhood to St. Cyprian. Indeed the North is less opposed to the South, than St. Cyprian differs in his doctrines about the Blessed Sacrament from the tenets of Calvin, Knox, the Magazine, the Advocate, &c. all confirmed shadowists; men, who unquestionably would have cut great figures among the shadow-catching Abderites. Nobody can doubt, that St. Cyprian was a man, who talked to the purpose. But had he been an adversary to Catholic substance and a defender of Protestant shadows, his above quoted language would have been as much to the purpose, as if with all possible seriousness he had reprehended people for having cudgelled the man in the moon. What man of sound intellect would ever talk of assaulting or invading shadows or figures existing merely in his own conception who could ever rave about using violence towards a man's body and blood; and let it be borne in mind, all this not by means of a spiritual violence, but, as St. Cyprian has it, with hand and mouth; when that man is absent from the place of violence as far as heaven is from earth; when he is present by no other means except by an act of remembrance, by an effort of the imagination of the individual that chooses to think of him. Really the ancient holy writers would have required the gigantic stretch of fancy, vouchsafed, it seems, to our modern Sacramentarians, in order to fit them for talking about assaults, invasions, about bodily violence, in short, about making the worst possible havoc with hand and mouth; when all the while the only object of such fierce attacks were shadows, figures, imaginations, acts of remembrance, in short mere phantasmas; and their readers would have required equally extensive faculties of feeding upon fancies, if they could have refrained from laughing at such instructors as fools, or pity them as idiots. To be sure, St. Cyprian does not use the modern word, Transubstantiation, to express his and the Church's doctrine by one single comprehensive term; but then he applies such language as is equivalent to it. For when he speaks of the Blessed Sacrament he, not even mentions the words of bread and wine, at once talks of the substance, that is instead of them, viz., the body and blood of our Saviour. In fact the very intensity of his indignation against such unworthy communicants shews evidently, that there was something worse to complain of than simply eating a piece of common bread or taking a sip of ordinary wine in a state of sin. It can hardly be questioned, that had St. Cyprian and the holy Catholic Church at his time entertained the Sacramentarian notions of our modern shadowists, the thought of the Lord's Supper would have been the last to hit upon in his invectives against Christians contaminated with idolatry. It is a thousand to one, that if this holy Father had been a Calvinist, he would have taken it as easy as our modern Protestants do in all things respecting the Blessed Eucharist. Nobody among the latter, in case he goes to take the Sacrament, (which by the way, is an act of rather rare and by no means widely diffused occurrence) does trouble his own or his neighbour's mind in the least on the score of this sacred rite. But as St. Cyprian professed, that in the Blessed Sacrament there is not indeed bread and wine, but the true substantial body and blood of Christ; the thought of the sacrilegious insult given to the real person of our Saviour is with him as well as with Tertullian, uppermost. In fact, by the bitter language, and vehement reproach, used by the holy Archbishop of Carthage, he seems to know of no worse trespass than the indignity heaped upon the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist by communicants, infected with unabsolved crimes. He thinks it even more censurable than apostacy and idolatry, which appears from his saying "that now (i. e. by an unworthy communion) they sin worse against the Lord with their hands and mouth, than when they denied him." This certainly squares but very little with any other doctrine about the Blessed Eucharist, except that, which professes with the whole Catholic Church, that it is the true, real, and substantial body of Christ, our Saviour; except that, which teaches, that under the appearances of bread and wine, the hand touches, and the mouth receives the veritable, identical substance of the incarnate, and now glorified Son of God. This shews at once that the calumnious hue and cry, wherein our modern Reformers (?) of the rock-built Church of our Saviour Christ, charge the Pope and the Catholics with having forged substance and reality, where the ancient Church had only figures and shadows; with having abandoned the path of primitive truth, and struck into ways of damning apostacy; that this calumny, I say, should be quite reversed and stand thus: that our modern Protestants are taught a faith which, by evil-designing men, has been turned away from the purity of the Apostolic and primitive times into the muddy channels of feeble human reasonings and sophisms, that more especially in regard to the Blessed Sacrament they are guilty of having abandoned the faith of a venerable ecclesiastical antiquity, which uniformly inculcated substance: and do now catch at mere figures and shadows.

* It seems then the ancients had better ideas about the powers of priests, than our modern mountebanks are willing to allow. St. Cyprian alludes here to Sacramental absolution.—Ed. C. H.

This single testimony of St. Cyprian appears sufficient to establish the fact that Transubstantiation was no novelty either to him or his times, consequently much less an innovation in the 9th century, or in the 19th. Thus we might pass on to those writers who in the following century bear witness to the Church's unchangeable doctrine of the change of bread and wine into the real substance of the body and blood of our Saviour. Yet, as I am anxious to shew, that it is not only in one single instance, that St. Cyprian expresses himself in favor of this Catholic tenet; I will send you, Mr. Editor, in my next communication such passages from his writings with such reflections upon them, as I may deem best calculated to support what I have ventured to demonstrate.

CATHOLIC CHAPEL IN KURNAUL.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

Sir,—I respectfully beg to call your attention to a paragraph in No. 21, page 292, Vol. 4, in which it is stated that the Catholic Soldiers of H. M. 13th, or, Prince Albert's Own Royal Light Infantry Regiment subscribed 6,000 Rupees towards erecting the Chapel in Kurnaul. This Sir, I have to inform you is erroneous, as H. M. 13th, or, Prince Albert's Own Royal Light Infantry Regiment was at Agra while the subscription for the said Chapel was in progress. It was raised in H. M. 31st Regiment under the presidency of the Rev. Father Antony of Cork, in May, 1835, and continued till the December following, when the amount of Rupees 6,000 was realized.

Though the liberality of the Catholics of H. M. 13th, or, Prince Albert's Own Royal Light Infantry Regiment in affairs of this nature does them much credit, and deserves to be highly lauded, especially for their late benevolent attention to the Rev. F. Francis at Ferozepore, yet Sir, in justice to the Catholics of H. M. 31st Regiment, I request the insertion of this in your valuable journal.

I am Sir, Your's very respectfully,

A SUBSCRIBER.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN REV. MR. — AND A PRIVATE.

Scene in a Barrack Room. Groups of Soldiers of all Christian denominations—Catholics equal in number to all the others.—A Private is seen reading on his berth when he is accosted by the Rev. Incumbent of St.— thus:—

Rev. Incumbent. Good evening—and kind shake of the hands; what books have you been perusing this while past?

Private. You have some of them in your hands.

Rev. I. What! Popish authors. I would not come here to-day but to inform you I have your soul to answer for at the day of judgment. What shall the Lord say to me as your Shepherd? He will say "you have let your sheep go astray."

Private. As to your having to answer for my soul I am ignorant. I believe every man has his own soul to answer for, and that is as much as he can do, I cannot believe that your reverence has to answer for the souls of all the congregations and—

Rev. I. (Interrupting.) No, nor can I believe that you now follow the horrible Religion of the Papists (evidently in wrath.)

Private. Do not abuse me; you know that abuse is no argument.

Rev. I. Argument!!! I do not want to argue with you.

Private. I would not even argue with a learned man more than to let him know that the "Papist" Church, or any name you like to call it, is the true Church of all ages.

Rev. I. Now that you are turned Papist what do you believe in.

Private. I believe just in the Nicene Creed, that is the Doctrine taught by the Holy Roman Catholic Church. I believe in one true Church—one Lord, one Faith and one Baptism.

Rev. I. Very good, but still the Papist Church, as I cannot call it Catholic, is not of all ages.

Private. I am assured Sir, the true Church cannot be the Protestant Church; as its foundation is not older than Luther and Calvin, who have each been condemning one another's doctrines, and that is only about 300 years ago, it cannot therefore be the true Church of all ages.

Rev. I. Do you believe that wafer which the Priest holds up and bows to be the body and blood of Christ?

Private. Yes Sir, I believe that under the appearance of bread the body, blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ are whole and entire.

Rev. I. How could you believe that to be the body, blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ when he himself administered the same sacrament to his Apostles? How could they be eating his body?

Private. Your reverence will soon bring it to a deistical argument—(interrupted again.)

Rev. I. Did you ever read Fox's Book of Martyrs?

Private. Yes Sir, I have read Fox's Book of Martyrs, the Lives of Beal and Mahommed, and likewise the works of Tom Payne, and I would burn the authors of every one of them.

Rev. I. You surely would not burn the author of Fox's Book of Martyrs, it is a fine work.

Private. Yes Sir, it is a fine work, there are some fine lies in it too. (His reverence appeared rather non-plussed—and exclaimed,)

Rev. I. You can't be ignorant, for you know very well that a man of this Idolatrous Church can never be saved. Surely you were never bred up so ignorant of the Scriptures? Look only to the second commandment—it says "before no idol bow thy knee."

Private. I know the 2d commandment Sir, but what has Idolatry to do with the Roman Catholic Church. I know Sir the opinion of Protestants,—they ignorantly believe that the Roman Catholic Church is idolatrous, I can tell them to the contrary and—

Rev. I. Yes, as far as I am informed, you do so, but you are not satisfied at forsaking the religion that your forefathers died and suffered so much for, but you make others forsake it also.

Private. I never asked any man to turn. I merely told them that they were going astray and explained the Holy Roman Catholic doctrine to them, as there are a great many who seem willing to talk with me on that subject.

Rev. I. (Very knowingly.) Did you not ask a man of No 3 Company to go along with you to St. Thomas' Church as they call it.

Private. Yes Sir, I told him when he put the same question which your reverence did a few moments ago to me, what I did believe in, he immediately answered me, saying "I'll not be a Protestant any longer" and like myself was very sorry he had been a Protestant so long. I then told him I was going to St. Thomas' that evening and he was welcome to come with me if he pleased.

Rev. I. (Dependingly.) I am not so sorry for yourself, as I have explained the errors you are falling into; but as for your posterity, it is horrible to think of your children if you ever have any being bred Papists, in such a false Doctrine. I am also informed that you were kept without your breakfast until a very late hour yesterday because there was some great man at the Chapel. I don't know who he was—What was he doing with you?

Private. That great man Sir, is the Bishop of Calcutta, and he was administering the Sacrament of Confirmation.

Rev. J. What!!!! did you get Confirmation? Do you know what confirmation means?

Private. Yes Sir, it is a Sacrament that makes us very strong in faith and by its Divine efficacy enables Christians to be true Soldiers to Jesus, preferring persecution and death to denying him, but I am very sorry, Sir, I have sent a book to be bound that would persuade you that it is the Church of all ages.

His Reverence in an uncontrollable fit of insulted dignity said.—Persuade me, Sir, how dare you be so full of impudence! and went off in a most edifying and pious rage, muttering as he went.

TO THE RIGHT REV. DR. CAREW,

Bishop of Philadelphia,

Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY DEAR LORD,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's kind letter by Dr. Wallich, and to thank you for the unmerited notice of one so obscure and unknown as your humble servant. Permit me in return to introduce to your Lordship's notice, one of our Converts from Protestantism, the Captain of the "Olivia" Schooner, William Roome. He has brought to this poor mission no inconsiderable sums of money from various ports, to aid the building of our Church in this Town, (there was not even a Chapel when I arrived,) and he intends, with your Lordship's kind sanction, to collect a little in Calcutta. Not but that we have had already a testimony of his zeal in that quarter in the donation of your Lordship's late lamented Vicar General, the Very Rev. Dr. Kelly, but he hopes to have more time on this occasion to use his charitable and very effective exertions. The enormous expense of labour and materials for building in this colony, and the very limited means of the congregation, the main support too of three other Missions, and of building Churches therein, have reduced us to the necessity of begging in every part of the globe, and gathering thence "every little to make the mickle" of which we stand so much in need.

I had but once or twice the pleasure of conversing with your friend Dr. Wallich: he left this soon after his arrival, for a Botanical Tour thro' the colony, and I have not heard of him since.

His Grace, the Archbishop of Sydney, did me the honor of a visit on his way to his new Archdiocese, and preached in aid of our new Church. Until this and the others shall have been completed, we cannot hope to effect much good in this part of the Vineyard. 'Tis consoling to me nevertheless to know that our poor labours are more than amply compensated for by the gigantic efforts of other Pastors in other climes—and India among these “in comparison with whom we seem like Locusts,” which, by the way, paid the Colony a visit this year, and did much damage.

I am but slowly recovering, my dear Lord, from a violent attack of illness, which lately assailed me, and which it required two Physicians to repel. I have not yet recovered the use of my pen, and write with much difficulty, your Lordship will therefore be kind enough to excuse this hasty and almost unintelligible scrawl, and not deny me the honor and pleasure of hearing from you often. *

Recommending myself and mission to your Lordship's and fellow-labourers prayers,

I have the honor to remain,

Your Lordship's obliged and faithful Brother in Christ.

TO THE RIGHT REV. DR. CAREW,

Bishop of Calcutta, &c. &c.

MY LORD,—I beg leave to return my sincere thanks for the very liberal and benevolent contribution, which I have received from a few worthy Members of our Church in aid of the Mission at the Cape of Good Hope.

While returning thanks I cannot help noticing the very liberal Donation of Messrs. Lackersteen and Brothers, but I understand it is only in keeping with many other cases, when the cause of humanity and true-feelings of piety towards the Catholic Faith is known to those Gentlemen.

May the blessings of the Almighty attend them, and may they live long to enjoy the prosperity with which God has given them, is the sincere prayers of

Your Lordship's Obdt. Servt.

THE BEAUTIES OF PUSEYISM.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

SIR,—I thank you very much for inserting my letter of questions, respecting the difficulties which have arisen in my mind. Your kindness emboldens me to unbosom myself to you a little more.

I will not at present ask you, why the learned men at Oxford apply the word “altar,” to what the Church of England calls “the table, having a fair linen cloth;” nor why they call the Lord's Supper, a “sacrifice;” nor why they bow to the East, and recommend that men should make the sign of the cross; nor why they prefer preaching in white surplices to preaching in black gowns; nor why they should read different parts of the prayers, in different parts of the Church; and do and say so many other things, that I have heard and seen, in Roman Catholic Churches; I do not ask you these questions, because, I am a very considerate man, and should be sorry to give you much trouble; and I fear, it might occasion a good deal, to give satisfactory replies. So I will content myself with saying, that I have been much surprised by all these things, and that I never was taught them by my parents or school-masters, when I was brought up; and yet I always thought that my instructors, were well informed Church-of-England people, and meant to tell me all that they knew themselves. I do not recollect that they ever taught me anything like the things I have mentioned; though I once remember in a country Parish Church, seeing a good many of the farmers turn to one end of the Church, when the belief was said, and to the other end when the singing began.

Let me begin this letter by saying, that I used to be taught history, and always was told that the Reformers were great and good men, and that they were put to death or persecuted by the Papists. And I don't think that the Papists would have been so cruel, if the Reformers had not differed with them a good deal. But from what the Tracts for the Times and Dr. Pusey say, I should think, that there never was much difference between the Church of England, (or the Anglican Church, as they call it, which, perhaps, is a different thing,) and the Church of Rome. Indeed, in one of those pretty novels, which the friends of Dr. Pusey have published, (the author is the Rev. Mr. Gresley, prebendary of Litchfield,) it is shown, that the man who put the martyrs to death, at Manchester, in Queen Mary's days, was a very good man, but it does seem to my simple mind, that he was very severe to burn them.

By-the-bye, I should like to know, what people who are better able to judge, than I am, think of the novels which are issued by these reverend clergymen. I hope I am not too rigid, in thinking that Mr. Paget, (he is chaplain to the Bishop of Oxford,) might better employ his valuable time, than in writing tales about young gentlemen making love in Church; and a young lady refusing to marry a person to whom she was very much attached, because he was a Dissenter. One of Mr. Paget's novels represents the people of a parish, dancing round a Maypole in spite of the Puritans; and though it is ambiguously expressed, I think he means to show, that they did so, on Sunday, in Charles the First's time. Now, I know, that Archbishop Laud used to play tennis on Sunday, (pour encourager les autres); and that he and Charles the First published a book of sports, for Sunday use, and ordered that every clergyman should read in Church an order to obey that book; which many did, and then told the people that they were to obey the order in so far as it agreed with the fourth commandment;—but still I never thought that sort of conduct quite right, and I hope that the friends of Dr. Pusey, who are said to be very holy men, (and who fast very regularly) do not intend to restore the system of Sabbath games.

You see, Sir, I wander from my point; but I hope you will excuse it—in so plain and simple a man. I am very like John Bunyan's Mr. Feeble mind; so nothing better can be expected of me. To come back to my subject, I must tell you, that I have been a great reader in my day; and that I am acquainted pretty well, with the sentiments of most of the chief Church-of-England Divines, especially of Archbishop Crannier, Sandys, Parker, Usher, and Leighton; Bishop Ridley, Hooper, Latimer, Jewell, Hall, Davenant, Reynolds, Hopkins, and Beveridge; and in these latter times, of Bishops Horsely, Sumner, and Wilson; of Bradford, Hooker and many more; and I do not remember that I ever read in the works of these venerable men, anything like what I quoted in my last letter. I told you so at the time, and only repeat it now, because I want to show very plainly what I mean, lest any of your readers should be as simple as myself.

In one of these writers, (Bishop Jewell), I find this: "Lawful succession standeth not only in the possession of place, but also and much rather, in doctrine and diligence." But now I hear from Oxford, that every episcopally ordained Minister is divinely authorized, and that none others are; in other words, as that Edinburgh Review you have quoted says, a Robert Hall or a Philip Doddridge are not true Ministers, but a Jonathan Swift, and a Laurence Sterne, are. This does not seem to me very charitable, or just. I read in the Bible that when the disciples, then some thousands in number, were scattered abroad, after the death of Stephen, they all, without ordination, went about preaching. (Acts VIII 4.) And, certainly, Apollos, that great preacher, whom St. Paul mentions, is shewn to have begun preaching without ordination; and, I think we ought not to curse whom God has not cursed, nor defy whom God has not defied. The reformers said, "how shall we not call him brother, whom God calls son?" That seems to my weak mind, very good. If I am wrong, I should like to be taught better; but till I am so taught, I shall continue to be very sorry that the learned Divines of Oxford, and their friends out here, speak so much against those who do not belong to their Church.

Now, I will go on to solicit some more explanations, on points of considerable interest. I will give you another specimen of the way in which the learned Divines, at Oxford, contradict their Church, in one of her formularies, and then ask you, or your correspondent No PUSEYITE to tell me, which I am to believe?

"Should it be asked, whence our knowledge of the truth should be derived it may be replied, first, that the writings of the Fathers, contain abundant directions how to ascertain it," Tract No. 71, page 34.

"Shall we, Christian men think to learn the knowledge of God and of ourselves, in any earthly man's book or books, sooner or better than in the Holy Scriptures, written by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost." Homilies of the Church of England. 10th Homily, 2nd Book."

And then let me inquire if the following language is not rather strange language for clergymen to choose, in which to speak of the Scriptures:—

"If the Fathers contradict each other in words, so do passages of Scripture contradict each other."—Tract 85, page 80.

Am I to choose the theology of the 4th Century or of the 16th Century—the era of the Reformation? I am told that they differ materially:—

"Compare the sayings and manner of the two schools say the editors, (Messrs. Newman and, Keble, I believe) of Froude's Remains in their preface to the second edition, "on the subject of the fasting, celibacy, religious vows, voluntary retirement and contemplation, the memory of Saints, the rites and ceremonies recommended by antiquity; * * * and, especially, on the great point of giving men divine knowledge, * * * not indiscriminately, but as men are able to bear it, there can be little doubt, that generally speaking, the tone of the 4th century is so unlike that of the sixteenth, that it is absolutely impossible for the same mind to sympathize with both. You must choose between the two lines: they are not only diverging, but contrary."

And what is the meaning of this? I hear a great deal from these new writers of the Sacraments and "the Christian Priesthood," and then I hear them say:

"Certainly the tone of the new Testament is unsacramental, and the impression it leaves on the mind, is not that of a Priesthood and its attendant system."—Tract 85, page 58.

The following passage is from these new writers on the subject of Purgatory. It leaves me in doubt whether to believe or not to believe, a doctrine which the Church of England in her Articles says is "a fond thing vainly invented," without warrant of Scripture, but rather repugnant to it.

"The Creed of Pope Pius the IV. the Romish Creed of Communion only says, 'I firmly hold a Purgatory, and that souls therein detained are aided by the prayers of the faithful' nothing being said of its being a place of punishment. Now, supposing we found ourselves in the Romish Communion, it would be a great relief that we were not bound to believe more than this vague statement, nor should we, I conceive, on account of the received interpretations about Purgatory—superadded to it, be obliged to leave our Church"—Tract No. 71, page 13.

In plain Sermons by contributors to the Tracts for the Times, it is said, "whether we can do them (the dead) good or no, we perhaps know not." And in Tract 85, they go further, as I notice they generally do, year after year, so that I don't know what they will end in. That Tract, states it as the Church's Doctrine that "there is an intermediate state, that in it the souls of the faithful are purified and grow in grace, that they pray for us, and that our prayers benefit them." Lastly, I would say, that I hope that sincerely religious people, are not to be as miserable all their days, as these writers think:

"Scripture does not set before us any sensible joy or satisfaction to be sought for, as the end of holiness."—Tract, No. 80, page 82.

Perhaps, Sir, as I hear that we are henceforth to have no right of private judgment, I am wrong in thinking about these matters at all, being an unlearned man. But I own that it seems to me, that if men understood the Apostles and Our Saviour, when they spoke, there ought to be no reason why they should not equally understand their words, when written down. At present I am in some perplexity, because I hear such different statements by different Ministers of the Church. I have only to cross the river, and then I shall hear something very different to what the Bishop preaches here. Now, I am sure, he is a good man; and I dare say, some people, as simple, as I am, have been in doubt why learned professors should disturb our weak minds by preaching doctrines different to his. Happily, I now know the reason, because it is thus written in the British Critic, for July 1841, which has been, and I suppose is still the organ of the new writers.

"It ought not to be for nothing; no, nor for anything short of some vital truth.... some truth not to be rejected without fatal error, nor embraced without radical change.... that persons of name and influence, should venture on the part of 'ecclesiastical agitators,' intrude upon the peace of the contented and raise doubts in the minds of the uncomplaining, vex the Church with controversy, alarm serious men, and interrupt the established order of things, 'set the father against the son, and the mother against her daughter,' and lead the taught to say, 'I have more understanding than my teacher.' * * * *"

* * * An object thus momentous, we believe, to be the unprotestantizing, to use an offensive but forcible word, of the national Church."

That Sir, is very plain language; and I beg to conclude by saying, that simple as I am, I understand it.

Your obedient servant,

A PROTESTANT.

NO PUSEYITE AND THE KIRK OF SCOTLAND.

* To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

SIR,—Your correspondent, who writes under the mask of "No PUSEYITE," but, whose remarks and quotations prove him to be both a head and heart Puseyite after all, labours to "show that the doctrines" (of the Oxford tract-writers) "condemned by the Reviewer," (Edinburgh,) "are not peculiar to those writers, but are the doctrines in the Reformed Church of England." Is there no true son of the Reformed Church of England in Calcutta, or this Presidency, to rise up and repel the calumny of this false and parricidal son? My own more immediate business is with another matter. Your correspondent reiterates the cant—the insolent and insufferable cant—of his party and sect, respecting "the Kirk of Scotland and other religious communities." The ten thousandth time reiterated assertion is not a subject for argument, but for indignation and contempt at the intolerable bigotry, irrationality, and uncharitableness of the assertors. It has its origin in the spirit of a low debasing ceremonial superstition; it is based on the idlest and most gratuitous assumptions; it is propagated up by the most childish and almost insane quibbles, and sophisms of Jesuitism; and is sure to terminate if God in merry interpose not in all the fierce and fiery intolerance of ANTI-CHRISTIAN POETRY.

Your correspondent is satisfied with resting his grotesquely absurd assumption on the fact, that "the Kirk of Scotland and other religious communities have repudiated episcopacy," i. e., his high Prelatic, Puseyite, or Papistical Episcopacy. Now, with such a writer, there is no use in mincing matters. I tell him therefore, plainly, that I hold it as demonstrable, on the ground of moral and rational evidence as any proposition in Euclid, that his high Prelatic Puseyite, or Papistical bishop has no more right warrant, authority, or place in the Church established by Christ and his apostles, than the Buddhist King of Burmah, or the Confucian Emperor of China. I tell him moreover, that, on the same ground, I hold it equally demonstrable, that the godly and faithful Pastor of any flock, belonging to any orthodox religious community, is a true Apostolic Bishop, or overseer of souls—a true Apostolic Bishop, in the only sense in which the term is ever used in the New Testament Scriptures.

Since, however, your correspondent is so doatingly fond of quotations from Whig Bishops, &c., I shall gratify his taste by supplying a few, which must be acknowledged to have an important bearing on this subject.

1. Wickliffe, the "morning star of the Reformation," says,—“I boldly assert one thing, viz., that in the primitive Church, on in the time of St. Paul, two orders of the Clergy were sufficient, that is, a Priest (Presbyter) and a Deacon. In like manner I affirm, that, in the time of Paul, the Presbyter and the Bishop, were names of the same office. This appears from the third chapter of the first Epistle to Timothy, and in the first chapter of the Epistle to Titus. And the same is testified by that profound Theologian Jerome.”

2. Dr. Cox, a Divine of the 16th century and member of Convocation, writes,—“Although by Scripture, as St. Hierome (Jerome) saith, Priests and Bishops be one, and therefore the one not before the other; yet Bishops as they be now, were after Priests; and therefore made of Priests,” i. e., by Priests or Presbyters.

3. Dr. Redmayne, of whom Bishop Burnet testifies, that he “was esteemed the most learned and judicious Divine of that time,” says,—“They all (Bishops and Priests) be of like beginning, and at the beginning were both one, as St. Hierome and other old authors shew by the Scriptures, wherefore one made another indifferently.”

4. Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury.—“The Bishops and Priests were at one time, and were no two things; but both one office in the beginning of Christ's religion.”

In strict accordance with these truly sound and Scriptural views of the first great Reformer of the Church of England, we find facts and practices on record that ought to minister the most withering rebuke to the self-exalted Puseyite bigots of the present day, who are their unworthy successors. In the times, both of Elizabeth, and one at least of her successors, several Acts of Parliament were passed, civilly to sanction and ratify “the ordination of such as were ordained by Presbyters only.” By these Acts, “hundreds of Ministers,” says Powell, “who had no more than Presbyterian ordination, or by ordination by Presbyters alone, without the presence of any Bishop, were confirmed in their livings as true Ministers in the Church of England.” “No Bishop in Scotland,” remarks Bishop Burnet, “during my stay in that Kingdom, ever did so much as desire any of the Presbyterians to be re-ordained.” And Archbishop Grindal also granted his Archiepiscopal License “approving and ratifying the form of Ordination,” by a Scottish Presbytery, of Mr. Morrison, a Scots Divine; and giving him commission “throughout the whole Diocese of Canterbury, to celebrate divine offices, to minister sacraments, &c.”

These quotations, which finely contrast with the senseless bigotry of “No PUSEYITE,” and his sectarian associates, I leave to him to digest at his leisure—promising him a fresh entertainment so soon as his appetite for such substantial food returns.

Thursday morning. ANTI-PUSEYITE.

SINGAPORE.

The Erigone, French Frigate, Commandant CECILLE had left Macao on the 5th of last month, for the Coast of Cochin China; accounts having been received that the King of that Country, who it seems is now at war with Cambodia and Siam, had seized and condemned to death, five French Missionaries;—on the receipt of which intelligence Captain CECILLE it is said, immediately set out for the Coast of Cochin China, either to procure their release, or satisfaction for their martyrdom, if unfortunately they have been executed.—Strait Times, June 6.

THE LATE RIGHT REV. DR. DUBOIS, BISHOP OF NEW YORK,

This mild and saint-like prelate had, at the time of his lamented decease, attained his seventy-ninth year, and was in possession of his mental faculties to the last: he was sixteen of those years, Bishop of New York and fifty five years a priest of God! What an opportunity was his to effect the great objects of the Gospel—to spread the rays of Christian light through a community which received it through his agency as through the specially created of heaven's luminaries. Thus has another light disappeared from the ecclesiastical horizon—not, however, without shedding its departing lustre on the surrounding constellations.

Bishop Dubois was born in Paris on the 24th of August, 1764; in September, 1787, he was ordained priest. The French revolution breaking out soon after, he emigrated to the United States in 1791. He arrived in Richmond, Virginia, in the month of July of that year, and was most kindly received by the illustrious patriots of that period—the Washingtons, the Henrys, the Randolphs, and Marshalls of Virginia, to whom he came recommended by letters from General Lafayette. During two years he continued among them, improving himself in English, and at the same time giving lessons in French to some of those distinguished families, whilst he administered the consolations of religion to the Catholics of that vicinity. In 1794 the venerable Archbishop Carroll appointed him pastor of a congregation in Frederick, Maryland. In 1808 he founded Mount St. Mary's College, now one of the most popular and prosperous literary institutions in the country. In the same year he was charged with the superintendence of a community of religious ladies, at St. Joseph's, who had taken the resolution to consecrate themselves to the service of God and of the poor for God's sake. They were but three or four, having the late amiable and saintly Mrs. St-ton of this city for their mother superior. This mustard seed Bishop Dubois was appointed to plant and protect, and, like his college, he lived to see it become a tree, extending its branches to every part of the country—for who has heard of the orphan, and not heard of the “Sisters of Charity”?

In 1826 Dr. Dubois was appointed Bishop of New York, and consecrated on the 29th of October of that year, and died consequently in the 16th year of his episcopacy, and the 55th of his priesthood.

He was a faithful and laborious missionary, walking in devotedness to his sacred ministry, and his God; and carrying with him, as he passed from youth to old age, through a long and spotless life, the esteem and veneration of all who knew him. His death was like his life—a beautiful and profound lesson of edification to those who had the melancholy consolation of witnessing it.

MISCELLANEA.

"THE MONTH OF MARY."—We have already given a few extracts from the little work published under this title. The following passage, extracted from the above publication, will be found appropriate for the ensuing month of May, which is, by excellence, the "month of Mary."—"The month of Mary originated in Italy, and the month of May was selected in preference to any other from a wish to change a season of dissipation and amusement into one of instruction and devotion. From Italy it passed into France, and other countries of Europe, where it has been found productive of the most beneficial results. Within the last few years it was introduced into the United States, where it has been practised by numbers of the faithful servants of Mary, who eagerly profited by this opportunity of testifying their love and gratitude to the Holy Mother of God, and of cultivating the virtues which would assimilate them to the perfect model of Christians. On the evening before the first of May, the person who unite to practise will assemble before an altar (if practised in a church), over which is an image of the Blessed Virgin, which should be adorned with flowers and other suitable decorations. The Litany of the Blessed Virgin is either said or sung. After this the Meditation is slowly read by one. The Meditation read each evening should be carefully impressed on the memory, and made the subject of half or at least a quarter of an hour's reflection on the following morning. A resolution to practise the particular virtue which it inculcates should be the fruit of this morning exercise. If possible, Mass should be heard each day, and the ordinary devotions to the Mother of God practised with more than ordinary fervour and exactness. As the object of this devotion is to eradicate vice from the heart, and plant in its stead the seed of heavenly virtue, each one should prepare for the exercises of this month by approaching the sacraments of Penance and the Holy Eucharist. If that be not possible, let him excite his heart to sincere contrition for having offended God, and resolve to take the earliest opportunity of being reconciled with Him. Each one should propose to overcome some vice or failing to which he is most particularly subject or inclined, or to acquire some virtue of which he may stand in need, or to which the grace of God may prompt him to aspire. All the exercises of the month should be specially directed to attain this object."

ROME.—The Most Rev. Dr. Joseph Palma, General of the Carmelites, has been chosen Bishop in the Kingdom of Naples.

I regret to state that the Rev. Mr. Dowling, some days since, had a severe attack of apoplexy in Rome. It is to be hoped that it will not have a fatal effect. The Most Rev. Father Eugene, General of the Capuchins, departed this life on the 28th ultimo at the Convent of the Conception, Piazza Barbarina, in Rome. He was greatly and deservedly regretted.

There was a time when, if you but mentioned the existence of a Jesuit the hair of the Ereter Gazette would stand on end. Now our contemporary observes their introduction into Canada, without raising a single bristle in behalf of true Protestantism. Puseyism has changed the heart and eyes of our learned friend.—Western Times.

DUMAS IN ITALY.

RELIGIOUS CONFRATERNITY AT FLORENCE.

"Sometimes in the midst of a cavatina or a pas de-deux, a bell with a sharp, shrill, exhorting sound will be heard; it is the bell della misericordia. Listen; if it sound but once, it is for some ordinary accident; if twice, for one of a serious nature; if it sounds three times, it is a case of death. If you look around, you will see a slight stir in some of the boxes, and it will often happen that the person you have been speaking to, if a Florentine, will excuse himself for leaving you, will quietly take his hat and depart. You inquire what that bell means, and why it produces so strange an effect. You are told it is the bell della misericordia, and that he with whom you were speaking is a brother of the order.

"This brotherhood of mercy is one of the noblest institutions in the world. It was founded in 1244 on occasion of the frequent pestilences which at that period desolated the town, and it has been perpetuated to the present day, without any alteration, except in its details—with none in its purely charitable spirit. It is composed of seventy-two brothers, called chiefs of the watch, who are each in service four months in the year. Of these seventy-two brothers, thirty are priests, fourteen gentlemen, and twenty-eight artists. To these, who represent the aristocratic classes and the liberal arts, are added 500 labourers and workmen, who may be said to represent the people.

"The seat of the brotherhood is in the place del Duomo. Each brother has there, marked with his own name, a box enclosing a black robe like that of the penitents, with openings only for the eyes and mouth, in order that his good actions may have the further merit of being performed in secret. Immediately that the news of any accident or disaster is brought to the brother who is upon guard, the bell sounds its alarm, once, twice, or thrice, according to the gravity of the case; and at the sound of the bell every brother, wherever he may be, is bound to retire at the instant, and hasten to the rendezvous. There he learns what misfortune or what suffering has claimed his pious offices; he puts on his black robe and a broad hat, takes the taper in his hand, and goes forth where the voice of misery has called him. If it is some wounded man, they bear him to the hospital; if the man is dead, to chapel: the nobleman and the day labourer, clothed with the same robe, support together the same luter, and the link which unites these two extremes of society is some sick pauper, who knowing neither, is praying equally for both. As when these brothers of mercy have quitted it house, the children whose father they have carried out, or the wife whose husband they have borne away, have but to look around them, and always, some worm-eaten piece of furniture, there will found a flous alms, deposited by an unknown hand.

The Grand-Duke himself is a member of this fraternity, and I have been assured that more than once the sound of that melancholy bell, he has cloit himself in the uniform of charity, and penetra unknown, side by side with a day-labourer, to bed's head of some dying wretch, and that this sence had afterwards been detected only by the s he had left behind."

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1843.

[Vol. V.]

THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD AND DOCTOR PUSEY.

● In a late number of our Journal, we demonstrated, that in the constitution of the English Protestant Church, there exists no competent tribunal to set at rest, by a decision to which English Protestants will feel bound to assent internally, any doctrinal controversy whatever, much less a controversy so complex and so formidable as that which relates to Puseyism. When we last touched on this subject, we never imagined, that the Overland Mail was then actually conveying to us, one of the most felicitous illustrations we could have desired, of the justness of the position, which we had laid down. According to the accounts given by the public journals just received, it appears, that on account of a sermon lately preached by Dr. Pusey before the University of Oxford, in which that distinguished Gentleman openly advocated the Catholic doctrine on the Eucharist, a sentence of prohibition to preach for two years at Oxford, has been passed against him by the Vice-Chancellor of the University. Now, in our opinion, it is easy to make it evident, that the proceeding just referred to, instead of contributing to terminate the grand controversy by which the English Protestant Church is, at present, shaken to its very centre, will, on the contrary, confer signal advantage on the cause advocated by Dr. Pusey and his adherents. For, it is admitted, in the very journals which have recorded the event we speak of, that the Vice-Chancellor pronounced on his own sole responsibility the prohibition of which Dr. Pusey complains. Neither are we left in the dark, as to the circumstances, which made it necessary for the Vice-Chancellor to undertake alone so heavy a responsibility. In truth, a better reason than that assigned for his acting thus, or one more gratifying to Dr. Pusey and his friends could not have been alleged. The fact, then, is, that the Committee of heresy, as the tribunal which sat upon Dr. Pusey's case, is oddly enough designated, disagreed among themselves on the subject at issue, so that at the close of their deliberations, the poor Vice-Chancellor was just as wise as he was before these most sapient Doctors began their inquiry. It would have been too bad, if the mountain in labor were to bring forth only a mouse, and the Vice-Chancellor, to escape the ridicule, such a finis to the labors of the Committee could not fail to produce, ad perpetuam rei memoriam, and for the terror of the naughty Pupils, who are supposed to favor Dr. Pusey's principles, solemnly interdicts Dr. Pusey to preach for two years before the University. Now, we appeal to any impartial reflecting man, and we ask, what moral effect will this prohibition have on the public mind, and more especially on the minds of the numerous learned persons who, it is publicly stated, are already strongly pre-disposed in favor of Dr. Pusey's opinions? Is it not evident, from what has been premised, that, at best, the sentence passed on Dr. Pusey only shows, that on the points of his sermon which were made the subject of complaint, Dr. Pusey entertains one opinion and the Vice-Chancellor another. The merits of their respective opinions, the reflecting and educated portion of the public will decide upon, not by a reference to the particular offices these Gentlemen may occupy in the University, but to the well known estimate which learned men form of the research and mental capabilities for investigating religious truth, for which each of the Disputants may be distinguished. If this be the criterion, and it is certainly the only fair one in the present case, by which Dr. Pusey and the Vice-Chancellor will be judged, we may safely affirm, that Dr. Pusey has but little cause to fear the result. We may here remark, that according to the report given by the English Papers of the late proceedings at Oxford, the Vice-Chancellor openly violated a principle not only of British justice, but even of that natural rectitude, which the inquisition itself professed to reverence. It is a recognised maxim of British and indeed of natural equity, that when the tribunal appointed to inquire into any offence, is divided in opinion, as to the guilt or innocence of the party accused, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of such doubt, and has a right to be acquitted. Now the British Journals state, that the Committee of Heresy were thus divided in Dr. Pusey's case, and yet the Vice-Chancellor proceeds as summarily against Dr. Pusey, as if the Committee had been unanimous in their condemnation of that Gentleman. It should be remembered also, that Dr. Pusey in his defence, offered to produce from the works of St. Cyril the very words, for the use of which he has been censured. It would be certainly no more than what justice required, that an opportunity of doing what he proposed to do in his defence should have been afforded to Dr. Pusey. For, had this impartial course been adopted, then the question to be pronounced upon, would have been reduced to a very narrow compass. If Dr. Pusey could not show, that his words on the Eucharist were the "ipsissima verba" of St. Cyril, his cause was evidently lost. But, if, on the contrary, he proved satisfactorily that they were, then it would be for the Committee to decide, whether it was competent for them to censure a doctrine, which was publicly taught by one of the most venerable Fathers of the primitive Church, who during life was honoured by the Catholic World, as one of the greatest Doctors of the Church, and after death was venerated as a sainted personage by the Greek and Latin Churches, as a most Holy Pastor, whose words and writings were dictated solely by an inflexible and unchangeable love for apostolic truth. Yes, even in Protestant Oxford, such was the veneration in which St. Cyril was held, that not very long since a splendid edition of his works was printed at the University Press, under the editorial care of the learned Dr. Mills. Supported by an authority to whose fidelity in the explication of religious truth the Churches of the East and West have given such glorious testimony, Dr. Pusey might well console himself under the puny, impotent censure of a few individuals, whose names, but for Dr. Pusey, would never have been heard of, outside the precincts of the University. Dr. Pusey has, however, one obligation which in justice to himself, he should at once nobly discharge. To his friends and his enemies, it is as clear as the noon-day Sun, that he is withheld only by some very slender hair-breadth threads from the Catholic Communion. We are even willing to believe, that he acts as he does, under the impression, that thus he will eventually eradicate more successfully heresy and schism from England. But he can hesitate no longer. The time is come, when the honor due to God and his holy religion, when what he owes to his own high character for learning and virtue, demand, that Dr. Pusey should emulate the generous example of the Spencers, the Sibthorps and Smiths, and return to the embrace of the Father of the Faithful, of him to whom Christ committed his Lambs and his Sheep, his people and their Pastors.

CONVERSIONS.

The Rev. Mr. Zubibarne has received into the Church and baptized three Mussulmen. The same excellent Clergyman states, that within three days from the date of his letter, he had arranged to baptize and marry a Mahomedan woman.

Also at one of the Bengal Military Stations, two men and one woman, Protestants, have been recently admitted into the Catholic Communion and received conditional Baptism.

DUM-DUM.—A body of Artillery of about two-hundred men left Dum-Dum, this week for Agra. Previously to their departure, a large number of the Catholics of this party prepared themselves, by devoutly approaching to Confession and Communion, for the dangers which attend on travelling in this country, and which during the last year consigned so many of H. M. 62nd and 50th Regiments prematurely to a watery grave.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.—We have been favored with a view of a beautiful Italian Painting of the Madonna and the Child Jesus, presented by Rev. Dr. Backhaus to the Loretto House. It is nearly four feet in height and will appear to great advantage as an Altarpiece in the Holy Virgin's Chapel in St. Thomas' Church.

THE LATE T. O'MEARA, ESQ.

On Wednesday last a Solemn Office and Mass were celebrated at the Cathedral, the Bishop officiating, for the repose of the soul of the late T. O'Meara, Esq. of Lisaniska, near Dublin. This last tribute was paid to his lamented relative, at the instance of Capt. Fitzimon, 29th Regt. N. I., step-Son to Mr. O'Meara. In Ireland Mr. O'Meara, for many years occupied a prominent place in society. In early life he was distinguished for a buoyancy of spirits and good humour combined with refined wit and fascinating talent for the narration of anecdote, which made him the delight of the society in which he mingled. Soon after he had attained to man's estate, he married Mrs. Fitzimon, the mother of the above-mentioned gallant Officer. Mr. O'Meara had seen Ireland when she exulted in 1782, in the achievement of the independence of her Parliament. He had been the intimate friend and associate of Grattan, Curran and of all the leading and gifted orators and patriots of that memorable period. In the elegant life of the Rt. Hon. J. P. Curran written by his Son, there is an exquisitely beautiful letter addressed by Mr. Curran to Mr. O'Meara, on the occasion of the birth of Mr. O'Meara's eldest Son, now a distinguished Barrister in Ireland, for whom Mr. Curran was requested to stand God-Father at Baptism. In his youth, and for some time after his marriage, Mr. O'Meara was a Church of England Protestant. But the saintly conversation and example of the pious and accomplished Lady whom he married, soon made a deep impression on his warm and generous heart, and induced him to direct his great natural talents to a calm enquiry on the important question of the true Church. The result was such as always occurs, when similar dispositions are brought to the investigation of religious truth. Mr. O'Meara became a most zealous edifying Catholic, and was received into the Church by the late venerable Archdeacon Lube of Dublin. Mr. O'Meara never, even for a day, forgot the mercy which God showed to him, by uniting him to the one Fold of the one Shepherd. In gratitude for this great favor, he made a rule, that every evening when the Family assembled together for Night Prayers, all present should join, in offering up a special Prayer for the good Priest, by whom he had been admitted into the bosom of the Catholic Church. His zeal for the dissemination of piety among the poor of his neighbourhood was most commendable—When about twenty years since, the Sovereign Pontiff proclaimed a solemn Jubilee for the Church of God, Mr. O'Meara, in order that the poor in his vicinity should, without inconvenience, receive all the advantages of that Holy Institution, invited to his seat, at Glencullen, several of the most zealous Priests of the Metropolis, and actually converted into oratories, for the time, every apartment in the House, to enable the multitudes who came in crowds to confess and receive the Holy Communion, to enjoy every facility to comply with their religious duties. It is a fact, in the memory of him who pays this small tribute to departed worth, that on the occasion just alluded to, it was necessary to affix ladders to the windows of the Upper-Rooms, for the men to approach the oratories in which their confessors were officiating, without disturbing those, who were similarly engaged on the first floor. With all this zeal for religion, Mr. O'Meara never ceased to cherish the exalted social qualities, which endeared him so much to all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He was in consequence beloved and esteemed equally by men of the most adverse political opinions. In effect, he was at the same time the friend and companion of the Marquess of Anglesey, of Lord Cloncurry, Lord Plunket and Lord Meath, whilst he was closely allied with the Liberator of Ireland, by the marriage of his Step-Son, Christopher Fitzimon, then M. P. for the County of Dublin, to Miss O'Connell, the eldest and favorite daughter of Ireland's noblest Son. His last end was worthy of his honored life. With all the calmness which a good conscience inspires, he humbly and devoutly prepared himself by receiving the last Sacraments, to undergo with Christian fortitude the final struggle of human nature, and after a few days illness resigned his soul into the hands of his Creator. Agreeably to his desire, his remains were interred in the vaults of the Catholic Metropolitan Church of Dublin.—Requiescat in Pace!

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

The first passage by St. Cyprian, to which, Mr. Editor, I wish to draw attention, is to be found in his book, explaining the Lord's prayer; (St. Cyprian lib. de oratione Dominica) wherein, among other things he speaks thus: "Ita contra timendum est, et orandum, ne dum quis abstentus separatur a Christi corpore, procul remaneat a salute, comminante ipso et dicente: Nisi ederitis carnem Filii hominis, et liberitis sanguinem ejus, non habebitis vitam in vobis." Et ideo panem nostrum, id est, Christum, dari nobis quotidie petimus, ut qui in Christo manemus, et vivimus, a sanctificatione ejus et corpore non recedamus." Which means, "So on the contrary it is to be feared, and we should pray, lest a person, who by abstaining (from holy Communion) remains separated from the body of Christ, were also to remain debarred his salvation, as He Himself threatens, when He says: Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life within you. And on this account we petition daily, that our bread, that is, Christ, may be given us, in order that we, who remain and live in Christ, may not recede from His sanctification and His body."

A man, who is not "all serpent" in his composition, a man, not yet determined, of using the writings of the Holy Fathers like looking-glasses, wherein to see his own pre-conceived opinions reflected; in short a man not yet base enough, to deny Christianity, a more sublime, a more divine extension, than one commensurate only within the reach of his own poor, limited senses; such a man, I say, cannot fail to see at once that Calvinism finds no credit with St. Cyprian and his times; to be convinced that the Catholic tenet, which teaches, the Eucharistic bread to be transubstantiated into the body of Christ is that, which enjoys his support and that of the Church in the third century. In fact the expressions of the Saint are so exact and so strictly guarded, that it would be almost impossible for any believer in transubstantiation to deliver the doctrine contained in this word by a happier circumlocution, or by one less liable to misinterpretation. The holy martyr of Carthage does not say with Luther: "Therefore we petition daily, that our bread, wherein Christ is contained, may be given us," no, but at once: "We petition, that our bread, which is Christ, may be given us;" much less he enters into Calvin's views, by saying: "we petition, that our bread, which is a representation of Christ may be given us," but... "that our bread, which is Christ may be given us," a manner of expressing himself as completely Catholic as it could be. A Calvinistic shadowist may, I grant, go as far as to say, that a person by "abstaining (from the Lord's Supper) may remain debarred the grace of salvation, as Christ Himself threatens when He says: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, you shall not have life within you;" meaning all the while by flesh and blood, nothing more than a figure of it. But nobody except a thoroughbred Catholic is able to say, what St. Cyprian says: "A man by abstaining (from holy communion) remains separated from the body of Christ, and, by consequence, remains debarred His salvation, as He Himself threatens when he says: "Unless you, etc." Whenever a Protestant figurist does not choose to take the Sacrament, he is indeed separated from the commemorative bread and wine, but I am sure he would repudiate it, as savouring of Popery, to say that by staying away from the Sacrament he remains separated from the body of Christ! Calvinists say, that it is the faith of the receiver, which gives all the efficacy to the sacramental bread and wine in order to salvation, but it is the doctrine of St. Cyprian that, although the true faith be an indispensable requisite for justification, it is not indeed the faith of the receiver, but the true and real body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which gives to the Sacrament its sublime dignity and heavenly efficacy; as it is neither the eye of the beholder, which clothes the noon-day with such brilliancy, but the bright light of the Sun himself. For he does not say: "A person abstaining from the Sacrament, that is to say, from mere bread and wine, is debarred from his salvation," no, but "he, who abstains (from partaking of the sacred rites of the Lord's Supper) remains separated from the body of Christ, and then by consequence from his salvation, because the flesh and blood of the Saviour are the life-giving food of the faithful. Such is the faith and doctrine of the Church of the Lamb of God, in our days, and such it will remain to the end of time in spite of the howlers of hell, and the exertions of heresies. But could not the whole of the above passage of Cyprian be understood figuratively, by saying, that "Christ" means here nothing more than the justification procured for us by the Saviour giving up for our ransom his body and blood, and which grand effect is communicated to us by partaking of bread and wine, and making a commemoration of the Redeemer's passion and death? I answer: No. First, because the simple import of the language used by that Holy Father does not permit us to make figures of substances; secondly, because it would be very preposterous, to explain his writings and intentions by certain heretical systems, which did not start into existence till thirteen hundred years after them; thirdly, because he himself evidently disclaims such an interpretation by distinguishing well between the Eucharistic bread and wine which constitute the exterior part of the Blessed Sacrament, and Christ himself, the body of Christ, the blood of Christ, which supplies its substance; and our sanctification in which consists its spiritual effect. For he says: "And on this account we petition daily, that our bread, which is Christ, may be given us, in order, that we... may not recede from His sanctification and His body." With such strong testimonies of the early Father, staring in their eyes, I do not at all wonder Mr. Editor, that Protestants are so very eager in crying down their authority. In this, the

are at least so far consistent, as it is evidently impossible to reconcile their predilection for a figurative Eucharist, and other errors equally gross, with a due respect for a venerable antiquity. Martin Luther (the lying martyrman Fox calls him: Saint Martin Luther) gave them an unequivocal example, when he cursed and burned at Wittemberg the copy of the corpus juris canonici. Either his glaring, heretical disobedience to the Holy See, or the respect due to its collected ordinances should be prostrated. They could not possibly abide together. St. Cyprian in his 54th letter, to Cornelius, has another passage, which cannot square with any thing, save the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation; except a person were pre-determined upon thinking that all antiquity made a show-thing of religion, just as comedians do, whose potations and banquets on the stage, consist in empty bowls, and paste-board viands, and whose fortresses and canons and gardens and rivers and houses &c. &c., are no better than canvass and paint. Unless, I say, a man have made up his mind to view the most sacred and sublime institutions of Christ's holy religion, as mere outward shows and empty appearances, and thinks the whole world did and ought to do yet the same, it will be impossible for him to mistake for a moment the Catholic sense of the following words, by the great martyr of Carthage: "How can we, he says, teach them or stimulate them to shed their blood in the confession of the name of Christ, if, on the eve of the fight we deny them the blood of Christ?" The Saint speaks here of those Christians, who had yielded their faith to the fear of persecution, of those, who after having fallen, returned to their former obedience to Holy Church, and repented. According to the ancient discipline they were treated with great rigour, and among other punishments were debarred the use of the holy mysteries, often till the end of their lives. St. Cyprian is anxious to mitigate this severity, in the instance of another persecution threatening the Christians; and he is of opinion, that when those, who had fallen are again to enter the lists as champions of the name of Christ, are again in danger of losing their lives in the glorious contest; they should not be debarred from partaking of that blood, which affords at once a sublime example, and the necessary strength to the combatants of Christ. It would be, what the Latins call "actum agere", viz. demonstrating that the moon is the moon, if I were further to elucidate this testimony of St. Cyprian, for it explains itself. Hence, remarking only, that as he does certainly teach and exhort the Christians to shed their blood not in figure, but in substance, for the confession of the name of Christ, so he will have desire, for their spiritual fortitude, not a mere emblem but the real substance of the blood of Christ; I pass on to a few more testimonies, to shew that Transubstantiation was, if not in word, certainly in fact, no novelty at all to St. Cyprian and his times. Writing to the Tiberites, who were in trouble on account of their faith, he thus admonishes them: "The soldiers of Christ must prepare themselves with a strong faith; and consider, that for this purpose they drink every day the blood of Christ; that they themselves also may be able to shed their blood for the sake of Christ." In his 63d letter to Cecilius, he speaks thus: "As by common wine the mind is unloosened; the soul is relaxed, and all grief is set aside; so, by drinking the blood of the Lord and the life-giving cup, should the remembrance of the old man be put aside, and our former worldly behaviour be forgotten, and the melancholy and grieving heart, formerly oppressed by the weight of sins, should rebound in joy at the divine indulgence." So much about St. Cyprian and the faith of his cotemporaries. This too will confirm every sincere Christian in his resolution of viewing the charge of Protestants against the Real Presence, against Transubstantiation as being a novelty introduced, according to some, immediately after the four first pure ages of christianity; according to others, in the 9th century, according to a third class, in the 12th century, according to still wiser heads, at a period not quite known to us of viewing it, I say, not only with suspicion and distrust, but as a downright piece of imposture and falsehood; in fact as a tenet worthy to be supported only by the rude, uncharitable declamations of mountebanks, of illiterate gospel-preaching mechanics, of religious quacks and swindlers, et hoc genus omne. A charge which, besides its having a very disreputable sort of relationship to that which swore away the life of the Son of God, (for in this also the witnesses did not agree together. Mark, XIV. 56.) is a clear sign of either disgraceful ignorance of Church-history, or of an infernal spirit ever ready to sacrifice known truth at the shrine of party-spirit and bigotry. But now, Mr. Editor, let us go further and search in the works of the ecclesiastical writers who adorn the following age of the Church; and see, whether they were or were not acquainted with our present Catholic doctrines anent the Blessed Eucharist.

In effect, the man of honour, in the Christian acceptation of the word, is the most moral being that can possibly be conceived on earth.

He is submissive to the laws, and loyal to his prince; because the laws emanate from God; and his religion, which has had many martyrs, has never yet produced a rebel. The believer in a future life reverences fidelity, national honour, the sanctity of an oath: he is too firm to yield to the soothing insinuations of flattery, or the stormy denunciations of unjust power; he will not, to increase his celebrity, rouse the turbulent spirit of party, or endeavour, by intrigues, to receive on his inclined head the golden shower which favoritism sometimes unwillingly lets fall on the unworthy. Generous to his enemies, and candid with his adversaries, he is just without severity, magnanimous without pride, and humble without meanness. Such a one is for his fellow men, according to the beautiful comparison of the Scripture, as a projecting rock, in the shade of which we find protection from the burning heat of day.* Happy the wife, the friend, the children, of such a character! His merit will distinguish them and they shall reflect his rays, as the planets reflect the light of the solar beams. The people who admire him will long propose him as an example to their children; and his posterity shall be loved by God and honoured by men, on account of his virtue.

But, I repeat it, Christian morality can alone produce men of this mould and perfection of character.

Our anti-Christian philosophers may, indeed, tell us, that, without attaining such a moral elevation as this, we have among us a multitude of honest men, who enjoy an honourable reputation, and who frankly acknowledge that they have not a particle of religion in their composition.

If these men really are what they appear to be, it is still true that their virtue has a bad foundation. But how hollow are many of such characters! How many magistrates have been regarded as blameless, until the indiscretion of a suitor, or the vindictiveness of an intriguer, raised up the veil which concealed their private lives! How many parents have been cited as models, until some disgraceful weakness, accidentally made public, made them the objects of public contempt! How many men of rank have passed for personifications of honour, until their political, philosophical, literary, or martial probity, yielded to the temptation of wealth! And yet, these men may have had principles of an honourable tendency. This is both possible and probable: but the seductions of pleasure were too irresistible; the prospect of gain was too alluring; the passions, leagued with the senses, were too impetuous; the sea overflowed with fury; no stars were to be seen in the firmament, and virtue was tossed to and fro, like a bark that has lost its rudder. What could you expect from its struggle with the winds, the waves, and rocks? Shipwreck; and it was so.

"But have we not conscience?" says a sect of recent origin, which unknowingly enthrones an idolatry, as old as the Roman empire. Conscience is God, and we acknowledge no other.

Conscience is, indeed, a faithful counsellor; but it is the excess of absurdity to make way for its elevation on the vacant pedestals of idolatry, by dethroning God. Conscience, without religion, is liable to slumber at its post, like a tired sentinel. The distant glitter of gold often acts on it, as the rustling of the foliage and the bubbling of the rivulet on the wearied senses:—it casts it into a state of drowsiness, in which all its energy is dormant. It is true, that as soon as crime is consummated, and honour lost, or the scaffold prepared, it awakes us with terrific alarm, and makes the guilty heart bleed with its scorpion bites: but if it was strong enough to make Judas hang himself after his base treason, it was not able to prevent him from selling his God! So true it is, that religion alone can ensure the constant practice of our moral duties because it is their source; and isolated morality ordinarily ends by sinking under the weight of evil, or making a secret compact with vice, or, amid the bitter disenchantments which are so thickly scattered through life, imitating the dying Brutus and blaspheming virtue.

PRESBYTERY AND THE COVENANT.

"Their [i. e., the Presbyterians and Independents,] second way of fighting against the officers of the Church will be by railing and libels. I may seem to commit an absurdity, I confess, in making this a different head from their preaching and praying. But, considering that they speak from the Press as well as from the Pulpit, and in other places besides the Church, we must admit of this distinction.

"And for this way of opposition, by virulent, unseemly language, odious terms, and vilifying words, none ever improved their talent to such an height of perfection.

"The Reverend Fathers of the Church were the chief mark at which their virulence was levelled: and for these, the more moderate of their opposers were contented to call them by no worse names than whited walls, hypocrites, painted sepulchres, scribes and pharisees, implacable enemies of godliness, limbs of anti-christ, retainers to the whore of Babylon. But others, who had a greater measure of this gift, bestowed upon them higher titles, as devils incarnate, murderers of souls, dumb dogs; and some, that would tip their virulence with more than ordinary wit, have thought fit to call them dumb dogs that could only bark at God's people. * * * *

"And let men know, that, notwithstanding the disguise of a whining expression, and a demure face, there is no sort of men breathing, who taste blood with so good a relish, and who having the power of the sword to second their power of Godliness, would wade deeper in the slaughter of their brethren, and with the most savage, implacable violence, tumble all into confusion, ruin and desolation.

"The quicksilver of Geneva is a thing of a violent operation, and cannot lie still long, but it will force its vent through the bowels of a nation; and God grant, that it may be thoroughly purged out, before it becomes mortal and incurable. * * * *

I tell you, that it was the treacherous cant and misapplication of those words, popery, superstition, reformation, tender conscience, persecution, moderation, and the like, as they have been used by a pack of designing hypocrites, (who believed not one word of what they said, and laughed within themselves at all who did,) that put this poor Church into such a flame heretofore as burnt it down to the ground, and will infallibly do the same to it again, if the providence of God and the prudence of man does not timely interpose between her and the villainous arts of such incendiaries. * * * *

"And to give you one terrible instance, how far the minds of men are capable of being canted and seduced into the most violent and outrageous courses, as they are managed by some pulpit impostors, you may all remember that the great engine of battery, which broke and beat down our Church was the great Scotch covenant. But how did it do this execution? Why, by those spiritual bontefeus calling this wretched thing from the pulpit to the deceived rabble the covenant of God. And so strangely had they beat this notion into their addle head that there was not one text in the whole book of God about the covenant between God and the Israelites, in which the brainless rout did not immediately, upon the bare clink of the words, conclude the Scotch covenant to be meant and pointed at thereby. Such were all the texts in which God calls upon the Israelites to keep his covenant, and all the texts in which he reproaches and expostulates with them for having broke and been false to his covenant. In all which the stupid schismatical herd, by the help of those hypocrites, those perverters of scripture, and murderers of souls, (if ever there were any such upon the face of the earth,) I say by the fraudulent and fallacious infusions of those seducers, the abused vulgar reckoned, the Scotch covenant, by clear and irrefragable evidence of scripture, bound inviolably fast upon their consciences. And can anything in nature be imagined more profane and impious, more absurd, and, indeed, romantic, than such a persuasion; and yet, as impious and absurd as it was, it bore down all before it, and overturned the equallest and best framed government in the world. So that it was not for nothing that a sanctified dunce of the faction compared the covenant to the ark of God, brought into the temple of Dagon, and Dagon thereupon falling prostrate before it. For thus says he: "Nothing wicked or superstitious could stand before this other ark of God, the covenant, but presently upon the bringing of it into England, Popery fell down before it, arbitrary power fell down before it, prelacy fell down before it; prelacy fell down and gave up the ghost at the feet of it." And why did not the man of allusion, while his head was hot and his hand was in, add also, that sense and reason, law and religion, justice and common honesty, and in a word, all that was enjoined by God, or approved by man, fell down and gave up the ghost before it? For it is certain, that wheresoever the very breath of the covenant came, it blasted and consumed all these.*

"And now, was it not high time, think you, to tie up the tongues of those seducers, who could arm mere cant and nonsense to such a formidable opposition to the government, as to make one despicable word, villainously misapplied, and sottishly misunderstood, a fatal besom of destruction, to sweep away all before it, civil or sacred, legal or established, both in Church and State?

* In illustration of Dr. South's remarks, I give the following extract of a letter from one of the WORTHIES of the Scottish Martyrology of the 17th century, it is addressed to John Lord of Kirkendbright, and dated Feb. 20th, 1619.

"MY NOBLE LORD,—I have received yours, and do acknowledge my obligation to your Lordship is redoubled. I long much to hear what decision followed on that debate concerning patronages. Upon the most exact trial, they would be found a great plague to the Kirk, an obstruction to the propagation of religion. I have reason to hope that such a wise and well constituted parliament will be loath to lay such a yoke upon the Churches, of so little advantage to any man, and so prejudicial to the work of God, as hath been many times represented. Certainly the removing it were the stopping the way of Simony, except we will apprehend that whole Presbyteries will be bribed for patronage. I can say no more but what Christ said to the Pharisees. It was not so from the beginning; the Primitive Church know nothing of it.

But as for their pernicious disposition to a rupture among sectaries, I can say nothing to them: only this, I conclude their judgement sleeps not: shall they escape? shall they break the covenant and be delivered? &c. Ezek. xvii 16, &c.; which I dare apply to England, I hope, without wresting of scripture. And therefore thus saith the Lord God, As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it "Certainly there can be no truly pious, or indeed so much as truly English heart, but must bleed, when it looks back upon that abomination of desolation, which was seen in all our holy places in those days and consider, both by whom all this was brought upon them, and how. That the best and surest bulwark of protestantism, the glory of the reformation, and the express image of the purest antiquity, should be run down and laid in the dust by the meanest of cheats, managed by the worst of men. This has been done once, and God grant that we may never see it done again. * * * *

That these ecclesiastical deputies of Christ [the Presbyterians and other Sectaries] have the cognizance and decisive power in all spiritual causes, and in all civil also, in ordine ad spiri-

But when religion is in danger, (of which they themselves are to be the sole judges,) they may engage in an oath or confederacy against the standing laws of the country which they are actually of and belong to, and then plead, that they cannot in conscience turn to the obedience required by those laws, because of the obligation of the said oath.

"And now, if this be the grand charter and these the fundamental laws of Christ's kingdom, and the execution thereof be committed wholly to a sort of ecclesiastics, (and those made such by none but themselves,) it will in good earnest behave kings and princes to turn their thrones into tool of repentance; for, upon these terms, I know not where else they can expect to sit safe. As for the late troubles and confusions caused in these poor kingdoms by the same rebellious ferment, and carried on much more by black coats than by red, we shall find that they all moved by the spring of a few specious, abused words: such as the spirit, Christian liberty, the power of godliness, the sceptre and kingdom of Jesus Christ, and the like. * * * *

will, I recompense on his own head, &c. This covenant was made with Nebuchadnezzar; the matter was civil, but the tie was religious; wherefore the Lord owns it as his covenant, because God's name was invoked and interposed in it: and he calls England to witness. England's covenant was not made with Scotland only, but with the high and mighty God, principally for the reformation of his house, and it was received in the most solemn manner that I have heard; so that they may call it God's covenant, both formally and materially; and the Lord did second the making of it with more than ordinary success to that nation. Now, it is manifestly despised and broken in the sight of all nations; therefore it remains that the Lord avenge the quarrel of his covenant. England hath had to do with the Scots, French, Danes, Picts, Normans and Romans; but they never had such a party to deal with as the Lord of armies, pleading for the violation of his covenant, &c. Englishmen shall be spectacles to all nations, for a broken covenant when the living God swears, As I live, even the covenant that he hath despised, and the oath that he hath broken, will I recompense on his own head. There is no place left for doubting. Hath the Lord said it, hath the Lord sworn it! and will he not do it? His assertion is a ground for faith, his oath a ground for full assurance of faith, if all England were as one man united in judgment and affection, and if it had a wall round about it reaching to the sun, and if it had as many armies as it has men, and every soldier had the strength of Goliath, and if their navies could cover the ocean, and if there were none to peep out or move the tongue against them; yet I dare not doubt of their destruction, when the Lord hath sworn by his life that he will avenge the breach

Where the quicksilver or rather gunpowder of enthusiasm (for the fifth of November must not claim it all) has once insinuated itself into the veins and bowels of a kingdom, it presently rallies together all the distempers, all the humours, all the popular heats and discontents, till it kicks down crowns and sceptres, tramples upon thrones, much like those boisterous vapours shut up within the caverns of the earth, which no sooner inspire it into a quaking fit, (as I may express it,) but it overturns houses and towns, swallows up whole cities, and, in a word, writes his history in ruins and desolations, or in something more terrible than all, called a further reformation—SOUTH.

LORD FITZGERALD.

The Right Hon. William Vesey Fitzgerald, Baron Fitzgerald, President of the Board of Control for the Affairs of India, Custos Rotulorum of the country of Clare, and Colonel of the Clare Militia, expired at his residence in Belgrave square, early on the morning of 11th May. His Lordship's first official appointment was that of Chancellor of the Irish Exchequer, the abolition of which was necessarily consequent on the consolidation of the English and Irish Treasuries. His next appointment was that of Paymaster-General of the forces, which office he held during the years 1826 and 1827. In the Wellington Ministry, namely, from 1828 till 1830, he filled the office of President of the Board of Trade. This, of course, he resigned when Lord Grey became head of the Government; and during the last Melbourne Ministry, namely, from 1835 till 1841, he remained in opposition, occasionally addressing the House of Lords, but not taking a very active part in public affairs. When the present administration was formed, in the autumn of 1841, Lord Fitzgerald became President of the Board of Trade, the duties of which he continued to discharge up to the period of Lord Ellenborough's appointment to the government of India, when his services were transferred to the Board of Control. Upon the decease of his mother, in 1832, the honour of the Irish barony devolved upon his lordship, who, in 1835, obtained a peerage of the United Kingdom by the title of Baron Fitzgerald, of Desmond and Clangibbon, in the county of Cork. As his lordship has died without leaving male issue, the British peerage becomes extinct; but he is succeeded in the Irish barony of Fitzgerald and Vesey by his brother, the Hon. and Very Rev. Dr. Henry Fitzgerald.

Lord Fitzgerald has left his small estate near Limerick, of 200l. a year, to his brother, the present peer: the rents of his estates in Clare and Galway to accumulate until the death of the present lord, to whose heir, when he attains the age of twenty-one he bequeaths the said accumulated sum and estates; but in failure of male issue, the money and estates descend to the eldest sons of his sisters, the widows of Sir Ross Mahon and Baron Foster, the former of covenant. When, and by whom, and in what manner he will do it, I do profess ignorance, and leave it to his glorious Majesty, his own latitude, and will commit it to him, &c.

My Lord, I live and will die, and if I be called home before that time, I am in the assured hopes of the ruin of all God's enemies in the land; so I commit your Lordship and your Lady to the grace of God.

JOHN McCLELLAND."

the Galway, the latter the Clare estate. His lordship's personal property, exceeding 150,000*l.* he leaves to his two illegitimate children, one of whom is married to an eminent physician in London. He also bequeaths 5000*l.* to Mr. Baron Foster. The principal executor is his late private secretary, son of Mr. Cane, of Dawson-street, Dublin.—Overland Mail.

DR. PUSEY.

At Oxford a vast sensation has been created by a sermon preached by Dr. Pusey, to a large congregation at Christ Church, in which he publicly and without reserve professed and taught the great fundamental doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, namely Transubstantiation. The text taken was that which describes the institution of the Lord's Supper by our Lord—Matthew xxvi, v. 26, 27, 28; compared with John vi., v. 54. Dr. Pusey took these texts in the literal sense. In the first part of his sermon, he adopted the precise line of argument employed by Dr. Wiseman, in his volume published in the year 1836, and which consisted of lectures delivered at the English College at Rome. Following Dr. Wiseman, Dr. Pusey maintained, that, on consecrating the elements of bread and wine, a change took place, into the mode of which it was presumptuous to inquire, but which we were to regard as a wonderful mystery, that it should be bread and wine, and yet the very body and blood of Christ. In support of these statements Dr. Pusey quoted the language of the Council of Trent, Session xiii, c. 3 and 4. It may be remarked here, that Dr. Turton, the able and learned Dean of Westminster, in his work on the Eucharist, has ably criticised the principles of interpretation adopted by Dr. Wiseman but of these criticisms Dr. Pusey took not the least notice.

The second part of the sermon was on the Communication of the Remission of Sins; and Dr. Pusey laboured to show, that the "Remission of Sins" referred not only to the atonement on the cross, by the one offering of the body of Christ, but also to the celebration of the Lord's supper; here again he quoted "the Ancient Church," as authority. This doctrine is also maintained in Tract 90, this Tract asserting—"that there is nothing in the XXXI. Article against the mass in itself, or against its being an offering for the remission of sin, when considered as a continuation of Christ's sacrifice."—P. 53. first edition.

Consistently with these views, Dr. Pusey, in practically applying his subject, spoke of the Lord's Supper as the means of continuing and maintaining the spiritual life imparted in baptism; and urged to more frequent communion, both on the part of "the Holy" and of Sinners; the former that they may enjoy an antipast of heaven; the latter, that they might, peradventure, the remission of sins.

Professor Pusey's sermon was delivered to the Vice-Chancellor, who appointed a Board of Heresy to examine into the truth of the alleged charges. The members of the board were—The Vice-Chancellor; Dr. Faussett, Margaret Professor of Divinity; Dr. Ogilvie, Professor of Pastoral Theology; Dr. Hawkins, of Oriel College; Dr. Symons, Warder of Wadham, and the Rev. Dr. Jelf, Canon of Christ's Church; and it was said that the investigation had terminated in a complete vindication of Dr. Pusey, who has produced out of St. Cyprian the ipsissima verba of the passage which Dr. Faussett had accused of heresy. But the fact is, the board has condemned the sermon, and suspended the Regius Professor of Hebrew from the office of preaching within the University for two years.

Dr. Pusey has protested against this decision. He says that he had requested to be allowed a hearing, and that nothing has been pointed out to him in his sermon contrary to the formularies of Church.—Overland Mail.

PROTEST.

"Mr. VICE-CHANCELLOR,—You will be assured that the following protest, which I feel it my duty to the church to deliver, is written with entire respect for your office, and without any imputation upon yourself individually.

I have stated to you, on different occasions, an opportunity offered, that I was at a loss to conceive what in my sermon could be construed into discordance with the formularies of our Church; I have requested you to adopt that alternative in the statutes, which allows the accused a hearing; I have again and again requested that definite propositions, which were thought to be at variance with our formularies, should, according to the alternative in the statute, be proposed to me; I have declared repeatedly my entire assent ex animo to all the doctrinal statements of our Church on this subject, and have, as far as I had opportunity, declared my sincere and entire consent to them individually; I have ground to think that as no propositions of my sermon have been exhibited to me as at variance with the doctrine of our Church, so neither can they, but that I have been condemned either on a mistaken construction of my words, founded upon the doctrinal opinions of my judges, or on grounds distinct from the formularies of our Church.

"Under these circumstances, since the Statute manifestly contemplates certain grave and definite instances of contrariety or discordance from the formularies of our Church, I feel it my duty to protest against the late sentence against me as unstatutable as well as unjust.

"I remain, Mr. Vice-Chancellor,
Your humble servant,
"E. B. PUSEY."

OPINION OF THE "REFORMERS" ON THE EUCHARIST.

THE OPINION OF LUTHER.

"It is well known, that Luther, the patriarch of the reformation, did not deny, but on the contrary, asserted the real presence, in the strongest terms. This appears from the letter which he wrote to the inhabitants of Strasburg, where he declares that nothing would have given him greater pleasure than to oppose the faith of the Church respecting the real presence. But he was so invincibly struck with the force and simplicity of these words of Jesus Christ, This is my body, this is my blood, this body given for you, this blood of the New Testament, this blood shed for you, and for the remission of sins, that he was compelled to assert the presence of Christ in the sacrament—a presence as real, proper, and substantial as Catholics admit. He determined, nevertheless, to mix with it something of his own, and this he called consubstantiation; in other words, he maintained that the substance of the bread remained together with the body of Christ, and therefore denied transubstantiation. In opposition to this notion, Calvin and his party declared, that if the doctrine of the real presence were once admitted, transubstantiation must inevitably follow. 'Either admit our figure, or their transubstantiation will follow,' said Beza against the Lutherans, 'for you cannot insist on the literal meaning of the words, This is my body, without plainly establishing transubstantiation.' This inference of Calvin, Beza, and the Sacramentarians, is clearly justified by the very nature of the words employed; for our Redeemer does not say, 'Here is my body,' but This is my body; just as he had said at the marriage feast of Cana, 'I am the wine,' meaning practically and efficiently a miraculous change of the water into wine. Calvin, in his book De Missa Privata, acknowledges, that he was induced by the suggestion made to him by the devil, to substitute his new system in the place of transubstantiation.

THE OPINION OF ZUINGLIUS.

"Zuinglius was one of Luther's followers, but after teaching for some time, with his master, the real presence of Jesus Christ, together with the bread and wine, he adopted a new system in 1525, and maintained that the body of Christ was not in the eucharist truly, but in figure only; so that when we see the bread broken and eaten, and the wine poured out, we ought to call to mind that Christ's body was crucified for us, and that, by faith, we are made partakers of the benefits of his passion and death. The followers of Zuinglius composed the sect of the Sacramentarians, who, for many years, carried on with Luther a sharp and bitter controversy on this subject, but without ever coming to any real agreement. Hence Luther continued, till his death, to condemn their symbolical or figurative presence, employing for this purpose sometimes the shafts of his ridicule, and sometimes the thunder of his vehement declamation and anathemas.

"It must be owned that the system of the Zuinglians, which is now generally followed by Protestants, leaves nothing peculiar to the Lord's Supper. The body of Jesus is no more there, than in any other actions of a Christian; and it was in vain that Jesus said, with so much energy, at his last supper, and then only, This is my body; since with these powerful words he effected nothing in it that is really singular or extraordinary in the system of Zuinglius. This is, and must ever be considered as the weak side of the figurative sense, which the Zuinglians themselves were aware of, and which they candidly owned; 'This spiritual nourishment,' they say, 'is taken out of as well as in the supper, and how often soever a person believes, this believer, by his faith, hath already received and continues to enjoy this food of everlasting life; but for the same reason, when he receives the sacrament; that which he receiveth is not nothing—non nihil accipit.' What then, I may ask, is the Lord's supper reduced to? All that they can say for it is, that 'What you receive in it is not quite nothing. For we continue,' say the Zuinglians, 'to partake there of the body and blood of our Lord.' The supper, therefore, in their opinion, hath nothing singular in it. 'Faith is stirred up, increases, is nourished with some spiritual food'; for as long as we live, it receives a continual increase.' It receives, therefore, as much of all this out of the supper as in the supper, nor is Jesus more there than any where else. In this manner, after saying that the particular thing received in the supper, is not a mere nothing, and reducing it to so small a matter, they are not able to tell us what is that little which they have left in it. Here, it must be owned, is a great vacuum; and it was in order to supply this emptiness, that Calvin and the Calvinists invented their big-swelling words, by way of accommodation with the Lutherans and Zuinglians."

THE SYSTEM OF CALVIN.

"Some years afterwards, John Calvin commenced reformer, and wished to adopt a middle way between the two preceding opinions. He taught, therefore, that the body of Christ was not really present in the eucharist, as the Lutherans said; nor was he only in figure, as the Zuinglians pretended; but he was there by faith, when the bread was actually received, so that he maintained a real presence, and no real presence, sometimes affirming Christ's body to be only in heaven, and sometimes to be truly in the sacraments; sometimes telling us that it is a mystery which we cannot comprehend, much less explain—that Christ's flesh and blood should come to us from such a distance to be our food: and at other times, that this manducation is only by faith, with many other evasive explanations and apparent contradictions, as Bossuet shows in his Variations."

THE DOCTRINE OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

"With respect to the belief of the Anglican Church, it has been justly observed, by Dr. Luingard, that 'the itch of innovation, on the one hand, and the strong language of the Scripture, on the other; the impossibility of reconciling opposite opinions, and the desire, at the same time, of drawing all parties within the pale of the establishment,—involved the English reformers in endless perplexities and contradictions.' At the accession of Edward VI. the eucharist was pronounced by authority to be the body and blood of Christ: before his death a declaration was issued by the same authority, that the real presence was to be rejected. The body and blood of Christ disappeared, and in their place was substituted 'a spiritual feast of faith and thanksgiving, in commemoration of his death.' The next head of the Church, though a female, was in favour of the real presence; for by the order of Elizabeth, the sacrament was restored to its former dignity, and became again the body and blood of Christ: James followed. He was a theologian by profession; and the faith of the English Church was soon improved by his superior knowledge. It was now publicly advanced by his divines, that Christ was not only present, but was also to be adored in the sacrament; and that the only dispute between the two Churches of England and Rome, was not about the thing itself, but about the manner—was not whether Christ was really present in the eucharist, (that was conceded on both sides,) but whether he was there by transubstantiation or not. Thus the matter rested for several years, till a new race of theologians arose. Tillotson, Wake, Sullingfleet, &c. adopted the doctrine of Calvin; and the real presence, after many unmeaning and contradictory explanations, was changed for a real absence. From that period it is difficult to ascertain what should be considered as the real belief of the Church of England."

MAUNDY THURSDAY.

It may be interesting to some few of the readers of the Illustrated News to hear the origin of the term "Maundy Money," explained; but ere commencing we must be permitted to digress by stating that, in the Roman Catholic Church, it was the custom on the Dies Mandati, or day of command, being the day preceding Good Friday, now called Maundy Thursday, for the religious to entertain and wash the feet of a number of poor persons (in accordance with the same act performed by our Saviour), after which alms were bestowed upon them of pieces of silver. A relic of that custom we preserve and surely the most fastidious will not presume to find fault with a usage which is the occasion of much relief to the aged widow and those in need. On the day alluded to a certain number of poor men and women, of each the exact number of the years of our sovereign's age, attended divine service in the Royal Chapel, Whitehall, in the morning and afternoon.

Bread, meat, and fish is distributed to them in large wooden bowls, and a procession formed of the Queen's almoner or sub-almoner, with other officers who are decorated with white scarfs and sashes and each carrying a bouquet of flowers; one of the officers supports a large gold dish or salver, on which are placed small red and white leather bags: the red containing a sovereign, the white the pieces (as in the engraving) termed Maundy Money. One of each of these bags is given to the persons selected to receive the royal bounty; they have likewise given to them cloth, linen, shoes &c., as well as a small maple cup, out of which previous to the termination of the ceremony they drink the Queen's health. There is something very imposing in this little formula from the peculiar appearance of the yeomen of the guard in their antiquated costume, being that of the time of Henry VIII.

The Maundy Money is to the amount of a penny to each year of the Sovereign's age; presuming that he twenty-four, there would be given to the value of two shillings. This, however, is not all bestowed in pennies, but generally in the following proportion: one fourpence, two threepences, three twopences, and eight pennies, and those pieces are severally impressed with the date of the year in which they are presented; but in the reign of George III. there was no rule as to the dates, and the Maundy Money in many instances was of a period some years anterior to the day of its presentation. These small pieces are, by an order of Government, declared current coins of the realm, therefore no one dare refuse to take them if they are tendered in payment; still they are not in reality intended for that purpose. As a proof of this, the new groat recently issued will be found, on examination, to be from the die of the Maundy threepence—that is, the head side, but it has a different reverse, and is thicker and of course of the weight of the Maundy fourpence. They are struck chiefly as presents for various officers attached to the Crown, as well as to others.

The King of England was formerly accustomed, on Maundy Thursday, to have brought before him as many poor men as he was years old, whose feet he washed with his own hands; after which his Majesty's maunds, consisting of meat, clothes, and money, were distributed amongst them. Queen Elizabeth, when in her 39th year, performed this ceremony at her palace at Greenwich, on which occasión she was attended by thirty-nine ladies and gentlewomen. Thirty-nine poor persons being assembled, their feet were first washed by the yeoman of the laundry with warm water and sweet herbs—afterwards, by the sub-almoner—and finally, by the Queen herself, kneeling. These various persons—the yeoman, the sub-almoner, and the Queen—after washing each foot, marked it with the sign of the cross about the toes, and then kissed it; clothes, victuals, and money were then distributed. This strange ceremonial, in which the highest was for a moment brought beneath the lowest, was last performed in its full extent by James II., at Whitehall. King William left the washing to his almoner; and such was the arrangement for many years afterwards.

Thursday, April 15, 1731, being Maundy Thursday, there was distributed at the chapel-royal, Whitehall, to forty-eight poor men, and as many poor women—the King's (George the Second) was forty-eight, boiled beef, and shoulders of mutton, and small bowls of ale, which was called Maundy; after that, large wooden platters of fish and loaves—namely, undressed, one large old ling and one large dried cod, twelve red herrings and twelve white herrings, and four half-quarter loaves—each person had one platter of this provision; after which were distributed to them shoes, stockings, linen and woollen cloth, and leathern bags, with one penny, two penny, three penny, and four penny pieces of silver, and shillings—to each about four pounds in value.

His Grace the Lord Archbishop of York, Lord High Almoner, performed the annual ceremony of washing the feet of a certain number of poor in the Chapel-royal, Whitehall, which was formerly done by the Kings themselves, in imitation of our Saviour's pattern of humility. For a considerable number of years the washing of the feet has been entirely given up, and, since the beginning of the reign of Queen Victoria, an additional sum of money has been given in lieu of provisions.

In accordance with annual custom, her Majesty's bounty was distributed on Thursday to a number of poor men and women at the Chapel-royal, Whitehall. The Rev. Dr. Hodgson, Dean of Carlisle, officiated for the Archbishop of York, the Queen's Almoner, and was assisted in the ceremony by the Rev. Dr. Sleath, Sub-dean of the Chapel-royal, and the Rev. Dr. Vivian, of St. Paul's. The chapel was crowded with elegantly-dressed ladies. Sir George Smart presided at the organ, and played a voluntary as the procession entered the chapel, the alms-money being borne by the Yeomen of the Guard. The recipients of the bounty, twenty-six men and twenty-six women, the number being regulated by the age of the Sovereign, were seated in the body of the chapel, and on the conclusion of the first lesson, the Dean of Carlisle left the altar, and presented to each woman a small purse containing £1 15s. A pair of thick stockings and shoes, with four yards of broad cloth, was next given to the poor men; after which each pensioner received two leather purses, the one containing several small silver coins, and the other the sum of £2 10s. The service was then proceeded with, and concluded with a prayer for the Queen. The ceremony was altogether of a very interesting character. On the death of the late King the number of recipients amounted to nearly one hundred and forty. By the liberality of her Majesty, none of these poor individuals have lost their bounty. Although no more than twenty-six of each sex are present in the chapel, the whole of the original pensioners are paid until they drop off by death. Some of the recipients have attained a great age, many are blind and the whole are persons who have become reduced from a respectable sphere of life. The Right Hon. the Lady Mayoress was among those present—Illustrated London News, April 15.

"GOOD SOCIETY" IN DUBLIN.

A correspondent writing from Dublin, and signing himself "A Catholic Lawyer," draws our attention to a case that has recently occupied the attention of the courts in Dublin, and from which it is that the metropolis of Catholic Ireland is a "good society" in about the same measure as the metropolis of Protestant England was a very curious one, and we are on our own knowledge that it excited a great deal of attention, and a good deal of scandal. It was first brought before the court; and immediately reported, was not a little disagreeable to more than one party concerned.

At a hearing on a reference to the Master, to report touching the education of two children of the name of Brophy. Their father, the deceased Mr. Brophy, was "a liberal Catholic." He had been in the habit of going to Mass, and also of going to Church. This, it seems, was the character of the stock or race. His father was a Catholic, but his brothers and sisters were some of them baptized and brought up Protestants, and others perverted after a Catholic education. However, the deceased Mr. Brophy seemed to hold a very even hand between the two religions. He did not go to Confession, but he went to Mass. He went also to hear the sermons of Archdeacon Magee, and, being desirous (we supposed) that his son should hear both sides of the question, he took his son with him—in order, of course, to enlarge and liberalize his mind. At least one of the deponents swore that "he heard, and believed he brought him to hear prayers in Christ Church."

However, it appears that if the man was of any religion at all, he was a Catholic. If he wishes to have his children of any religion, he wished to have them Catholics. One deponent, a medical gentleman, Dr. Brady, even went so far as to swear that he paid the greatest attention to the religious education of his son, and at any rate that he "heard him express the greatest unwillingness that his son should not hear Mass on Sundays; and when he could not attend with him himself, he requested the deponent to bring the boy to Mass, which he did." On the other hand, it was said that he sent the boy to a Protestant school when there was a Catholic School near home; but to this it was answered "that he was merely a day-scholar sent there to learn his grammar, and not to receive religious instruction." Another main part of the evidence we give verbatim from the Freeman's Journal, of the 6th of February.

Mr. Brady, further stated, that on the Friday before Mr. Brophy's decease, deponent, in the presence of Maurice Brophy, one of the brothers of deceased, Mr. Corcoran, and Mrs. Kane, asked him who he would wish to be guardians of his children, whereupon he said "who but my brothers." Maurice Brophy then asked deceased if he knew him, and he replied, "I do know you Maurice—rear up my children in the holy Catholic religion; as I reared you up." There having been a statement made on the other side with respect to the laxity of the religious principles of deceased, he (Mr. H.) would next read for the Master the affidavit of the Rev. William Brophy on that point. He stated that he was acquainted with deceased for about 20 years previous to his death, and knew his religious opinions; that during the entire period of his acquaintance with him he professed to be a Roman Catholic, and deponent had no doubt on his mind but that he was a sincere Roman Catholic, and died a Roman Catholic; that he knew Anne Brophy, the mother of the minor, and that she was a pious and zealous Roman Catholic, and that her son after her death was reared in the religion and taught the prayers of the Roman Catholic Church. Part of the reference was to ascertain how the children were educated, and from those affidavits it appeared that the son was educated in the religion of his father, but as to the girl, she was then very young.

A statement was made at this stage of the proceedings, that the boy was now about ten years of age, and the girl about seven years old.

Mr. Hatchell resumed his statement, and said he would next read the affidavit of another Roman Catholic clergyman, the Rev. Nicholas Roche. The residence of deceased was situate in the Catholic parish of Rathmines; it appeared that deceased was considered as a parishioner of the Roman Catholic pastor, and as such contributed to the support of the Catholic clergymen of that parish. The Rev. Mr. Roche stated that he is curate of the parish, and attended the deceased in his last illness, and administered to him the rites of the Roman Catholic Church; he also stated that he knew the wife of the deceased, and that she was a Roman Catholic.

Dr. Brady's evidence of the death-bed expressions of the deceased was endeavoured to be neutralized by that of Mrs. Kane (his sister) and her husband, who swore that the man died of typhus fever, and was not in possession of his senses. On the other hand, Mr. Corcoran, on oath, confirmed the statement of Dr. Brady, that in their presence the deceased did express the wish above set forth.

Again, a Protestant uncle of the infants swore as follows:—

He stated that he and deceased were on terms of great intimacy, and attached to each other as brothers. In July 1839, deponent went to reside in London, and returned in the month of March following his brother's death; that he had constant communication with his brother by letter, and was, previous to his departure, a constant inmate of his house; that his brother and his wife professed the Roman Catholic religion, and that the minor, John, was educated in the principles of that religion by his father; that his brother attended a Roman Catholic chapel, and brought his son there with him; that deponent is himself a Protestant, and if governed by his feelings, would have brought up the children as Protestants; but he was sure it would be the wish of deceased, if living, that his children should be reared as Roman Catholics.

However, whether Catholic or Protestant, sane or insane, the father died; the uncles and aunts, of whom Patrick Brophy the dentist was one, seized hold of the children as their lawful wards and strays, and set to work to make Protestants of them forthwith. Patrick Brophy seems to be a very odd sort of person. The solicitor, Mr. Mooney, swore that on the 7th of May (1840), "when the first summons was issued for a meeting before the Master for the appointment of a guardian, he waited on Mr. Patrick Brophy, who, as the brother of the deceased, and a man in good circumstances, was generally regarded as the most proper person to be appointed guardian, and told him that he attended on the part of Mr. Corcoran, to come to some understanding about the religion of the minors. That Mr. Brophy said in reply he was himself of no religion, meaning thereby that he was not attached to any particular form of belief, and that, as his deceased brother had set his heart on having his children reared Roman Catholics, he would throw no obstacle in the way. Mr. Corcoran accordingly offered no objection to his appointment as guardian." This Mr. Patrick Brophy it is who, by these representations, got himself made guardian, now is the foremost to have the children made Protestants, and swears that they will have a better chance of succeeding to his property if they are so educated.

But Mr. Patrick Brophy is an odd creature in another way; indeed, we may call him a truly apostolic man. No man, we are told, ever conformed himself so strictly to the apostolic injunction about being all things to all men. We suppose his religious principles have become more rigid with years in the interval since May 1840. Certain it is that during part of that interval he was believed by many Catholic priests to be a Catholic, and, as he had some favour in the viceregal circle, he was thought much of on that account. If we are not mistaken, this only regenerator of decayed gums played the horse-jockey with many of the Dublin clergy. He looked into their mouths, and, by the appearance of their teeth he made the important discovery that they were not too old to be treated with soft sawder. He aspired, how successfully we cannot say, to the patronage of his Grace. Another clergyman he let off easy in the matter of payment, jocosely observing that he might one day or other require a cast of his reverence's function, and then it would only be tit for tat. In this pleasant way matters rolled on, and at length, much to the astonishment of their reverences, the good man, after inspecting all their teeth to some purpose, changed his game and began to show his own in this affair of his nephew's education.

As soon as it was known that the children were receiving a Protestant education, Mr. Corcoran, a distant relative, interfered, brought the case before the court, and obtained, on the 9th of last December, an order of reference to the Master—Master Litton—to determine in what religion the children should be brought up. Well, the case was heard before the Master, and then came out the facts stated in the affidavits already quoted.

Can our readers guess who was the counsel employed to enforce the Protestant education of these children? Why, Mr. Murphy, the Queen's Counsel, who edified the whole of Dublin by the extraordinary zeal with which he laboured to devote these poor children to everlasting perdition. He gravely assured the court the untruth, that if Mr. Brophy was a Catholic he would not have lived on terms of intimacy with those of his brothers and sisters, who were baptized and brought up as Protestants. He eat meat on a Friday; he never went to confession; he went occasionally to church; he set a very bad example to those around him:—from all which the Catholic, Mr. Murphy, contended, both logically and theologically, that the father having eaten sour grapes, the children's teeth were to be set on edge; or, in other words, that the father having died unrepentant, the children were to be carefully reared up for eternal torments.

Master Litton gave his judgment on the case on the 27th of last February. He said that the court was influenced by two grounds in regard to the education of minors. The first, the religion of the parents, or surviving parent, particularly the father; secondly, the wishes of the father on his death-bed.

With regard to the second of these two points he held, on an examination of the evidence, that the man's senses must have been wandering at his death, otherwise how could he have given "the antagonist instructions" that his children should be made Catholics, and yet appoint Protestant guardians. On these grounds, and the inherent probability of the thing, he coolly set aside the sworn evidence of the physician who attended him in his last moments, and that of Mr. Corcoran, who was present at the same time; the sworn evidence of the Protestant uncle as to his deceased brother's wishes; and the distinct admission of Mr. Patrick Brophy (now a furious evangelical) at the time he was appointed guardian. All this evidence, as if it was a mere heap of rubbish, the Master clears away to arrive at the conclusion that the deceased expressed no opinion at all on his death-bed.

As to the other item in the account, the Master was afraid the man had been what is technically called "a bad Catholic," and therefore as his "sane wishes" were set aside on the one hand, so was his admitted religion on the other. We of course cannot pretend to give a full narrative of the case, with all the technical reasonings involved in it; but the Master's conclusion was as follows:—

The report which he would make was—first, that the parents were Roman Catholics; but that the father, though a professed Roman Catholic, appeared to have been to a great extent indifferent as to the particular religion in which the children were to be brought up. Secondly, that they were not instructed in any peculiar form of religion during the lifetime of their father, but that the boy had been occasionally brought to attend places of worship belonging to both religions by his father. Thirdly, that since their father's death they had been both instructed in the Protestant religion; and, fourthly, that in future they ought to be both educated in the Protestant, and not in the Roman Catholic religion.

What legal support there may be for such a decision we will not take upon us to determine. But certain we are that it is most iniquitous in fact, and in our judgement utterly at variance with facts, so far as they can be gathered from the detailed reports in the newspapers. Meanwhile we think the case may be perused with great edification by all "liberal Catholics" who have Protestant connexions. They will see from it pretty clearly (what appears to be the principle of the case) that, if they happen to die of typhus fever, their children must be brought up Protestants.

We conclude with putting on record the opinion of our correspondent, as a Catholic lawyer, on Mr. Murphy's conduct in this affair:—

As this case has excited much discussion amongst Catholics and Protestants, lawyers and clients, the subscriber feels called upon publicly to repudiate the stigma attempted to be cast upon his order, and to affirm, without fear of contradiction, that no fee or consideration can authorize a Catholic lawyer to advocate the suppression of the teaching of the only true Faith, and substitution of error in the stead thereof.

2ndly. That it is contrary to the truth to state that a Catholic is bound to repudiate his brethren who may have been reared up in the Protestant Church.

On these important questions, it is hoped some more public and solemn demonstration may yet be made, that the flock may be warned that Mr. Murphy, having virtually renounced the Catholic Faith by his public endeavours to prevent its teaching, the members of the Church may not be compromised by his untrue exposition of Catholic doctrine; that the stumbling block of scandal may be removed from before the weak and ignorant; that the calumniators of the true Faith may be silenced; and that the Protestants may not imagine that the Catholic Church ever professed or taught such monstrous and uncharitable doctrines.—Tablet, April 15.

THE MADURA QUESTION.

Our readers will remember the zealous and well-timed endeavours which Lord Clifford made last year to direct their attention and that of Parliament to the shocking outrages perpetrated by English officials at Madura against the native Christians and their legitimate pastors the Jesuits. It will be also remembered that the charge was denied by Lord Ellenborough as too monstrous to be credible, and that his denial was acquiesced in by several Catholics. It now appears that Lord Clifford and ourselves formed the correct judgement of these matters, and that Mr. Blackburne, the accused magistrate, was, as he asserted, the tool of his Bramin confederates. We insert the following extract from a private letter received from India, dated 16th Jan. 1840.

"Mr. Blackburne is suspended from the exercise of his functions as magistrate, until numerous charges of bribery, &c., which have been long pending in his own office, under his very eyes, and which his knowledge, have been investigated by a gentleman sent down specially from Madras. His chief offender is his first native assistant, now in jail, and the man in whom he placed implicit confidence. This man, bribed by the Goa priests, has poisoned his ear hitherto against the Jesuits, to whom personally he has always been very kind, and who entertain the greatest esteem for him, as must every one who knows him."—Ibid.

MISCELLANEA.

RESTORATION OF THE CROSS.—The despised and persecuted Cross, which was the other week considered by the Rev. Mr. Dempster, minister of the enlightened parish of Denny, an idolatrous abomination, an obnoxious Catholic Mussal (?), emblem of Puseyism, &c. &c., and as such removed by his imperious command from the top of the sanctuary, and dashed with violence to the ground, to moulder in ignominious obscurity, was, on Wednesday, the 15th of March, by an order from the same Mr. Dempster, raised from its dreary abode, and triumphantly placed in its former lofty position, where it looks down with pity, and smiles at the silly prejudices of the nineteenth century. Various reports are in circulation relative to this sudden change of opinion. Some say that since the removal of the cross strange sounds have been heard nightly to emanate from the boisterous Carron; others, that hobgoblins and other nocturnal marauders have been seen running on the top of both manse and Church, and sporting in dozens among the solitary mansions of the dead, ringing the Church-bell &c.; another prevalent report is, that the Rev. gentleman has become a convert to Puseyism. Be what truth there may in any of these rumours, this is certain, that the same band which degraded the cross has restored it.—Glasgow Reformers Gazette.—[This very absurd paragraph is inserted at the desire of a correspondent, to show the extreme ignorance of all that it concerns, which now prevails in all enlightened Scotland. The facts of the degradation and re-elevation of the cross are correctly stated.]

PENZANCE.—At Penzance, on Sunday, March 26, three Protestants were received into the bosom of the Catholic Church by the Rev. William Joseph Daly, O. M. J.; the interesting ceremony of their profession of faith was witnessed by a numerous congregation of persons of different religious denominations. Four others persons are at the present time receiving instructions from the same rev. gentleman.

UNITED STATES.

It is consoling to find religion so much on the advance in the United States. In nearly every diocese the number of churches, clergymen, colleges, convents and Catholic charities is rapidly increasing. The learning, zeal and energy of the Bishops are spoken of in the highest terms of praise. The funeral orations on the late Right Rev. Dr. England, Bishop of Charleston, and on the late Right Rev. Dr. Bruté, Bishop of Vincennes, Indiana (by two Irishmen) have been highly eulogized. Religious orders and communities are greatly admired here, and are pregnant with the highest advantages to religion. The Mother-house of the Sisters of Charity, in Baltimore alone, founded in 1809, consists of 109 members, 45 of whom are professed sisters, 57 novices, and 7 candidates. In addition to these are 200 members of the same admirable community employed on the different missions throughout the United States—principally in directing orphan-houses and free-schools. The convents of the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of the Ursulines, of the Carmelites, of St. Dominic, the Sisters of Providence, of the Sacred Heart of Loretto, of St. Joseph of Nazareth, and of St. Vincent de Paul, are most numerous. There are male religious communities of almost every kind; and academies, schools, and sodalities of every class. There are great numbers of literary institutions expressly directed by the Bishops and clergy; and the fathers of the missions, under the thrice hallowed Association for the Propagation of the Faith, are extending the glorious empire of Catholicity to the most remote and interior parts. In Baltimore the Catholic Tract Society, lately founded, has done great good; and the various Catholic newspapers, journals, and magazines, have contributed to refute error, and to promote the cause of truth and justice. The societies of St. John the Evangelist, for the advancement of the corporal and spiritual works of mercy, have enkindled the flame of piety and love among men, and the houses for the reception of poor or infirm clergymen have secured the respect and dignity of the ministers of the altar. There are young ladies' charitable societies for the relief of the poor; associations for the embellishment of churches and decoration of the altars; societies for the purposes of organizing choirs and promoting sacred music in the temples of God; there are various hospitals for the sick and dying, that of New Orleans alone having from 300 to 400 patients. There are asylums for distressed widows, and there are orphan institutions in almost every district. In Richmond, there is a Benevolent Fund Society; one at Norfolk, for the support of indigent families; and the Society for the Diffusion of Religious Knowledge at Cincinnati has done great good. The Church Building Society, in the same diocese, has effected lasting blessings. The Indian Missions were recommended by the last Provincial Council to the charity of all the Catholics of the United State. Thus are all kinds of charity and works of mercy advanced.—Tablet.

[VOL. V.]

PASTORAL LETTER.

PATRICK JOSEPH, by the grace of God and the favor of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Elessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to all the Faithful of Bengal, wishes Health and Benediction.

BELOVED BRETHREN IN JESUS CHRIST,

It becomes our duty to inform you, that the Venerable Successor of St. Peter has condescended to honor our humility, by exalting us to the Archepiscopal dignity. We make this announcement, in order to obtain the aid of your pious Prayers for our infirmity, and also, because, we regard the dignity conferred upon us, as designed by the Sovereign Pontiff, to evince his paternal acknowledgment, of the high sense he entertains, of your fidelity to the Holy See and of your zealous co-operation with the Prelate placed over you, in the maintenance of peace and charity, and in the exercise of an untiring zeal for the accomplishment of every good work. Yes, Beloved Brethren, it has been our consolation and joy, in our correspondence with the Holy See and with the Churches united in Communion with the Chair of Peter, to make known, your generous exertions in the cause of religion, and the cheerful promptitude, with which you made every sacrifice, in order to restore the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding, and unite together, as the Members of one great family, in every pious undertaking.

It is, doubtless, in return for the edifying example you have thus given to your Brethren throughout India, that the August Successor of St. Peter, has thought proper to honor you, by elevating your Chief Pastor to the highest dignity in the Sacred Hierarchy. It becomes us, then, Beloved Brethren in Jesus Christ, to labour to correspond with renewed diligence, with the pious solicitude of the Father of the Faithful, for the welfare of religion in the Church of Bengal. Excite yourselves, we exhort you, to a holy emulation in this thrice sacred cause, by calling to mind with gratitude the ample blessings which have rewarded already your zeal and charity. In the blessed fruits which your virtues have already yielded, your piety will recognise an incentive to perseverance and a pledge of still greater benedictions.

Amongst the good works, for which, Beloved Brethren, through the grace of God, you have been distinguished, we refer with peculiar pleasure to the temporal and spiritual succours, which by your contributions and your Prayers you rendered to other portions of the Church, which stood in need of your charity. This truly Catholic benevolence, the Apostle Paul earnestly recommends, when illustrating the admirable communion of the Faithful with one another, he compares the Church to the human Body, every Member of which is so closely united to the rest, that whatever occasions pain or pleasure to one, causes the others immediately to sympathize in the sensation thus excited.

In virtue of this sacred connection, by which you are identified with your Brethren from the rising to the setting Sun, We, now, earnestly invite you, to unite in Prayer for the ever faithful people of Ireland, the Island of Saints. For three centuries, that noble, that generous people endured every species of persecution, which a deadly hatred to Catholicity, combined with cruelty, sacrilege and robbery could inflict. Through that frightful ordeal they passed triumphantly, and like the Children of Israel when oppressed with Egyptian bondage, they multiplied, miraculously, whilst consumed with famine and the sword, until, at length, the outstretched arm of the Most High raised up another Moses and accomplished their deliverance.

This happy event was, no doubt, in a religious point of view, a source of joy and consolation to them. But, then, like the Jews returned from captivity, they found, on their restoration, the temple of the Constitution despoiled of its former glory; they saw their country lying prostrate, a miserable province, and not what God and Nature designed it to be, a Nation, clothed with the dignity of independence, exulting in the wisdom and eloquence of her own Senators and holding an honorable place amongst the other kingdoms of Europe.

Yes, the discerning people of whom I speak saw and experienced, that the Union which was notoriously achieved by fraud, by bribery and cruelty, was for them, like to that which tyranny of old is said to have effected between the bodies of the living and of the dead; it diseased and corrupted universally the healthfulness of their beloved country. Almost in a moment, after the accomplishment of the fatal Union, Ireland beheld her manufactures decay and perish, her Nobility and Gentry, either crouching in servile adulation, as hungry expectants at the Court of the English Minister, or seeking in France or Italy, to enjoy the elegance of polished Society, which the political degradation of their own country denied to them at home. She saw famine, like an armed Man, stalk periodically through the land, and her children burnt up with hunger, whilst her fertile fields teemed with abundance, and ships without number conveyed to England and other countries her corn, her meat, and in a word, every species of valuable food, whilst her own peasantry, by whose industry that food was raised, pined away in hunger, in cold and in nakedness, until by a dispensation of Providence, which, though terrific in itself, was one of mercy in their regard, thousands of them were almost annually swept away prematurely by disease, the victims of every evil, to which suffering humanity is liable.

I pass by the countless miseries, and bloodshed, occasioned by depriving the poor of that relief, which, before the introduction of Protestantism into Ireland, the property of the Irish Church, about one million pounds sterling a year, always afforded, and the outrage offered to the feelings of a people, who may be well described, as essentially Catholic, by the cruel measures resorted to, to force on them a religion, which they held in abhorrence as heretical, and a Church Ministry, which they despised, as destitute of every spiritual and Apostolic prerogative, and as a daring sacrilegious usurpation of the powers of the Christian Priesthood. Yes, the beautiful fields of Ireland are still wet with the blood of the orphan and the widow poured forth in melancholy but unavailing struggles to be relieved from the multiplied evils, with which the so-called Reformation overwhelmed their beloved country. Assuredly, it is not strange, that in these circumstances a brave, generous, and, thanks to God and the Apostolic ministry of one of his faithful Priests, a temperate people also, should unite together in millions, as if they were one man, and by the intrepid exercise of every constitutional privilege which belongs to them as British subjects, thunder at the portals of the Imperial Parliament, and make the Universe resound with their loud cry for justice.

Why, it will be asked, enter on these topics in a Pastoral Address to the Catholics of Bengal? Is it for the unworthy purpose of exciting here angry politics or embittered feelings? By no means. Such an end would be unbecoming our Sacred Ministry, and contrary to the maxims, by which we have been always regulated in the exercise of our Pastoral obligations. But, whilst we avoid all bitterness as becomes Christians, we must not be insensible, or indifferent to the evils which afflict, or which menace our Brethren. To Catholic Ireland, Catholic India owes a great debt of religious gratitude. With Catholic Ireland, the Catholics of India are now more than ever bound in sacred bonds of religious Union and Friendship. From her Colleges and Convents, Catholic Ireland has sent forth with joy her gifted Sons and Daughters to the burning tropic of India to labour there, in poverty and privation, separated for ever from every endearing tie of friends and country, for you and for your children—out of her poverty, Catholic Ireland has again and again ministered to your necessities, and paid large sums for the purpose of supplying you with Clergy, with Nuns, and with religious succours, of great importance to your spiritual welfare.

In return for this noble exercise of fraternal charity, it is your duty to evince your sympathy for your Brethren in Ireland, by offering up to the throne of mercy, your frequent and earnest prayers, that they may be saved from the horrors of civil war—that God may inspire the Ministers of our most Gracious Sovereign with counsels of moderation, of wisdom, and of justice towards a devoted and loyal, but a calumniated and persecuted people. For it is a shameful calumny, the offspring of ignorance and bigotry, to represent the Irish people, as seeking by their constitutional exertion for the repeal of the union, to shake off their allegiance to the British Sovereign. Never can such a traitorous design have a resting place in the bosoms of Irish Catholics. Never did they deserve to be branded with the stigma of disloyalty, even when the British Monarch was known to them almost only as the enemy of their race and their religion. Their only desire, their sole ambition, and it is an honorable one, is, to enjoy equally with their English Fellow-subjects, under the same Sovereign, all the blessings of the British Constitution. If by any extraordinary revolution, it should so happen, that the sceptre of France passed into the hands of the British Sovereign, and if, in a similar way, it should occur, by means of fraud, of corruption and of cruelty, that England was despoiled of the glory of her Parliament, and the seat of the Supreme Legislature transferred from Westminster to Paris, where is the Englishman, that would not rise up and denounce the proceeding, as one fraught with injustice and dishonor to his native land? Where is the Englishman, that on his death-bed, would not adjure his children, never to desist from seeking reparation for the wrong inflicted on their country, until the ark of the Constitution was restored to its own Temple? And shall that be criminal in Irishmen which the Universe would proclaim to be patriotic, just and honorable in Englishmen? Away with such helpless, hopeless imbecility.

Listen not, we entreat you, to those interested calumniators, who labor to excite a prejudice against your Irish Brethren, by describing them as animated with a deadly hatred towards their Protestant Fellow-countrymen. Never was a more wicked falsehood fabricated against a suffering people. Never was there a people more conspicuous than the Irish, for their tender respect for the religious opinions of their separated Brethren. During the exercise of our Ministry for more than fifteen years in Ireland, never did we either witness, or hear of, a single instance of discourtesy, offence or annoyance, by any Catholic, rich or poor, on the score of Religion, to his Protestant neighbour.

We cannot omit on this occasion to notice the heartless accusations preferred so often against the Catholic Priesthood of Ireland, because these great and good men, unlike the hireling who flees at the hour of danger, cling to their people with the affection of true Pastors, sympathize with them in all their wrongs and afflictions, and nobly employ their talents and their influence to restore their country to the rank which it is entitled to hold, among the Nations of the universe. Were they a paltry unfeeling corporation, whose ignoble appetites could be appeased by the gratification of their own individual cravings; were they a timid dastardly congregation of hirelings, who could look on without emotion, whilst their religion was dishonored and their country enslaved, oh! then, indeed, Bigotry and Orange-ascendency would be loud in applauding their meekness, their forbearance and their Apostolic simplicity. Oh yes, were they dumb dogs, unwilling or unable to bark, they would be just the sort of guardians, that would suit the interests of the bigots and the oppressors of Ireland. It is the glory of the true Religion that in every age its Ministers have been the fearless advocates of justice and truth towards God and their country. Did not the faithful Priests of the people of God in the old law, always stand forward to sustain by their council and co-operation, their people against their oppressors? And if England now glories in her Magna Charta, ought it not be remembered, that the illustrious name of Archbishop Langton is the first, which is found affixed to that imperishable record of Catholic patriotism?

Enough has been stated to demonstrate, first, that your Catholic Brethren in Ireland have the strongest claims on your sympathy in the present emergency, and secondly, that the various devices resorted to, in order to prejudice the public mind against them, are the offspring of an ignorant, a mercenary and an unfeeling bigotry. We again call upon you and exhort you in the name of the God of Charity and Peace to offer up frequently your devout prayers for the welfare of Ireland.

Yes, it is for the welfare of Ireland that we entreat your supplications, that her grievances may be peacefully redressed, that if the repeal of the Union cannot really be effected without injury to the integrity of the British Empire, at least, every other concession, which justice and the undoubted right of Irishmen to a perfect civil equality with their English Fellow-subjects may be promptly and generously granted, and that thus the reign of our Beloved and Gracious Queen may be known in times to come, as the happy era when was accomplished, not a barren and disastrous union such as we have already depicted, but a union of minds and hearts equally beneficial to all classes of British subjects, a union which nothing shall sever, because it will repose on the eternal immutable foundation of justice.

Given at the Cathedral House, Calcutta, on the Feast of St. James the Apostle.

† PATRICK JOSEPH,

Archbishop of Edessa,

Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

J. X. MASCARENHAS, Secretary.

TO HIS GRACE, THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa and
V. A. Bengal.

MY LORD ARCHBISHOP,—The enclosed letters have just reached me, and if Your Grace will oblige me with a translation of the Latin letter mentioned in Rev. Dr. Olliffe's communication, I am sure it will be read with peculiar pleasure by the readers of the Herald.

Permit me to take this opportunity to offer my humble congratulations to Your Grace, on your elevation to the Archiepiscopal rank—a dignity, which, it would be presumption on my part to say, has been deservedly conferred by His Holiness.

I remain,
Your Grace's Most Obedient and dutiful servant,
JAS. ROSTAN, JUNR.

26th July, 1843.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I have the greatest pleasure in making known to my Fellow-Catholics of Bengal through the medium of your columns, the gratifying intelligence that our venerated Prelate, Dr. Carew, has been just elevated to the Archiepiscopal rank. There is not, I am confident, a single one of his spiritual subjects, who will not heartily rejoice at this well-merited promotion. His GRACE will receive of course official intimation of the matter by the present Mail.

I remain,

Sir,

Your's obediently,

GEORGE F. LACKERSTEEN,

Rome, Ascension Day, 1843.

JAS. ROSTAN, JR. ESQ.

Calcutta.

MY DEAR SIR,—You will please your readers by inserting a translation of the Latin letter, which the Sacred Congregation sends to the Archbishop by the present Mail. It is highly complimentary.

Have the goodness to send the Herald regularly to the address of

Very Rev. Dr. Cullen,
President of the Irish College,
Rome.

I remain,
Yours very truly,
THOS. OLLIFFE.

Rome, June 3d, 1843.

MY DEAR MR. ROSTAN,—It would give me great pain to refuse to one whom I so justly esteem as yourself, any favor which it might be in my power to confer. In compliance therefore with your request, I will send you the letter of his Eminence the Cardinal Prefect together with a translation of the same by my esteemed fellow-labourer, Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas. Lest, however, it should seem; that I have unnecessarily obtruded the subject of my elevation to the Archiepiscopal dignity, and the motives of his Holiness in thus honouring in so distinguished a manner, one of the humblest of his children, I think you will agree with me in admitting, that the letters you have so kindly forwarded to me, together with your own, ought to be published in the same number of the Herald.

I accept gratefully your congratulations. I shall ever cherish any mark of affection or respect which is offered to me by a Catholic, the whole tenor of whose life is an edifying illustration of the holiness of the Faith which he professes.

I remain, Dear Sir,

Your's faithfully,

+ P. J. CAREW.

TO THE MOST REV. P. J. CAREW,
*Archbishop of Edessa,
 Vicar Apostolic of Bengal,
 Calcutta.*

MY LORD,—As we have taken every opportunity to acquaint the Holy Father with the innumerable and inestimable services which your Grace formerly rendered to the cause of religion in the Apostolical Vicariate of Madras, and have since informed him of the devoted and unwearied zeal with which you are now labouring in Bengal to defend and advance Catholicity, and to establish still more firmly the authority of the Holy See, His Holiness, in order to give you some proof of the particular affection with which he regards you, as well as to shew you honor, and thus add to the influence which you so universally enjoy, has been pleased to promote you from the Episcopal to the Archiepiscopal dignity by translating you to the illustrious See of Edessa, the title lately borne by the ex-Secretary of the Holy Congregation, now His Eminence Cardinal Cadolini, Archbishop of Ferrara. We are exceedingly happy to communicate this intelligence to you, and at the same time prepare you for the Apostolical Letters, which will be delivered to you in the form of a brief, by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Olliffe, your Vicar General.

Meanwhile we beseech the God of all goodness and majesty to preserve and prosper your Grace to a great length of years.

Your Grace's most obedient,

JAS. PHILIP CARDINAL FRANSONI,

Prefect.

JOHN BRUNELLI,

Secretary.

Rome, Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 2d June, 1843.

On Wednesday August 2nd, there will be a Solemn High Mass at 6½ o'clock A. M. at St. Thomas' Church for the repose of the soul of the late Mrs. Margaret Prendergast.

FEAST OF ST. IGNATIUS.—We have been requested to mention that Monday next, the 31st July, being the feast of St. Ignatius of Loyala, there will be a High Mass at St. Thomas' Church, by the Most Rev. the Archbishop of Edessa, when the Rev. Mr. Sumner, S. J., will preach after the Gospel. The service to commence at 6½ o'clock.

BOMBAY,—We learn from the Bombay Courier, that the Right Rev. Dr. Whelan, Catholic Bishop of that Presidency, has presented the Library of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, with a copy of a work, entitled Aperuc, General Sur L'Egypte par a A. B. B. Clot.-Beg.

By a late precept of His Holiness, the office of St. Alphonsus Liguori, Bishop, &c. is to be recited on the second day of August. The office of St. Margaret is in consequence transferred to the 9th August, on which day a commemoration is to be made of the Vigil of St. Lawrence and of the Holy Martyr.

CEYLON.—Letters from Rome announce the promotion of the Right Rev. Doctor Caietano, late Vicar General of Ceylon, to the Episcopacy, and to the charge of the Ceylon Mission as Vicar Apostolic.

A letter from Alexandria, dated 6th ultimo, mentions that four French Missionaries of the Society of Jesus destined for Madras, passed thro' that city some days ago, and that they would probably take their passage in a Steamer to Bombay.

MADRAS.—A recent letter from St. Thomas' Mount, Madras, states that during the month of May, the month of Mary, twenty-four persons were received into the Church—of these, ten were Protestants and fourteen Heathens. Every week some are added to the fold of Christ, but not so many as in the month of May. Oh! how amply is not a Priest rewarded for his labour at seeing these poor creatures abandoning their brazen Idols and Pagodas, and regularly coming to the temple of the Most High and devoutly assisting at the sacrifice of the Altar. A very interesting circumstance which has led to the conversion of some of these poor Heathens, and likely to convert more of them with the assistance of God, we shall give in the words of the writer. "A poor heathen woman was very ill for three days in child birth and was despaired of by all, when some Christian women told her that if she promised the child to the God of the Christians, that she would be well,—she promised and prayed as they taught her, it was pleasing to God to relieve her. When she was well, she and many of her heathen friends brought the child, a boy, and requested that I should stand Sponsor for him, when telling me of this, they said that the God of the Christians was a great God. The child's Mother and Grandmother are under instruction and will be shortly prepared for Baptism. One of the Protestant Converts about a year ago, at my first interview with him, told me that he would drink the blood of a Priest, he detested them so much; but now, thank God, he is a most zealous Catholic."

If morality without religion is an uprooted plant, which the least wind will blow off the earth, religion, on its part, finds its strength in its union with morality. Here I freely acknowledge, that the world is entitled to act on the offensive; and this, indeed, it does with uproarious joy, whenever the occasion offers. "We admire the morality of the Gospel," say the adepts of the age; "but how comes it to pass that we find among those who call themselves Christians, men like that honourable English captain of the Olden time, who was the great robber of his profession, and who called himself the friend of God and the enemy of every one else? How is it, that we find persons whom the prosperity of others causes to pine away with jealousy?—others, who, viper-like, secretly gnaw away their neighbour's reputation?—misers, who serve God in public and Mammon in private?—nobles, who are not for their dependants the palm tree that gives its sweetfruit for food and its cooling shade for shelter to those that repose beneath it, but thorns and briers which tear the very rags of the indigence that approaches to them? Is religion without morality better than morality without religion?"—This is the question so often put by worldlings.

Alas! it is not: but the cockle has always grown up with the good grain; the enemy of God and man has sown it, and reaps his harvest of it. It existed under the Old Law it exists under the New Dispensation, notwithstanding the anathemas of Jesus Christ. Those who make religion—not the discharge of a duty, but the practice of a profession—who design to serve both God and the world,—who dishonour their faith by their works, are children of him who betrayed the Son of Man with a kiss. What ingratitude! Twelve men attached themselves to the fortunes of Jesus Christ—lived on the bread which he miraculously multiplied—drank of the chalice which he had blessed—heard from his lips the doctrine of life—and yet, one of them betrayed him, and sold him for thirty pieces of silver! Remembering this, we say to the world—we have not dissembled your bitter sarcasms; we have faithfully repeated what you daily utter. Yes, you see the cockle which comes up in the field of the Father of the family: but why do you turn away your eyes from the good grain? Why, above all, by confounding man with religion, render the latter responsible for all the crimes and weaknesses of human nature? Has the Gospel any precepts that favour hard-heartedness, falsehood, or hypocrisy? When Christ was crucified by the pharisees of the synagogue, did he say that they were models to be imitated? When his arms were extended on the cross, as if to comprehend the whole human race in his embrace, did he say—I dispense those who are mine from the practice of virtue; I break all your moral ties; I absolve you from all your secret crimes, provided you wash the outside of the cup, and preserve the exterior of virtue? Has that been said by him who was spirit and life? And if he has not said that, but has always inculcated the contrary, is it fair to charge religion with the enormities which she condemns?

According to us, the holiest alliance ever made on earth, is the union of morality with religion; and, in our ideas, perfection, a thing so beautiful and so rare, is comprised in one word—CHRISTIAN MORALITY. But Christian morality tends to servility, say our adversaries—it commands us to obey princes.

It enjoins obedience to those who govern, whatever be the name they bear. At Rome, it prescribed obedience to the senate, when the senate was charged with the government of the republic;—in Greece, to the assembly of the people;—in Turkey, to the Sultan—and to the Lucas in South America. If a government be equitable and just, what matters it to religion whether it be of this or of that form? We nowhere find that Jesus Christ, his Apostles, or any of the Fathers of the Church, ever sought by their discourses or writings, to deprive those with whom they lived, of the liberties guaranteed to them by their respective governments. If any proofs of the contrary exist, let them be produced:—but such are no where to be found.

And yet, it is daily repeated that Catholicism is hostile to the liberty of the people, and that its doctrines favour despotism. This assertion is a malignant calumny: it is an insult to the religion of Jesus Christ, to suppose it capable of entering into an iniquitous compact with tyranny, oppression, or injustice. No, thank God, such is not the case. When usurpation, conquest, violence, or dire necessity have placed on the people's neck the heavy yoke of servitude,—religion, remembering that civil war and insurrection have most disastrous consequences, suggests to such a people, a spirit of patience, of submission, and of peace, as the best remedy for their evils: it is by this means that she lightens the yoke of tyranny, but never has she herself imposed or sanctioned it.

If to enlighten the understanding by moderating the passions, be to render a service to morality, no religion has the superiority over ours in this regard. Julian, the apostate although he hated Christianity, could not avoid, infidel as he was, perceiving the immense advantages which the people derived from our moral instructions. Wishing to resuscitate polytheism, which had never condescended to speak reason to any one, he ordered the priests of idolatry to give sermons to the people in the temples! But what could these creatures say? The poets had sullied and dishonoured all the divinities of Olympus: there was no vice, no dark and disgraceful deed, which had not its apotheosis in heaven. In whose name could these priests of Mars, of Apollo, and of Venus, have presumed to preach? Every word they uttered would be belied by their religious annals.

The young debauchee of Terence,—who excited himself to crime by the sight of a picture of the gods whom he adored, and concluded it to be presumption in a poor mortal, like himself, to wish to be better than the great Jupiter,—only drew a legitimate consequence from his principles; for it is to be presumed that the divinity protects on earth those who are assimilated to him; and if he himself has given the example of vice, he must necessarily encourage it in others. It was very different with the Christians, for whom the light of good example beamed from heaven, and who recognized in God the source and exemplar of all moral excellence. The first benefit of Christianity among the pagans, was to purify the morals and resuscitate morality, which, like the victims of Heliogabalus, was expiring amid the flowers with which it was adorned.

But it may be said, if Christianity be such as you describe, to what can be attributed the immorality that prevails? We are Christians; are we the better on that account?

Undoubtedly you are: and if you are not still better than you are, it is because you seek to neutralize the benign influence which would render you virtuous and wise. I acknowledge that the present generation, although Christian, is bad and corrupt; which is indeed a reproach, when we consider the motives to virtuous action which are found in so holy a religion: but if, degenerate as we are, we no longer possess the primitive virtues of our fathers, we are at least better than the pagans; and never can a Christian people, even in the lowest stage of degeneracy, tolerate the abominations which Rome witnessed under the Cæsars. If our religion has not opposed an insurmountable barrier to the corruption of the age, it is because it was not possible to raise one which this could not transcend.

Christian worship tends of itself to infuse morality into the people, but it only produces its effect where it has the elements of faith to act upon. When these elements no longer exist, the influence of religion is retarded in its action, for it cannot act on nothing; but then morality has little to lose. When men have gone so far as to be able to live, without God, what restraint will they consent to tolerate?

But why does not religion always elevate the mind to the most sublime inspirations?—why is it sometimes allied to narrow views and niggardliness of soul?—The fault is in the nature of man, not in the doctrine which he professes. Weak and manly souls are equally capable of cultivation, says an Indian moralist, but they always produce fruits analogous to their nature. The science of the teacher does not make the scholar: the resplendent diamond reflects the glorious rays of light by which it is penetrated, while the sluggish earth absorbs and buries the ray it receives.*

Religion and morality, like two powerful and natural allies, cannot be at variance, without mutual ruin and dishonour: whoever attempts to separate them, is no friend to either.

Whenever an advocate of morality declaims against religion, there is always reason to believe that it is not his intellect, but his passions, that have triumphed over his faith. A bad life and a holy religion are two things which cannot well dwell together. When man endeavours to separate these twin-born of heaven, it can only be with the view of obtaining, cost what it may, a shameful peace within himself.

CONVERSION OF CAPTAIN H. KIRKE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—It is very gratifying to me to announce to you that yesterday I witnessed in our new Chapel at Landour, the solemn ceremony of the abjuration of the Protestant tenets made by Capt. H. Kirke before the Right Rev. Dr. Borghli. After the Gospel, his Lordship delivered an appropriate discourse, showing to the new Convert that his resolution to embrace the faith of his forefathers was reasonable, prudent and necessary for his eternal salvation. At the end of the Mass, the Convert approached the Holy Table, with the most edifying devotion, and at last he received from the hands of the Bishop the Sacrament of Confirmation. The new Convert, was a year ago, prepossessed of the most gross prejudices against the Catholic faith, as is the case usually with the greater number of our dissenting brethren. It was at the suggestion of one of his friends that he began to peruse different Catholic controversial books, and having found that he was erring from the faith as it is in Christ, he hastened to enter into the fold of that Church, which is One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic. I trust, nay I am sure, that his example will be followed by several others of our deluded brethren, who I know are enquiring after truth, and who are disgusted with Protestant absurdities and inconsistencies.

I remain Dear Sir,
Your's sincerely,
A SPECTATOR.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

Lines written on the 5th Anniversary of the Religious Profession of a Nun.

Welcome the fifth time, hail dear, cherished day,
Bring still thy gifts and my vows bear away
The gifts thou sawest my soul once adorn,
As sunbeams the face of earth newly born,—
The vows that went up then to heaven's high throne,
Thence forth God to love and serve him alone.

Haste lovely morn, in thy pure limpid dew,
My stains to efface,—these scenes to renew;
And as thou climbest the broad arch of day,
Chase from my soul all its darkness away.
Tell me still fondly of mercy above,
Pardons and patience, and graces and love;
And while thou wakest my mem'ry to fears,
See too my frailty and smile on my tears.

Soon to be number'd with all that is past,
Say, wilt thou return, or art thou the last?
Welcome thy rising, farewell thy decline,
On earth or in heav'n, I'll reckon thy mine.

Farewell, bright messenger, once yet adieu,
A cloud still retains the gold of thy hue;
Poised on the verge of dread eternity,
A look it seems thou wouldst cast back at me,—
A look that tells, like the silence of awe,
What ear hath not heard and eyes never saw.

Life never failing and never begun,
The ONE in THREE, and the THREE still in ONE;—
JUSTICE offended—MERCY imploring, MAJESTY throned—Seraphs adoring;—
The first made the last, and the last made the first,
The doom of the proud, the crowns of the just;—
The music of heav'n, the joy, the delight,
Garments of glory—oceans of light;—
Christ, with his Saints, triumphing for ever,
Peace evermore, or peace again, never.

Thus spoke that last look, or seemed it to say,
As from the cloud it stole melting away.

Selections.

BRISTOL.

At a public meeting of the Roman Catholics of Bristol held at the New Catholic School-room, St. James's Back, for the purpose of agreeing to a petition against the adoption of the educational clauses of the Factory Bill.

The Rev. F. Edgeworth, said (after some preliminary remarks), no man could detest more than he detested the attempt which was being made to force poor Catholics, by the stringent provisions of an Act of Parliament, into difficulties by which at present they were not beset. He might widely differ, as he was sure he did, from many gentlemen, as to what would be the most effectual way of opposing the bill, but as to the duty of opposing it by every possible means, there could not be a difference of opinion among Catholics. (Cheers.) The resolution stated the grievances which the bill contained with regard to Catholics. First, they complained that it contained no provision for the religious education of the children of Catholics, of Dissenters, or of those parents who were not known to belong to any distinct outward form of religion. (Hear.) In what country were they living? Could it be in a land, which boasted that it was beyond all others the land of freedom? (Hear.) A country which, within their own recollection, had destroyed, or affected to destroy, all the barriers to perfect religious freedom. The repeal of the test and corporation acts had this avowed object as far as Dissenters were concerned,—the enactment of the Emancipation Bill as far as Catholics were concerned. (Hear.) Perfectly inconsistent, then, with those just acts was the bill now before Parliament, or any measure which infringed on the religious rights of any portion of the community. (Cheers.) They must maintain, and publicly assert, that every law which gave the least favour to any one denomination of Christians in this country, was unfair and unjust towards the professors of every other religion. (Cheers.) Tell him not that the members of the Established Church were more numerous than Dissenters and Catholics put together; that was not a plea which could defend injustice. If a measure were proposed for applying the public money to Catholic purposes, he, as a subject and a citizen, would lift his voice against it. (Hear.) As a Catholic he would say, as he said before—leave religion to her own support. At all events he would say, "While there are so many diversities of religious opinion as, beyond all precedent, there are now in this country, it is not just to ask me, for the advancement of my religion, to impose a tax upon others who do not believe it to be the true one." (Cheers.) The real meaning of religious freedom was, the law's protection of all sects in the exercise of their religion. The law did not protect all when it favored one at the expense of the others. The true object of the present bill was, to remunerate the ministers of the Church of England for attending to the religious instruction of the children. It did not do the same by Dissenters—it gave not a fraction to the Catholic clergyman. It was unjust, and they opposed it. (Cheers.) Then, as to the practical method in which to oppose it—he would say, let ministers, if they thought it well, raise taxes for the secular education of the "poor. Or, if they must raise taxes for the purposes of religious instruction, let them take care to give a fair proportion to every known body of Dissenters, and to Catholics, and only a fair proportion to the Established Church. (Cheers.) Any petition embodying those sentiments would have his most hearty support. Another objection to the bill was, that it required Catholic children to read in the Protestant version of the Scriptures. It might be a difficult thing to satisfy Protestants as to the grounds upon which this objection was founded; and he knew very well that they were surrounded, by clamorous people, who would seize on the opportunity of exclaiming "Oh, you Catholics are inimical to the reading of the Scriptures, and your pastors, your bishops, and priests, exert themselves to the best of their power to prevent your reading the Scriptures." (Hear.) It ought to be known in those days, to those who were most ignorant of the Catholic religion, that a more unfounded calumny was never uttered. (Cheers.) The Catholic Church took care that the version she put into the hands of her children was made with the greatest care—not a version made to suit a secular and temporary purpose—not to bolster up a religion which, without the aid of Acts of Parliament, would have sunk perhaps by this time into nothing, but a pure and true version. The version of the Scriptures used by the Established Church, and which that act proposed should be put into the hands of the children, was in many of its most important passages false. (Hear.) It was known to some of the highest biblical scholars in the world, on points which Catholics considered all important, to be a mistranslation of the original text. It might or it might not be known to Sir James Graham and the senators, but it was known to the Catholic bishops and clergy, and to many of the laity, that the version of Scripture appointed to be read in all the Protestant churches was singularly incorrect. (Applause.) That was not the place to enter into a discussion of the subject, but the truth of what he had asserted had been established before, and if needs be, with God's help, it could be again. The Catholic Church did not object to read the Scriptures; her pastors were strictly enjoined to do so, and their people were living witnesses that they did so. (Cheers.) They objected to the use of this incorrect version, because they were desirous that their children should know the Scripture, and not have their souls endangered by the dogmas of a false translation. He came now to another objection to the bill. It required that Catholic children, in order to have any share in its advantages, must join in prayer with persons who differed from them in faith. For the information of some, it might be well for him to give the reason why they objected to this provision of the proposed act. It was unlawful, according to the principles of the Catholic religion, for Catholics to join in prayer with those of a different faith. Let it not be supposed that this arose from any want of charity. No, they were enjoined to be in charity with their fellow men throughout the world. But they thought there was such a thing as communion of the saints; they thought that in matters of religion there was a communion between them and others. The foundation of their religion was faith, and they believed that without faith it was impossible to please God; without mutual faith there could be no communion between them and others; without mutual faith there was nothing in common between them and others of a religious character. There was communion of a worldly and earthly character; they met others in society, and it was the duty of Catholics to do all the good for them they could; but, if there were not a communion of faith, they could not join together in prayer. There was another reason, and he would avow it, why this wholesome discipline of the Catholic Church was maintained: if poor Catholic children were permitted to join in prayer with those of other religious denominations, there would be a danger of their being led away from the faith of their forefathers—probably to adopt the loose and dangerous principle that it mattered little or nothing to what religion they belonged. Now the Catholic Church waited not till evil had overtaken her children; she foresaw the evil, and she closed the door against it. (Cheers.) She said to her disciples, "Join not in matters of religion with those who are separated from you. Live in perfect charity and true benevolence with all men, but do not that which will place the weak in danger of being led away from the faith." There was a third reason. The pastors of the Catholic Church had also the welfare of their separated brethren in view (hear), whenever they refused to join with them in acts of religion. Their brethren might be thereby induced to inquire, "How is this that Catholics will not join with us, even in saying the Lord's Prayer—even in matters where there seems to be no difference between us?" When this was asked, inquiry was entered upon, and they had gained a step. They wished to encourage inquiry—they wished their erring brethren to reflect that they wanted the very basis of religion—that which their forefathers regarded as the basis: they wanted faith. (Hear.) By not mingling with them, then, in religious exercises they led them to inquire. Many there were lulled in dangerous security and inaction who might be awakened to a desire—as many thousands now were—some even in Oxford University—a hankering desire to return to the church of their forefathers, from which they had unhappily departed. This desire was now spreading throughout England, and if they joined in prayer with separatists, they (the separatists) might be induced to suppose that in substance they were right; for they, at least, could join with the true Church in prayer. That was a delusion they (the Catholics) would not favour, and they therefore said, "We will not join with those of a different faith in prayer." The world might call them uncharitable—bigoted if it liked; but to this holy principle of the Church they would adhere. (Cheers.) A fourth objection to the bill was, that it was in principle a new penal act which inflicted temporal disadvantages on Catholics. Surely these were not the days for re-enacting penal laws. If this country was to triumph over unprecedented difficulties arising from the unequal distribution of wealth,—if the Government desired to reconcile the poor to the rich—if it desired to reconcile the millions who dissented from the Church to the Church, it could not accomplish its purpose by the re-enactment of penal laws. (Cheers.) If Ministers intended fairly—and he could not go so far as some, and deny that they did so—if, as he believed they did, the Government intended fairly to do what they could for the peace of the country, they would not force the passing of this bill. He believed that they meant fairly, because, as mere politicians, it was their interest to preserve the peace of the nation—to do away, as far as possible, with all causes of dissatisfaction and mistrust, and not to cast more ingredients into that cauldron, which was now ready to boil over. It was their duty—it was their interest, to appease and tranquillize the nation. Having to contend with unprecedented difficulties, it was hard to conceive how men in their senses—men having even an ordinary share of judgment and experience, and who did not desire to increase the troubles of the country, could have been led to propose the adoption of such a measure. Surely nothing could be more likely to endanger the public peace than an unwise attempt to force it upon Dissenters and Catholics. As Catholics, they were pretty much used to be treated as the last of the community in this country, had perhaps, their forbearance might restrain them from offering any violent resistance to the measure should it become the law. But he would say to Sir James Graham, “Beware of the Methodists, do not slight the Baptists (hear): remember their system—admirable it is—every member closely united with his fellow member. Remember, too, that they are millions!” (Cheers.) They were at variance with the bill, and he (Mr. Edgeworth) thought that they had taken the right view of it, and he wished them all success in their opposition to it—an opposition which was likely to be more astounding in its nature than any the British Catholics could offer. For the sake of the country’s tranquillity, let the Government retrace its steps now, while it could do so with something like honour. Another objection to the bill was, that it required the parent to give notice, when he objected to his child receiving the religious instruction of the school, that he did so upon religious grounds. Why should the poorest of mankind be called upon, day after day, to become heroes in religion? (Cheers.)—to go to the trustees and say, “No, if you will not teach my child without undermining, in his mind, those principles of religion which I value more than life, send him back to me ignorant and uninstructed!” No doubt there was many a poor Catholic who would not shrink from thus boldly avowing his faith (cheers); but no just Government would place him in circumstances which rendered it necessary that he should become this hero. Ministers could not be aware of the operation of the bill on Catholics, and because, with their pliant faith, they could give up much for the attainment of temporal advantages—because they had not the same unpliant faith as Catholics had, they must have fallen into the delusion that it was not, to Catholics, of a persecuting character,

The last objection to the bill was, that Catholic children would be instructed in books which had no regard for the religion of Catholics, and in which passages were often contained insulting to them. He did not believe that in this respect the Government intended to do violence to their consciences—he believed that it was done in supreme ignorance of Catholic principles. (Hear.) Why did not the Government, if it would force books upon them, consult the Prelates of the Catholic Church concerning them? Of all matters religious in their tendency or essence, the Prelates of the Catholic Church were the duly authorized judges. It might be said, that they (the Catholics) were priest and bishop-ridden, that they were enslaved in body and mind. But they were satisfied that they were at least consistent. They enjoyed, and they wished that their separated brethren would come and enjoy with them, the guidance they had in that authority. (“Hear,” and cheers.) It was the Catholic principle that no man, however exalted in station, however wise, however adorned by education, should be allowed to step in as their champion in matters of religion and conscience. In those matters, their authorized guides were their Prelates—the appointed bishops of their souls. There was another point of view in which they regarded this measure. They were citizens, and as such they had communion with all men, and they asked them to unite in resisting a measure which levied a tax on the whole community for the benefit of a particular class. (Cheers.) It was not that he objected that money should be raised for education. God forbid! He wished that much that had been dissipated, had been devoted to so good a purpose. But, as a citizen, he protested against raising any tax, if its product was not to be fairly applied for the benefit of all, without regard to religious distinctions. The Government could pursue one or two courses. It could altogether abstain from raising money for religious education, and raise it merely for the purposes of secular education—the education of the poor in sound knowledge; leaving their religious instruction to be supplied by the zeal and energy of the various religious denominations. This was one course, and it could do injustice to no one. There was a second course, which was perfectly just, and which he should like to see adopted. Sir Robert Peel might say, “Let us raise a tax for the education, both secular and religious, of the poor of this country; but seeing that there is a great outcry against it among the Catholics—those I might pass by if they were the only ones; but seeing there is a great outcry among the Dissenters, who are more numerous, wealthy, and combined, let us get the tax, but apportion it fairly; let us apportion it, for instance, in the way the rate-payers shall (when they pay it) say they wish it to be apportioned. If we find opposite a person’s name in the books, Dissenter, we will apportion it to Dissenters; if Catholics, to Catholics; and so on.” This would be a perfectly just course. If Sir Robert Peel were to announce his intention of adopting this course, with what would he have to contend? Perhaps, with the Bishop of London—perhaps with the Bishop of Exeter (a laugh)—perhaps with other men who, living fortunate times, had risen from stations not more honourable than that which he (Mr. Edgeworth) then filled, to the highest in the state. The Bishop of Exeter might say to him, “You are unfaithful to your trust; you do not properly recognise the Church," and in terms of eloquence to which he (the speaker) would not pretend, he might rail at the Premier. (Laughter.) Well, Sir Robert Peel might very naturally turn round to him and say, "The Church—What is the Church?" He might receive no answer from the Right Rev. Lord of Exeter. He might go on, "I have received the complaints of millions of Dissenters, and they tell me that the Church is the great incubus on this country. I have received the complaints of millions of millions of Catholics in Ireland, and of many thousands in Scotland and England. They tell me that the Catholic is the Church; and really, my Lord, if I consider what has been said by many high authorities at Oxford, the Catholics have much reason for what they say. (Cheers and laughter.) To come to business at once, my ministry depends on my doing something to satisfy the people; I must do something for the poor, and there are a great many Dissenters, in the country. I am sorry that I cannot grant a favour to you and your Episcopal brethren, but I am bound by circumstances to be fair." (Cheers.) He must be perfectly just—they could admit of no compromise—no half and half measure. They would not accept of the Bank of England if it were to be the price of their religious freedom. (Cheers.)—Tablet, April 29.

PETITION ISSUED BY THE CATHOLIC INSTITUTE.—

To the Honourable the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled;

The humble petition of the undersigned Roman Catholics of.

SHEWETH,

That your petitioners humbly conceive, that by the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and the passing of the act of one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, commonly called the Catholic Emancipation Act, and other previous acts, the principle of an equality of civil rights by all classes of her Majesty's subjects, irrespective of religious distinctions or denomination, was fully and for ever recognised by the Legislature.

That by certain provisions for promoting education among the humbler classes, contained in a bill lately introduced into your Honourable House, intitled, "A Bill for regulating the Employment of Children and young Persons in Factories, and for the better Education of Children in Factory Districts," this principle appears to your petitioners to be most seriously and alarmingly endangered.

That one of the most important and valuable privileges which any people can enjoy is freedom of education, unfettered by religious tests, or compulsory, or penal enactments.

That while your petitioners would hail with peculiar satisfaction a measure having for its object the educating of the rising generation, they cannot but view with great alarm and distrust any plan which may invest the clergy of the Established Church, or any constituted body from which Roman Catholics are either expressly or virtually excluded, with any control over the education of Roman Catholic children.

That the bill in question is, as it affects the education of Roman Catholic youth, particularly objectionable, inasmuch as by the constitution of the schools proposed to be established under the said bill:—

1. Roman Catholics are virtually excluded from any share in the direction of such schools.

2. Roman Catholic children, as a condition of being allowed to accept employment in factories, are to be compelled in such schools to read a version of the Holy Scriptures not authorized by the Catholic Church, and to join in Protestant prayers.

3. The trustees of each school are to be empowered to determine the books to be used in the school under their direction, without any provision being made to prevent them from introducing works directly or indirectly hostile to the Catholic Religion, or repugnant to the feelings of Roman Catholics.

4. While Protestant children attending Roman Catholic schools are not to be admitted into factories, and while facilities are to be afforded for the erection and endowment of Protestant schools, liable to the foregoing and other objections, no provision whatever is made for the erection and support of Roman Catholic schools, in which Roman Catholic children, who are very numerous in the factory districts, may receive the secular education contemplated by the bill, for qualifying them to obtain admission into the factories.

5. The provision enabling the parent of a Roman Catholic child to object to the religious instruction and religious worship in the schools, is not sufficient in many cases to prevent Roman Catholic children from being taught Protestant doctrine, and such children should be entitled to absent themselves from such religious instruction and worship without being specially required to do so by their parents.

6. In addition to the foregoing and other objections, your petitioners consider the placing of the efficiency of Roman Catholic schools under the approbation of an inspector, to be highly objectionable particularly when no pecuniary provision is made by the bill to make such schools efficient. Besides, the power with which it is proposed to invest the inspector, to refuse certificates to Protestant children educated at Roman Catholic schools is most inquisitorial, inasmuch as it gives him a dangerous discretion, to determine who, in his opinion, are Protestants and who are not—a power incompatible with liberty of conscience.

That while your petitioners earnestly desire to meet the wishes of the Government in mitigating the severity of infantine labour, and at the same time, to give universal religious education to the children of artisans and the labouring classes, they cannot conceal from themselves, nor dissemble from your Honourable House, that they can discover no other adequate and unexceptionable method, than by providing, in so far as Roman Catholic children in factories and manufacturing districts are concerned, separate schools for their religious education, to be assisted, if not maintained, by a grant from Parliament.

That your petitioners cannot too earnestly impress upon your Honourable House, their own deep and solemn conviction, that all other protection must necessarily fail in sheltering individuals so destitute in their circumstances, and consequently so open to every kind of compulsory influence both from within and without the national schools, and in the factories, as are the children of the Roman Catholic poor.

Moreover, your petitioners would entreat leave to observe, that to measure the efficiency of the present schools, in which (where they do exist) the Roman Catholic children are taught, and whence their certificates of employment are to issue, by a standard taken from National Schools founded or supported from the national purse, or from the most wealthy portion of this rich community, would be obviously unjust and oppressive that these schools, in their locality, their tenure, their capacity and dimensions, bear too strong evidence of the poverty and wretchedness of the class they educate. Your petitioners therefore pray your Honourable House not to press still more upon the afflicted condition of this most helpless class, whose case they cannot doubt will find a sympathy and advocacy in every humane and generous breast, however the individual may differ from the claimant, in country or in religion. "Let but the maxim, common to all Christian creeds, "Do by others as we wish others to do unto us," guide your Honourable House, as your petitioners confide it will, and your petitioners, resting on that powerful advocacy, will not doubt a result satisfactory to their wishes, and safe to their conscience.

In conclusion, your petitioners feel assured that your Honourable House will do them the justice to believe, that in urging at some length, on the present occasion, the nature of their apprehensions under the bill now before your Honourable House they are actuated by no desire to frustrate the declared intentions of the Government to promote the education of the poorer classes of her Majesty's subjects.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

The religious horizon is too big with portentous forebodings, not to make the smallest speck that comes to settle on it worthy of attention, as the possible harbinger of a general commotion among the discordant elements with which it is charged; and this observation appears to us pre-eminently to apply to those tiny publications with which we have headed our article, and which figure under so many dignified and learned names; as if the weight of authority under which they are presented to the world were to make amends for the scantiness of their pages, and the meagre quality of their contents. The main and professed object of most, is the Oxford controversy. Fully and completely impressed as we are, with the immeasurable importance of this most interesting discussion, we must own that our surprise and disappointment were great, when we saw it generally treated with such shallow logic, and dismissed with such a flippant confidence that the task was done. For it does appear to us to savour somewhat of presumption, to imagine that a course of doctrines, which had long heretofore been held and maintained by those whom we have ever been accustomed to consider as the standard divines of the Anglican Church (to use a favourite and familiar expression of its advocates), which for a season reigned triumphant in her, and has never altogether ceased to hold its ground among some of the more earnest of her followers; which is now revived with a weight of learning and acuteness of research, backed by a most edifying zeal and piety; and which carries conviction throughout her ranks to an extent which threatens almost universal adherence to this winning interpretation of her articles; should be so easily abashed and refuted, and so readily disposed of. We have conceived too high an opinion of the intrinsic merit of these doctrines, even defective as they are, and have formed too favourable a judgment of the superior virtues of their professors, to believe that either the one or the other are to be so summarily mastered.

Yet it is not in this sense that we mean to deal with these publications. We have too abundant occupation in our own, to think of labouring in another's vineyard; and while we merely record, in passing, the general verdict, as in our humble judgment it appears to stand between the respective combatants, we propose strictly to confine ourselves to those items of the controversy which more immediately bear upon ourselves.

● To take then the first in dignity, as in repute and importance—the charge of the Lord Bishop of London; we cannot but acquiesce in the propriety of the principle laid down in the exordium, that "it will be his endeavour, in humble reliance upon the guidance of the Holy Spirit, not to enter in to a polemical discussion on the truth of the doctrines or the propriety of the rites and ceremonies, which will come under consideration, but to act as an interpreter of the Church's sense as to the one, and of her will as to the other." As an exemplification of the method of working this rule, and as an accessory to it, we must continually bear in mind the following very just observation,—“It is our duty,” adds the right rev. prelate, a little later, “in searching those inspired records, to avail ourselves of all the helps to a right understanding of them, placed within our reach; to ascertain, when it is possible, the sense in which they were understood by the disciples and immediate successors of the apostles, and which was derived from them to the early Church at large.” For if once we lose sight of this we shall not fail to be led astray, and seduced, it may be, into some of those numerous and contradictory interpretations (perhaps into the very doctrines advocated by the right rev. prelate), into which a departure from this wise injunction has caused so many to fall, in common with himself; every one of which interpretations is far enough removed from the interpretation of the early Church.* But when in proceeding with his judicious preliminary observations, the right rev. prelate goes on to say, "If the view which I have taken of the subject be correct, it follows as a necessary inference, that in this country the clergy of the national Church, and they alone, are entitled to the respect and obedience of the people, as their lawful guides and governors in spiritual things: that they alone are duly commissioned to preach the word of God, and to minister his holy sacraments,"—we must beg leave, at the outset, to demur upon the assertion, and to take the fullest advantage of the very edifying hesitation with which this otherwise consoling "inference" is heralded forth. For if this position be tenable (and that is admitted to be the question), we are driven out of the field at once, much quicker indeed than we are disposed to go: for, convincing as the case may appear to some, it does but put us upon our mettle to maintain our rights, and assert our claim to the very honours here so exclusively adjudged to others, and those others our rivals. And it is this which we propose to do, by the blessing of God, though as succinctly as possible, relying rather upon the force than the number of our arguments. We shall indeed like the right rev. prelate, allow the Church and her standard divines to speak for themselves, and to be their own interpreters of their own doctrines; and if by this course we shall make it appear, as we confidently trust we shall, that the priority of right belongs to us, we shall then briefly show that such rights are never forfeited but by schism or apostasy, and that these are crimes of which we at least are wholly innocent. Let us then consider for a moment the true meaning of THE CHURCH; her attributes; her authority; her destiny; as propounded to us by the great fathers and doctors of the Church—those

* As a passing proof of the prescriptive rights which this method of testing the truth has obtained from ancient usage, we will note an early instance of its application, which we extract from Dollinger, p. 172. vol. i.

"In the early part of the third century, an unknown author confuted the errors of Artemon; fragments of his work have been preserved by Eusebius, who, on the authority of Photius, ascribes it to Calus, a priest of Rome. The Artemonites defended their errors by their pretended antiquity and apostolicity. Their doctrines, they maintained, had been universal down to the time of Pope Victor: his successor Zephyrinus, corrupted the truth, and introduced the modern doctrine of the Divinity of Christ. Calus, or whoever was the author of the work against these heretics, appealed to the writings of Justin, Miltiades, Fabian, Clement, Irenaeus Melito, and many others in all of which Christ is spoken of as God, (θεολογεται) and to the hymns and canticles which, from the beginning of the Church, had been composed by faithful brethren, which proclaim Christ as the Logos of God, and celebrate his Divine nature. With regard to Pope Victor, he declares, that he had excommunicated Theodotus, the first of their false teachers; he could not therefore have participated in his heresy."

This rule, it must be observed, has the priority by many centuries, over that mixed and modified method, prescribed by the Canon of the Church of England, of 1571, which, when it comes to be analyzed and applied, is altogether unavailable to its purpose, for it excludes half the doctrines of the Articles. That only is to be taught, it says, which "has been collected out of the Old and New Testament, by the Catholic fathers and ancient bishops." Bishop Bloomfield may also mean to qualify his rule by this same injunction of the Canon. But if so, he is thrown at once into a dilemma;—if he take Catholic evidence for Catholic doctrine, he must take it in its integrity; if he picks and chooses, instead of the doctrine of the Catholic fathers and ancient bishops, he takes his own.

witnesses and interpreters of her teaching, the Jewells, the Hookers, the Andrewses, the Bramhalls, the Hammonds, the Taylors, the Bulls of primitive antiquity. And if all this can be clearly ascertained, we can have no further difficulty; for be it remembered, that Christianity is matter of fact and matter of history,—by no means matter of opinion. It was a sacred deposit once (for all) delivered to the saints, to be by them dogmatically delivered to others unto the end of time. What was delivered and believed at first—THAT is the true doctrine and the true faith.

St. Justin Martyr, who suffered at Rome about the year 167, writing on authority, what argument does he put forth to combat the pretensions of the Jews? "The Scriptures teach us," says he, "that there shall be another and an eternal law, dependant upon a sovereign authority, which all those who aspire to an everlasting inheritance must thenceforth obey. That law is the law of Jesus Christ.* He afterwards exemplifies his meaning in this same Dialogue with Tryphon, who had observed that many of those who were called Christians eat without scruple of the meats immolated to idols, by replying "I admit the fact, but we hold no communion with this sort of Christians, who only confess Christ with their lips. We do not even commonly give them the name of Christians, but we call some Marcionites, others Valentinians, or Basilidians, after the author of their respective sects. As to those who are really Christians, they are so far from contaminating themselves by partaking of meats offered to idols, that they would sooner suffer death than do so."† All this was drawing "practical inferences" from his premises somewhat distinct, we opine, from the fatalist opinions of modern times. And speaking of the converted Jews, he proceeds to say: "If through weakness there are those who in part observe the law of Moses, believing also in Jesus Christ, and observing his commandments, without making any difficulty about living with other Christians, nor obliging them to these observances, my opinion is that they should be received as brethren. But if their object is to compel the Gentile converts to the same observances, under pain of breaking communion with them, then do I disown them."‡ He then passes on to another exemplification of this his doctrine, of the paramount authority of the new law, which he every where identifies with the Church and of the exclusiveness of her inheritance. "It is the same with those," says he, "of the race of Abraham, who live by their own law; if they believe not in Jesus Christ before death, they shall not be saved, more especially those who pronounce anathemas in the synagogues and persecute such as believe in him." Let us observe, for a moment, how this evidence is corroborated and enlarged by his contemporary, St. Irenaeus, who was raised to the bishopric of Lyons in 177, and suffered martyrdom in 202. In his third book against the heresies of his times to bring the full force of tradition to bear upon the controversy, he took it for granted that if the apostles had held back from the public any mysterious doctrines, to teach them merely to the more perfect, they certainly were bound above all to communicate them to the bishops, as to those whom they destined for their successors in the government of the faithful. "Nevertheless," he adds, "not one of these bishops has taught any thing but what we teach and believe at this day; we know it from those who have succeeded each other from the beginning, without interruption, and whom we recognise so perfectly that we can here give an exact list of them. But not to stop to enumerate them all, let us confine ourselves to the Church of Rome, the most renowned and the most ancient; known to the whole world, and founded by the glorious apostles, Peter and Paul. We know that these two chose Linus to govern this Church after them. To Linus succeeded Anacletus; then followed Clement, Evaristus, Alexander, Sixtus, Telesphorus, who suffered a glorious martyrdom, Hyginus, Pius, Anicetus, Scoter, and lastly Eleutherius, who is at this day the twelfth bishop of Rome. It is by the tradition of this Church, and by the faith preached and preserved down to us by these worthy successors of the apostles, of whom we have just spoken, that we confound all those who dare to form themselves into unlawful assemblies; whether it be by self-love, or by vain-glory, or by a blind delusion or by whatever other motive; because it is to this Church, as to the chief, that the universal Church, that is to say, all the faithful are obliged to unite themselves, because she has ever inviolably preserved the traditions of the apostles."* (To be continued)

* Ceillier, vol. ii. p. 156.

"Ad hanc enim Ecclesiam propter potius principalitatem necesse est omnem convenire Ecclesiam, hoc est, eos qui sunt undique fideles, in quossemper ab his, qui sunt undique, conservata est ea quae est ab Apostolis Traditio.—Iren. lib. iii. c. 3.

"Things being thus made plain, (the descent of doctrine from the apostles,) it is not from others that truth is to be sought, which may be readily learned from the Church. For to this Church, as into a rich repository, the apostles committed whatever is of divine truth, that each one if so inclined, might thence draw the drink of life. This is the way to life: all other teachers must be shunned as thieves and robbers. For what I should there be any dispute on a point of small moment, must not recourse be had to the most ancient Churches, where the apostles resided and from them collect the truth?" Adv. Hereses, lib. iii. c. iv. p. 178 Ed. Ben.

"It is a duty to obey the precepts of the Church, who hold their succession from the apostles, and who, with that succession, received, agreeably to the will of the Father, the sure pledge of truth. But as to those who belong not to that leading succession in whatever place they may be united, they should be suspected, either as heretics, or as schismatics, proudly extolling, and pleasing themselves, or as hypocrites, actuated by vain glory or the love of lucre. But they who impugn the truth and excite the others to oppose the Church of God, their fate is with Dathan and Abiron; while schismatics, who violate the Church's unity, experience the punishment which fell on King Jeroboam." Ibid. L. iv. c. xxvi. p. 262.

"Teaching of the Church is true and stable, showing to all men the same one path of salvation; for to her has been committed the light and the wisdom of God. As the wise man says: (Prov. c. i.) "she uttereth her voice in the streets, she crieth on the highest walls, she speaketh without ceasing in the city gates. Every where the Church proclaims the truth; she is the candlestick with the seven lamps; (Exod. xxv.) bearing the light of Christ." Adv. Hereses L. v. c. xx. p. 317. Faith of Catholics of the five first Centuries, &c. pp. 11, 52.

Confin'd, as we are within a short and given space, it is impossible to gratify the reader by many original quotations. We have, therefore, generally preferred merely to note their sense, which we have chiefly taken from Ceillier's standard work in 25 vols., 4 to, entitled "Histoire Generale des Auteurs sacres et Ecclesiastiques, &c. Paris, Ed. 1725. Still it is impossible to do more than glance even at these; our object is only to draw the attention of the sincere enquirer to the subject, pledging ourselves that we will be amply repaid for every step by which he advances in the task.

FIDELITY OF THE IRISH TO THEIR RELIGION.

"Let them look to the history of religion in Ireland, and it did her honour, beyond the power of human language to depict; and it was owing to the holiness of her people that she got the denomination of the Island of Saints. There was no infidelity amongst them; religious sentiment was daily increasing in its progress, and pervaded the entire island. Centuries, elapsed before Christianity was established in other countries, but in four years after the landing of St. Patrick all Ireland was converted. The rapidity with which that took place was not followed by fickleness or change, though they had been tried in the furnace of persecution, and for 300 years plunder, and spoliation, and robbery, and persecution, fell upon the devoted people of Ireland. When he was born, no Catholic could have a horse worth more than five pounds, for if he had, any Protestant in the community might offer him five pounds and take away the horse. They would not bear that treatment now."—O'Connell.

MISCELLANEA.

ROMAN LIBERALITY AND OXONIAN BIGOTRY.

—A few years ago I visited St. Peter's Church in Rome, and among the masterpieces of art which adorn that wonder of the world, I was somewhat surprised to learn that the mausoleum of Pope Pius VII. had been executed by a Protestant sculptor, Thorwaldsen, the well known Phideas of Denmark. Expressing my astonishment to a dignified Italian clergyman, he replied, that really that circumstance did not occur to him before as anything very remarkable; that his countrymen were in the habit of attending more to the talent than to the religion of the artist in matters appertaining to the fine arts. The good sense of the observation struck me most forcibly on reading in the Sun newspaper, of Tuesday last, that, "Important alterations are to be made in some of the colleges of Oxford University. Balliol is to undergo a thorough repair, the direction of which was entrusted to Mr. Pugin, the celebrated Catholic architect. The Master of the college objected to the employment of this gentleman, and Mr. Pugin's engagement is consequently broken off."—Correspondent, Prior-park, Bath.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—It has hitherto been the practice in the Episcopal Church to administer the Communion on Good Friday. The minister of St. George's Chapel Edinburgh, however who has for some time made himself conspicuous as a reviver of old rules and associations, has given notice this week, that no sacrament would be consecrated on that day; and that, inasmuch as it may not suit the convenience of all parties to attend the Holy Table on Easter Sunday, the Lord's Supper will be repeated on the Sunday following—in point of fact, that the Indulgence continues till Low Sunday.

Francis Mathew, Esq., the brother of Father Mathew, expired last week at his seat Rockview county Tipperary.—Tablet.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1843.

[Vol. V.]

FEAST OF ST. IGNATIUS.

On Monday last, the Feast of this great Saint was celebrated with great solemnity at St. Thomas' Church, when the Rev. Ignatius X. Mascarenhas performed the High Mass, assisted by Rev. Messrs Cuvelier and Rabascall, as Deacon and Sub-deacon. His Grace the Archbishop, and almost all the Clergy were present. The Choir was unusually strong on this occasion, having had, in addition to the ready and valuable assistance of Mr. Valadares, the aid of Mr. Philip Dehnar. The singing throughout was solemnly exquisite. After the Gospel had been chanted by the Rev. Mr. Rabascall, the Rev. Mr. Sumner ascended the pulpit and delivered an animated and eloquent discourse. We regret not to have it in our power to give more than a mere abstract of the discourse :

The Rev. Gentleman took for his text :

Well done thou good and faithful servant because thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will set thee over many things, enter thou into the joy of the Lord” He opened his discourse by showing from St. Paul, that fidelity to God ought to be the distinguishing perfection of a Minister of Jesus Christ and dispenser of the mysteries of God. St. Ignatius displayed his fidelity; 1st, in the care which he took to acquire the dispositions requisite for the sacred ministry; and 2d, in the zeal which urged him to fulfil with exactness the duties of the ministry. In the first part he treated of the self-denial and austerity which the Saint practised to purify his soul from every sinful stain and to adorn it with every great and solid virtue, and of the humility, patience, fortitude and magnanimity with which, at the age of thirty-three, he commenced a course of elementary studies; for, like the gentlemen of his age, he was versed in no other science but that of Arms, before his entering on his spiritual career. In the second part, the Rev. Gentleman, rapidly glancing over the many acts of ardent charity, exalted courage, invincible patience, which the Saint performed in discharging the duties of a dispenser of God's house, referred to the establishment of the SOCIETY OF JESUS as a proof of the Saint's unbounded desire of advancing the divine glory on earth; a Society, whose sole end is God's Glory and the salvation of men; which preaches the gospel to every people without distinction; which, not bound to one means rather than another, embraces every means of glorifying God and sanctifying souls—public schools, preaching, missions, retreats, knowledge of sciences, human and divine; which solemnly renounces all salary and all dignity; which vows to employ itself wheresoever the Sovereign Pontiff may think proper to direct; which perpetuated from age to age and always animated with the same spirit, substitutes in place of the workmen whom it loses, others to succeed them, to fight the same battles and win the same victories—to make the same sacrifices of health, repose, reputation and life.

In conclusion, the Rev. Gentleman exhorting his fellow-clergymen to carry out the design and to emulate the virtues of St. Ignatius, remarked “If our hardships and trials in this country are severe, it is no small encouragement for us to reflect, that we are acting under the eye of a Prelate, who, setting a noble example, surpasses all others in toil as much as in dignity; whose virtue and zeal are equalled only by his high talents and unbounded erudition; and who, in the monuments of piety and charity which he has raised, shows, that the Divine Spirit moves the feelings of his heart and directs the counsels of his understanding.”

VISIT OF THE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD ELLENBOROUGH TO LORETTO HOUSE AND ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

We borrow the following from the Eastern Star of last Sunday :

"On Friday, the 28th instant, the Right Honorable the Governor General honored with a visit the Loretto Convent. On his arrival at the establishment, his Lordship was received by the Most Rev. the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, and conducted to the spacious and splendid drawing-room, where the Religious Ladies and their Pupils were assembled. At the southern extremity of the room, a throne, surmounted with a Royal Crown, had been tastefully prepared. Whilst his Lordship was proceeding to take his place upon the Throne, the National Anthem, God Save the Queen, was exquisitely performed on the Piano by one of the Nuns, and the music accompanied with a very happy effect by the voices of four of the young Ladies of the Institution. At the close of the performance, the Lady Superior arose, and after paying her respects to his Lordship, read the following address.

MY LORD.—We the sisters and pupils of the Loretto Institution beg leave to tender to your Lordship the tribute of our profound respect—We gladly profit of the occasion to convey to your Lordship our grateful acknowledgements, for the distinguished honor you have conferred upon us by condescending to visit our Seminary. We humbly hope, that the course of instruction and the arrangements adopted in it will be found to deserve your Lordship's high approbation. With the earnest prayer, that your Lordship's administration may augment the glory of the British Empire and the lustre of your own fame we beg with profound respect to remain your Lordship's most obedient servants.

Signed on the part of the Community and of the Pupils,

DELPHINA HART, Superioress.

Loretto House, July 28, 1843.

To this address His Lordship graciously replied:—I accept with pleasure the address presented by the sisters and pupils of the Loretto Institution.

It will always afford me great gratification to co-operate in every way in my power to the welfare of this establishment.

The Lady Superior next submitted to his Lordship's inspection some specimens of fancy needle work and drawing executed by the pupils, and begged his kind acceptance of a beautiful drawing of shells and feathers prepared by a member of the community. From the drawing room the noble visitor proceeded to visit the children's dormitory, the schools, and the range of baths lately erected. With each of these apartments, his Lordship expressed himself highly pleased. Of the dormitory, in particular, he more than once remarked, that he had not seen, in Calcutta, a room so admirably adapted for the purpose for which it was employed. The orderly arrangements of the dressing room annexed to the dormitory drew forth also his marked approbation. Such excellent arrangements, his Lordship remarked, were exceedingly well calculated to accustom the pupils, betimes, to habits of regularity and order. From the Convent, Lord Ellenborough passed under the newly built semi-circular verandah to the Church, every part of which his Lordship examined with much attention. After a few minutes delay, during which the 19th Psalm, for the preservation and happiness of the Sovereign was intoned and performed on the Organ by the Sisters, assisted by some of the children, the Right Hon. the Governor General retired, evidently much gratified by his visit to the Loretto Seminary. We know that it will be in accordance with the wishes of the Loretto community, to profit of this opportunity, to add, that they feel deeply grateful for the distinguished courtesy, condescension and affability, which Lord Ellenborough displayed on this occasion, as well as for the kind interest which his Lordship evinced for the success of their Institution."

A NEW CATHOLIC JOURNAL— EDINBURGH.

We have been kindly favored with the two first numbers of a new Catholic Newspaper, just established at Edinburgh, entitled the "EDINBURGH COURIER." We hail the journal with delight, and hope that the talent and ability which it displays, will secure for it the support of the Catholic world. We have excerpted the address of the Editor, and shall continue to make such extracts as our very limited space will admit of.

With such ably conducted journals as the TABLET and the EDINBURGH COURIER in England and Scotland, and the several eminent journals published in Ireland, truth must prevail over error, and the stale calumnies against our Holy Religion will no longer be countenanced by any thinking and reasonable Christian.

CONVERSIONS.—We are informed that last week at Bethampore, the Rev. Dr. Backhaus, baptized two Heathens, an adult and an infant.

TO THE AUTHOR OF THE WORK ENTITLED "THE RATIONALITY OF CHRISTIANISM" (LA RAISON DU CHRISTIANISME.*

SIR,—The ar distant regions of Africa have not been without admiring the monument erected by you to the glory of the Christian Religion through the work lately published by you, and entitled: "The Rationality of Christianity" (La raison du Christianisme.)

Is it not however, without diffidence that the humble suffrage of an islander now ventures to offer itself to your acceptance amidst the loud applauses bursting forth from the various capitals of Europe.

It is still with a greater degree of diffidence that I venture to request that you will allow me to submit to your consideration a few reflections tions suggested to my mind by the perusal of your work.

* This work is dedicated to the students of the Ecole Polytechnique in F.

In the first place, may not the inference I am about to establish, be deserving of notice, and be added to the numerous and luminous inferences drawn by yourself from the events which have taken place from the 16th century to the present age?

Was it not alleged in the course of the last century that Christianity and Catholicism in particular owed their existence to a compression of thoughts hostile to the one and the other, encouraged by the ruling powers as a mighty auxiliary to despotism?

The various revolutions which have taken place have one and all proved the fallacy of such a position. The nations of Europe have shaken off the fetters of thralldom; they have acquired more light, and in no age before has the freedom of thought, writing and action been carried so far as in our days. Indeed this freedom has degenerated into licentiousness.

And yet, what can be more imposing than the spectacle we are called upon to witness in these days of ours? Why, the very freedom of thought, of writing and of action which was to have brought on the ruin of Revelation, has on the contrary adduced additional and more striking proofs of the justice of its claims to our homage and veneration. It is through this very freedom that Catholicism keeps extending its conquests, and that the nations of the earth are gladly hailing its holy tenets as the only sure and true source of happiness and inexhaustible consolations amidst the delusions and calamities of life.

We cannot therefore too much admire the conduct of the Almighty in availing himself of the events naturally endangered by the exercise of their free will on the part of his creatures, for the purpose of bringing about the destruction of the schemes of his opponents, and in controlling those events (permitted by his long suffering) so as to make them suit the purposes of his own wise counsels.

This we may be rest assured of, that however fostered error may be, however far its baneful influences may have extended, the ultimate triumph of truth is certain when once the hour of triumph comes round.

True it is, Sir, as you have justly observed, that the want of faith so common in these latter times is less the effect of indifference than of ignorance. And this ignorance is the result of the system of education and study adopted for the last half century.

It is as singular as remarkable that at the very time when there was so much talk of civilization, of moral progress and improvement, those principles, alone calculated to bring about such a state of things, should have been so sadly overlooked and even disdained with so much boldness and obstinacy. The means adopted have, it is clear, been in direct opposition with the end proposed and so much wished for.

Man has had continually brought before his mind the agreeable truth of his "Rights," whilst the "Duties" incumbent upon him, just as important as his rights, have been unduly disregarded. Light was loudly called for, but have not "morality and virtue" been at all times two bright luminaries having the two-fold advantage of improving the heart as well as the mind?

Whilst attending to the improvement of the laws, it should not have been lost sight of, that the safety of Society rests more in the sound morality of the subject than in the enactment of any positive law. Penal laws may check, the sword may punish, but cannot mend, and nothing but the morality of the subject can remove the necessity of punishment. These truths are no novelty, but it will not be improper to dwell longer upon them.

Education, the civilizing power, has never been more defective than at present. Never has there been a greater neglect of good manners, of politeness, of noble-mindedness, of dignity in manners, language and writings than in the present age. Knowledge is undoubtedly more general, but not so extensive, and it is more confined in its object as may be readily ascertained in considering those writers now in possession of the highest celebrity and in the enjoyment of public homage.

The main fault of modern times lies in insulating the improvement of the mind from that of the heart. It is a great error at all events to have paid less attention to the most important part in man.

The understanding is a workman more or less skilful in the use of the materials supplied to it by the heart. The development of these two faculties ought to be simultaneous. There can be no true eloquence, except when "of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh." Genius can be of little service to Society except in complying with the dictates of an upright heart. In his continual wrestles with himself, man meets with a greater opposition from the heart than from the understanding. The force of action centres in the heart, because there is the seat of will and feeling. There also lie concealed the two opposite principles of good and evil. It is in the heart that the one and the other are generated out of the reach of the human eye and human science. It is also in the deep and mysterious recesses of the heart that the most sublime virtues, the most hideous vices are engendered.

Education, properly speaking, ought to have for its main object not to root away from the heart of man the principle of evil, which will ever be beyond the power of man, but so to subdue and keep it under as to enable the nobler and better feelings of man to shew themselves.

Such is the main object of education as to children, and it is also the most imperative duty of the grown up man through life; and it is this truth which teachers should labour to impress upon the minds of those entrusted to their care when on the eve of taking leave of their pupils.

Is it not, in truth, more necessary than ever, that the men of the present age should be taught in a rational and scientific manner that the Deity in subjecting man to this wrestle, has at the same time promised him the aid of his almighty power to the end, that, by such a wonderful partnership (with which he is pleased to honor the creature) and the union of such powerful and sublime efforts, man should reach the highest possible degree of perfection here on earth; that at the end of the struggle, everlasting glory and ineffable happiness will be his portion; for God, with his perfections and eternity and the joys of Heaven will be tendered to him as the reward of so much self-denial on Earth,

Let it not however be inferred from any thing I may have said hitherto, that the care lavished upon the understanding is unbecoming, or that a lesser degree of care would be sufficient; but it is highly to be wished that the same degree of care should be bestowed upon the two most important faculties of the soul.

We ought therefore anxiously to wish that Ethics should be more strictly attended to. As a part thereof, History seems to claim the foremost rank.

The study of History should be general, embracing sacred and profane writers, and divested of those prejudices so prevalent since the introduction of the Sadducean maxims of the last age. The best method appears to be this: carefully to distinguish and point out the presence of good and evil wherever the presence of either can be traced; to endeavor to ascertain the causes as well as the probable effects of the one or of the other; to point out the genuine elements of order in Society, the dogmatical and moral principle leading to the improvement of man; to shew at the same time that the opposite principle has not only a tendency to lower man, but either says his improvement or reduces him to barbarism, and by this use of such means, to arrive at a wholesome philosophy, and indeed at truth, and pay to the latter the tribute of homage to which it is so justly entitled, however decidedly opposed this may be to that pride of man manifested by system-making spirit. Short and easy methods should be adopted to dwell only on important events and occurrences replete with instruction. So to work on the imagination as to bring about a re-action on the heart and make upon it a deep and lasting expression; to expatiate in a special manner on one and indeed the most important fact recorded in the annals of the world, (viz.) the establishment of Christianity and the passage from Polytheism to the divine law, a subject of the deepest interest, calculated to lead to most serious meditations, and most fertile in social consequences.

What in truth is more wonderful than the change wrought by those illiterate men who, moved by a sudden inspiration and with a self-denial till then unprecedented, happen to secrete over the minds and hearts an influence which can be accounted for on no other principle than that of Divine interference; who boldly asserted dogmas and opinions on morals surpassing any thing which the most enlightened understanding had ever revealed to the greatest men of profane antiquity, and who, in becoming the victims of the brutal force of their opponents, offering them no other resistance than the authority of their mission, did nevertheless change the state of the moral and intellectual world, introduced a new era, an order of things for the better confirmation of which time in its progress, Society in its development, have been vying with each other.

Is there a fact better calculated to enlighten the understanding of youth, to suggest to their minds nobler thoughts, to move the hearts and to excite in those hearts more generous and dignified feelings, better adapted, in short to sow the good seed?

Would not such an introduction to the study of the history of mankind be the best? This study would then prove an abundant source of luminous comparisons, learned inferences, whence would spring that deep conviction which can alone lead man to the performance of great things.

In reference to History, it is not needless to observe that the study of modern history has been by far too much sacrificed to that of the Greeks and Romans; and yet on comparing Christian nations to the Heathen nations, the comparison is decidedly in favor of the former. Were there no other difference than that of the religious principle which places between our dogmas and those of Heathenism, that abyss which separates error from truth, the contrast would on that ground alone, be sufficiently great to determine the preference in favour of modern History, to lead to its study, to a more careful examination of certain periods, in particular too lightly qualified as barbarous, and which unjust prejudices have brought into systematical contempt. In fact in the religious, civil and political condition of things since the Christian era, prevails that superiority which is the necessary consequence of the reign of truth. A spectacle which it has been reserved to the Christian era to exhibit lies in those types of human perfection unknown to the world before the law of Grace had stepped in to redeem man from his natural corruption. With the Christian era have sprung new sciences, extensive and numerous discoveries, facts and monuments more memorable, more venerable, than any connected with those two nations of antiquity in whose history we have been accustomed to look for them.

The study of Christianity in particular cannot be too much recommended to youth in the present age. In the historical part thereof they will be able to acquire the necessary information touching the habits and institutions of the Christian nations as compared with those of the heathen nations best enlightened by the mere help of natural Reason. Similar studies would naturally lead to deep religious conviction which would prove a source of great virtues and talents. In the primitive Church, religion used to be taught in an historical manner.

In a literary point of view, the study of Christianity offers to our admiration precedents of emotion, pathos and sublime, surpassing anything to be met with in the most eminent writings of antiquity.

As to its dogmas and morality, eighteen centuries have shown that the light afforded by Christianity and the rules of conduct therewith prescribed, are of such a nature as to raise man to a degree of dignity and perfection which his mere natural strength could not and never would have enabled him to reach.

Such are the many advantages recommending the study of religion to the notice of youth in the present age. This science has been so fully and justly qualified Divine Letters, a denomination quite in accordance with the spirit now beginning to prevail in profane and religious Literature. The recollection has been preserved of the greatness both moral and intellectual (as exhibited in the precious notion of virtue and talent) by men of this age in such studies were encouraged.

There is every prospect that the present times will lead to a more just estimate of the elements and means enjoined by modernity to arrive at that degree of improvement, so anxiously expected and wished for. It is also to be hoped that the disappointments experienced, will prove a strong stimulus to amendment to the present age.

FOR THE FEAST OF THE ASSUMPTION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

Who is she that cometh up from the desert flowing with charms and delights, leaning on her beloved?—Cant 8 5.

Lo, from the bosom of earth's gloomy vale
What charms of majesty heav'nwards sail!
She cometh a queen! blest as heav'n's fair bride!
The spouse of our king!—heav'n's portals be wide;—
Be lited ye gates, and new songs of praise
Henceforth be sung to the Ancient of Days;
Behold her adorn'd! the spouse of our king!
Angels, behold her rejoicing! O! sing;—
*Hail full of grace, full of glory and love,
Welcome, our queen, to thy kingdom above.*
Thus sang the angels, in rapture and awe,
Blessing the sight, nor could sing all they saw;
Thus hailed their queen from this valley of tears,
As Mary soar'd radiant aloft to the spheres,
Sleepless and fair from the gloom of the grave,
Like the new-born moon from Ocean's dark wave,
Hail'd by the stars, radiant queen of the night,
Cheering the earth with her broad disk of light.

O! fairest reflection of heav'n's bright sun,
From heav'n repeat what in Cana was done,—
Thy pray'rs chang'd water on earth into wine,
Inflame by thy pray'rs this cold heart of mine;—
Smile on the path of thy wanderer child,
My guide through the night of earth's dreary wild.

Shall I be told, my pray'r is badly done?
That pray'r to thee, officious thy loving son?
Shall I not bless the moon's propitious light,
That shows my pathway through the shades of night?
Benignant orb restoring half the day,
In soft reflections of the solar ray,

Because the sun has brighter beams than these,
With liquid fire enlightening all he sees!
Godless Cynics, shall I not praise them all
His rays reflected, as when straight they fall?
What spot of earth hath Pharos ever seen,
But hails the moon his partner and his queen?
And to thee, Mary, shall no praise be giv'n,
The spouse of God and glorious queen of heav'n?

Not yet a mother, angels prais'd thee here,—
A mother crown'd the angels now revere;
And who with heart adores, on earth, thy son,
But prays through thee, his "Will on earth be done"†
All nations bless'd thee, and thee still bless,† Thine of our fathers, of their sons no less;—
At ev'ry shrine where worship pure is paid,
Where martyrs bled, or Holy Virgins pray'd,—
In ev'ry land beneath the ambient skies,
Where danger threatens, or affliction sighs;—
Where thy son's sweet name inspires salvation,
Thy name too, Mary, gives consolation §

How small the praise thou canst receive from me, Extoll'd by Angels and the Sacred Three,

* And the angel being come in, said to her, Hail full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou amongst women. Luke. 1. 28.

† The Angelical salutation is recited after the Lord's prayer to beg that the petitions contained in that prayer may be granted through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin.

‡ Behold from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed. Because he that is powerful hath done great things to me, and holy is his name. Luke. 1. 48 and 49.

§ See St Bernard on the names of Jesus and Mary 2d Homily on the words, The Angel was sent &c.

What grace, what gift hath God on man bestow'd,
But through thee, Mary, gate of heaven, flow'd?
His only Son, eternal, ever blest,
His choicest gift, and source of all the rest,
Through thee consenting to redeem us came,
His son and thine, incarnate still the same;—

And thus through thee, if God redeem and save,
A grace through thee, am I forbid to crave?
Whom first the Saviour his own mother chose,
And mankind gave thee, at redemption's close,
Who will not praise thee, love thee all he can,
Bestow'd by Jesus, from the cross, on man?*

Mother of grace! a mother's care bestow,
Thy son an exile once was here below;
An exile with him and partner of his pain,
No child of sorrow prays to thee in vain.
Poor, weeping, groaning, fallen sons of Eve,
Thy name we reverence and thy pow'r believe;—

Look down with pity from thy throne on high,
Mother of mercy, while to thee we cry
From this dark vale of banishment and strife,
Our hope, our sweetness, Mary, and our life.
Thine eyes of mercy turn on us below,
Mother thou art—thyself a mother show;
And when at last life's sinful course is run,
Show us appeas'd thy ever blessed son,—
O clement Virgin! pious, sweet, serene,
Mary, our mother, Advocate and Queen!

CONVERSIONS.

SHREWSBURY.—A Baptist preacher and four other converts made their first communion in Easter week, in the Catholic chapel of the above town. The pastor has just now 19 Protestant under instruction. A very eligible site for a new Catholic church has been purchased this year in the most respectable part of the town; and it is expected that the Earl of Shrewsbury will, with his usual munificence, immediately build a noble church in this town, from which he takes his title.—Tablet.

RECEPTION OF CONVERTS AT St MARY'S, WESTMINSTER.—On Sunday last, 11 persons (six whom had been members of the Church of England, two of the Scotch Church, and the other three Wesleyans,) were received into the true fold. The solemn ceremony took place after the Gospel at the Holy Mass, when each neophyte was received in succession into the sanctuary by the Rev. Pastor, with the solemn words in the baptismal service, “Come into the house of the Lord,” &c., and all were arranged before the altar. An impressive discourse was delivered on the occasion by the Very Rev. Dr. Mage from the text, “There shall be joy among the angels,” &c. These, and many others of the numerous conversions which are daily adding to the inconveniences of the small and deficient Catholic chapel of London by overcrowding them, are to be attributed in some degree to the Reformation Society and its party of itinerant worthies, Messrs. Cumming and Parkinson, who by their palpable misstatements and blundering malice, produce more good than harm to the Catholic cause.—Correspondent Tablet.

HINCKLEY.—On Sunday last the Holy Sacrament of Confirmation was administered in St. Peter Chapel by the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman to 56 persons, a greater part of whom were converts. His Lordship preached also on behalf of the Day of Sunday schools connected with the chapel.—Ibid.

HULL.—Amongst the converts admitted into the Church last week by our worthy and beloved pastor the Rev. J. Render, were the mother and sister of our highly talented townsman, Taylor Bulmer, Esq. who, some time ago, very kindly painted and presented to our chapel a splendid original picture of St. Augustine, Archbishop of Canterbury, which placed over the altar, dedicated to that saint.—Ibid.

CATHOLIC BETTER THAN PARTY POLITICS.

(Edinburgh Courier, No. 1, May 18, 1843.)

We this day present to the public an additional organ of Catholic opinion; and in doing so, are complying with the wishes and desires of a great portion of the Catholic body.

Since the overthrow of the ancient Church in the 16th century, Catholics have rarely acted on the Italian maxim of helping themselves, in the assurance that heaven would also help them. The instruments of one set of politicians, or the dupes of another, they have, with but a single exception, throughout 300 years of misfortune and sorrow, been the victims of all. And yet such has been the miraculous power of religion, and such the vigilant exertions of the clergy, that in 1829, when emancipation was obtained, there was a power and a moral influence in the Catholic body greater than it possessed in the zenith of Cardinal Wolsey's sway. In the silent progress of nature, they had multiplied exceedingly. They covered a surface at home and in the colonies greater than since the commencement of modern history. The sympathies of Europe and America were with them; and they had within themselves the elements of great political power, which, if rightly used, would have placed Catholic liberty and Catholic rights and privileges on a permanent and indestructible basis. But in an evil hour (foreseen by the sagacity of Dr. Milner, when he petitioned against Emancipation), this great fabric of power was demolished, and the Catholic body, giving to faction and to party what they ought to have retained for themselves, became offensive without provocation, and noisy without well-directed energy.

Relieved of the penal laws which English and Scotch whigs had imposed on Catholic thought and liberty, both civil and sacred, the Catholic body voluntarily assumed the yoke of the inheritors of the name and of the principles of these same whigs; and now, at the distance of fourteen years after emancipation, the body is in a condition more powerless and humiliating than the most bitter opponent could have considered possible. The observation is made in reference to political and secular matters alone; for, as regards religion, it is an extraordinary fact, that Catholics are more numerous, and fill an infinitely greater space in the public eye. The same zeal and untiring exertion, and the same moderation and good sense that were manifested by priest and bishop before emancipation have been continued and even increased since 1829. Temples and chapels, and convents and colleges, are being raised on all sides,—education, under their fostering care, is extending its influence among the industrious classes,—and so great has been the accession of converts to Catholicism, that the great desideratum among British Catholics is rapidly approaching accomplishment—the formation of a middle class.

How comes it, then, that notwithstanding this great position as regards religion, and notwithstanding this great moral influence of individual character, the Catholics are so much in the back ground as regards secular and civil importance. A view of our proceedings since 1829 will not only tell us this, but point out the manner of our regaining what we have lost.

The Duke of Wellington gave us emancipation; and our first proceeding was to force him out of office, and to put in his place the whigs, whose party and pharasaic cry was, "Civil and religious liberty all over the world." To Ireland they gave, the Coercion bill, for suppressing a spirit they themselves had raised,—and to the English and Anglo-Irish poor they gave the starvation and the torture of a new English poor law. Justice and fair play were the constant theme of their journals, but notwithstanding the Norfolks and the Shrewsburies, and Stourtons and Cliffords, were ready and qualified as of old for their country's service, not one Catholic nobleman or gentleman was made a privy councillor during the administration of the liberal party.* In like manner, not one of the body was admitted into the Cabinet, and although Messrs Sheil, Wyse, and O'Ferral were placed in subordinate situations at the Treasury or Admiralty, and Board of Trade, neither they nor any other Catholic received an appointment that had any patronage or influence attached to it. Not one Catholic was placed as a Commissioner at the Boards of Customs or Excise, or Stamps and Taxes, or appointed to the Post-office, or permanently at the Admiralty or Treasury. No Catholic nobleman or gentleman received a Lord Lieutenancy; and in the same spirit of exclusion, although two or three Justices of Peace for the sake of appearances, were appointed in England, none were appointed in Scotland, where batches, that disgusted some even of the whigs themselves, were made Justices who could scarcely spell their own names. The same spirit was displayed in the various Commissions of enquiry that were issued, and that disgraced the whig administration. Although their name was legion, neither Commissioner, nor assistant-Commissioner, nor Secretary, nor even door-keeper, were Catholic. As for Governorships of Colonies, not one Catholic received an appointment, although some of the worst men and greatest adventurers received them over and over again; and the same was also the case in the Consular appointments. As regards honours, too, the same spirit of exclusion was manifested. The whigs created eighty-eight peerages—dukes and marquises, and earls and lords; and four Catholics only were noticed—Lords Fingal and Kenmare merely received British titles; Lord Stafford and Lord Lovat were restored to the honours of their ancestors;—but the Constables and Vavasours, and Langdales and Stanleys, and other descendants of the ancient chivalry of England, whose own influence and that of their numerous tenantry, who placed and kept the whigs in office, were neglected,—as were also the Maxwells, whose nobility, stretching into the mists of antiquity, stood by throne and altar. In a word, from the coronet of the duke, to the humble employment of a door-keeper at a public office, the British Catholic was almost as practically excluded as if emancipation had not passed, and as if his support of the whigs was not essential to their retention of office.

* Mr. Sheil, when the whigs were approaching dissolution, received the Privy Councillorship ex officio.

Nor was this all: while keeping the whigs in power, the Catholic body were raising and nurturing into consequence a more hostile, and, in respect of their ignorance generally and tendency to fanaticism, a still more dangerous opponent—the Dissenters. The removal of the Test and Corporation acts opened up the path to power, and the passing of the Municipal bills gave them the control of a great many corporations. And both in England and Scotland, their intolerance of our Catholic faith,—their refusal to employ Catholic servants,—their exclusion and ill-treatment of Catholic labourers and paupers,—and discourtesy towards the Catholic clergy,—has become so very remarkable as to create in the minds of many an impression that the kindness, and courtesy, and toleration of the ancient and close corporations of England and Scotland were infinitely preferable to the liberalism, and any other kind of ism, but Catholicism, that is observed in modern corporations.

The consequence of all this was distrust and dislike in the minds of a great portion of the Catholic body at home; while in the Colonies general dislike pervaded them all. The promise of liberalism was kept to the ear, but in Canada or Newfoundland, in Malta or Gibraltar, or Australia, the sufferings of Catholics from the representatives of liberalism were such that a few years more of whig rule would have set them all in a state of insurrection. With Catholic murmurings at home,—dissatisfaction and loud complaints in the Colonies,—with the extension of the Anti-Catholic and revolutionary principle into Portugal and Spain, as a new and infallible specific for preserving the balance of power and the peace of Europe,—it was evident to any one who looked beneath the surface that the adhesion of the Catholics to the whig administration could not be of much longer continuance. Sir John Gerard in Lancashire, and Sir Clifford Constable in Yorkshire, were the first boldly to take the field against them; and they soon were thrust from power which they abused, and from patronage which they unjustly and almost fraudulently withheld from their Catholic supporters—discomfited, disgraced, and thoroughly broken down.

But in the lowest depths of party, there is a lower still, and again the evil genius of Catholic politics gave a false direction to the body. Supporters of the whigs from gratitude, and not from sympathy with their principles, the Catholic gentry have been unwilling generally to take part against them, now out of place; while with them, and the heterogeneous mass of Dissenters, democrats, anti-corn law leaguers, extension of suffrage, universal suffrage men, and chartists and revolutionists, with whom the whigs are now united, it is impossible for the honour and property, and intelligence of the Catholic body to be identified. But the spirit that is being infused into the industrious and humbler classes of British Catholics, inconsistent alike with truth and freedom, and the Catholic interest, a spirit of dissension, tending still further to the degradation of the Catholic body, and to a complete separation of the higher and middle class from the industrious and humbler ones, naturally inspires every thinking mind with apprehension and dismay.

In this position of Catholic affairs, the Edinburgh Courier has been called into existence to advocate a kind and tolerant, and forbearing spirit among Catholics; and, while inculcating the necessity and advantage of respecting each other's conscientious political opinions, to make them all combine, in as far as possible, for the consolidation and the efficiency of political and moral power on the part of the great body,—to give utterance to the opinions of the property, and honor, and intelligence of the Catholic body,—honouring and supporting that aristocracy which was our protection in the days of intolerance and privation, and is the pride and ornament of our freedom and prosperity. Their own virtues entitle them to the first place in our regard; but historical in the long line of distinguished ancestry, they and their lineage and their fortitude, like our persecuted faith, are bound up in the attachments of every scholar, and of every Catholic whose mind is elevated above the miserable contentions and antipathies of party or personal politics. To the middle class we give the hand and the pledge of fellowship in the promotion of their interests, and the attainment of that influence and those objects of honourable ambition to which their industry and intelligence, and power, entitle them to aspire and enjoy. And to the humbler and poorer classes, the exertions, the successful exertions made in their favour, in and around Edinburgh, will be extended to every locality where labour requires protection, or destitution the offices and the duty of charity.

In a word, Catholic, and not party politics, will be the object of The Courier; and in the advocacy of order, and its offspring harmony, and the development and protection of Catholic energy, its conductors hope that thereby, and by other kindred auxiliaries, not only the secular and political influence of the Catholic body will be best consulted, but the individual interest of every deserving Catholic promoted and secured.

“GIVE US BISHOPS—BISHOPS—MORE BISHOPS!”

Such is the outcry of the lawn-sleeve gentry, and will it not be echoed by the lightly burthened and cheerfully-taxed people of Great Britain? This yell has been called forth by the sensible attempt to unite the Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor, during which rational movement the whole of the Episcopal Bench had a new light let in upon them, for they all at once discovered that the populous and cotton-spinning city of Manchester was literally perishing for want of—a Bishop.

Earl Powis certainly made a discovery that rendered the Bishop's services in the spiritual line perfectly useless, as far as Manchester was concerned, which was that as “the proposed Bishop would become chaplain to their lordships, he would be thereby rendered incapable of attending to the spiritual wants of the Manchester population.” This piece of apparent common sense, however, did not weigh much with so wisdom-fraught an assembly as the House of Peers, and as during the debate—as might naturally be expected—as Bishops, with a fine fellow-feeling of increasing the plunder for their rapacious fraternity, indulged their eloquent propensities, and favoured the lords present with a great many very intelligent observations connected with the exemplary influence of “the Church,” we therefore purpose making a few extracts from their luminous oratorical displays in the order in which they were delivered, and accompanying the same with a few illustrative comments for the edification of our readers.

We premise these observations by stating that the Duke of Wellington, like a knowing and fearless "old soldier," had previously enlightened the dull perceptions of "the Bench," by the declaration of this wholesome but unpalatable truth—"that many persons in and out of Parliament objected to the Bishops having a seat in that house," upon which the Bishop of Bangor confessed that "he was aware that such was the fact, but he could not see any reason for it."

Now the last part of this innocent declaration is really too good. What business have these "lords spiritual" to mix themselves up with "things temporal" at all? In the next place are not their votes in the House of Lords the property of the Prime Minister of the time being, or is not there an end to their perferment, should they oppose his measures? And what bishop was indifferent to "the loaves and fishes," if he could secure them by any means within his power, how ever humiliating or dishonest?

Next followed "the Head of the Church," the Archbishop of Canterbury; this fragile, sickly invalid had been drawn from his quiet couch to hold up with his feeble voice, this manœuvre for increasing the revenues of the Church. After stating that "the Church commission did its duty in recommending a diocese in Manchester:" he mentioned the gratifying fact, that what he was pleased to call "small livings," would soon be improved to the amount of 6,000*l.* or 7,000*l.* per annum, which statement certainly proves how remarkably profitable a trade preaching is, and will operate as a great encouragement to an abundance of our poor nobility to manufacture as many of their sons into parsons, as can be tempted from the gaming-table or the race-course.

When the Primate sat down the Bishop of Salisbury started up, and took a bolder flight than any one of the prelates, for after pointing out most luminously the pre-eminent advantages of always having a plentiful stock of Bishops in the House of Lords, he concluded by stating, with as much gravity as he was master of, that "it lifted up their lordships from the consideration of earthly things, to matters of a higher and holier nature." This bit of grave banter was no doubt relished greatly by that brace of elderly libertines the Duke of Wellington and Lord Lyndhurst, and they seemed to enjoy it; the rustling of the lawn reminding the former of the movements of Mrs. Harriet Arbutnot, while the Lord Chancellor called to mind Lady Sykes perambulating her drawing-room in Park-lane.

To this jocular "pillar of the Church," succeeded those twin polemical firebrands, and well equipped partizans the Bishops of London and Exeter, who were both ferocious and indignant that any delay should take place in the appointment of a Bishop for Manchester. They both expressed themselves with their customary unbridled arrogance and intolerance, and having sufficiently tired themselves, and disgusted their auditors, they then made way for a couple more—of the same breed, "but of gentler nature." The Bishop of St. David's who said nothing worth hearing, and the Bishop of Lincoln, who fortunately for himself and the House, could not be heard: the evening's entertainment winding up with a modest and candid declaration from the new Whig Bishop of Norwich, that "He should be happy if the Government would appoint a second Bishop in his own diocese, for he was not competent to perform all the duties of his situation." A fact we have not the smallest particle of doubt about.—Satirist, June 4.

EXPULSION OF THE MORMONITES FROM MISSOURI.

The Governor of the Missouri ordered out the State troops to fight and subdue the Mormons, and take from them the property which the 'Tribe of Dan' had deposited in the 'Lord's brick store,' in the citadel of 'Zion,' called 'Far West.' It was in 1833 they appeared before the camp of the 'Saints,' and commanded them to surrender. It was done in the manner hereafter described. But before this event transpired, I am informed that the Prophet Joe [Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon sect] opened his mouth in the name of the Lord, and said it had been revealed to him that the scenes of Jericho were to be re-enacted in Far West; that the angelic host would appear on the day of battle, and by their power give victory to the Saints.

To this end he ordered a breast-work of inch pine-boards to be raised around the camp, to show by this feeble protection against the artillery of their foes, that their strength was in the 'breast-plate of righteousness,' and that they were the soldiers of the militant portion of the kingdom of Heaven. There were moments of awful suspense in the camp of the 'Saints.' The Missouri bayonets bristled brightly near their ranks, and an occasional bullet carelessly penetrated the pine-board rampart, regardless of the inhibition of the Prophet. The Heavens were gazed upon for the shining host, and listening ears turned to catch the rushing of wings through the upper air. The demand of surrender was again and again repeated; but Faith had seized on Hope, and Delay was the offspring. At this juncture of affairs, a sturdy old Missourian approached the brick store, pickaxe in hand, apparently determined to do violence to the sacred depository. One of the sisters, in robes of white, accosted him, and with proper solemnity made known that the 'Lord of the Faithful' had revealed to Joe, the Prophet, that every hand raised against that 'holy structure' would instantly be withered. The frontiersman hesitated, but the hardihood characteristic of these men of the rifle returning, he replied, 'Well, old gal, I'll go it on one hand, any how.' The awful blow was struck; the hand did not wither! 'I doubles up now,' said the daring man, and with both hands inflicted a heavy blow upon a corner brick. It tumbled to the ground, and the building quickly fell under the weight of a thousand vigorous arms. The confidence of the Saints in their Prophet waned, and a surrender followed. Some of the principal men were put in custody, but the main body were permitted to leave the state without further molestation. We, afterwards, met many of them with their herds, &c. on the road from Far West to Quincy, Illinois. It was strongly intimated by the planters in that section of country, that those emigrating 'Saints' found large quantities of the 'Lord's corn' on their way, which they appropriated as need suggested to their own and their animals wants.—Farnham's Travels in the Great Western Prairies.

"This same tradition had not been preserved with less precision in the East; in witness whereof, we have all the Churches of Asia, and that great man Polycarp, much more worthy of credit than Valentinian or Marcion." In conclusion, he affirms that one cannot seek the truth otherwise than in the Church, where the apostles placed it as in deposit; "for at last," says he,* "if there arise any dispute concerning faith, to whom should we have recourse if not to those most ancient Churches, where the apostles themselves taught? And how should it be now, supposing they had left us nothing in writing? Should we not follow the order of tradition which they confided to those to whom they gave the government of their Churches? It is what is done at this day by many barbarous nations, who believe in Christ Jesus without either ink or paper, having the doctrine of salvation written in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, &c." †

In book v. c. 19, St. Irenæus recapitulates all the heretics whom he had refuted in the body of his works. He shows that their heresies only began long after the early bishops to whom the apostles entrusted the care of their Churches; from which he draws this consequence, "that it is to the Church that we must have recourse for instruction in the true faith, because she is the seven-branch candlestick that enlightens the whole world: whereas the heretics, pretending to surpass that which they had learnt from the ancients, departed from the truth. These are the blind and the leaders of the blind, whom we must shun, as well as their doctrine, to throw ourselves into the arms of the Church, that we may be brought up within her bosom, and be there nourished with the Holy Scriptures; for she is the terrestrial paradise whose fruits are to serve for our food, as it is written in Scripture: you shall eat of every fruit which grows in Paradise. These fruits are all the writings inspired of God, but that which it is not even permitted us to touch, is that spirit of pride and of discord which ever reigns amongst heretics." ‡

In another work, of which only certain passages have been preserved by Eusebius, speaking, of the doctrines of some heretics, he says. "That doctrine is not sound; it is contrary to that which the Church teaches," &c. § Again, "The marks of the true Church," says he, "are, that though dispersed throughout the world, she ever teaches the same faith, firmly resting it upon the tradition of the apostles, maintaining every where a uniformity of government, and ever pointing to the same road to salvation. To the Church is securely entrusted the safe-keeping of the truth: while those who separate from the main body, and set up for themselves mast at once be suspected of heresy or of schism. . . . It is in the Church alone that the grace of the Holy Ghost resides, maintaining her in the spirit of truth, and nourishing her with the bread of life," &c. ||

After these few citations from the scanty portions of his writings which have been preserved to us, if St. Irenæus were summoned again to this troubled world of ours, from the blessed abodes which he now inhabits, and were questioned as to the mode of discovering the true faith amidst the jarring elements of contradiction which he would behold around him, surely it cannot be doubted in which direction he would turn. Would he not close his ears (as he declares his friend Polycarp would have done to the heresies of his time) against the strange innovations which his true and penetrating spirit would discover in an instant, in the singular phraseology of the Thirty-nine Articles; exclaiming, "O Lord, to what times am I reserved that I should suffer such things!"* And would he not point to Rome, and to her eternal destinies and everlasting doctrines, and proclaim that, "By her you shall be judged, and by her you shall be confounded?" †

Advancing in our researches amongst the scanty remnants of ecclesiastical lore, which the devouring hand of time hath spared, we cannot but be struck with the clear and distinct terms in which the latitudinarian opinions of modern Churchmen are combated and overcome by the very arguments which were employed by the doctors of the early Church to defeat and counteract the heresies of their age, when Christianity was yet in its infancy, and, as it were, struggling for its very existence. For even then was it assailed by heresy, as subtle, multifarious, and obstinate, as in any later period; and when she might have been presumed to require the exertion of her whole united strength to carry her forward on her perilous course, and seat her triumphantly beyond the reach both of Jew and Gentile; above the hatred and the envy of her rivals; above the powers of darkness and the principalities of the world. But no! She was ever destined by her divine founder to be a Church militant in the most enlarged sense of the term. The time of trial and of conflict, which began with her infancy, was not even to cease with her age; her laurels were to be all won upon the battle-field; her conquests were to be achieved by her untiring powers of resistance; her whole history was to be but one course of contention against the persecutions of her declared enemies, the corruptions of her own sons, the wiles and stratagems of her own inconstant and rebellious children.

But to pursue our course of evidence, St. Clement of Alexandria, who flourished towards the end of the second century, what is his opinion of the objects and attributes of the Church? "There is but one true Church," says he; "that ancient assembly of the faithful of God. Heresies are posterior to her, and rend and divide her. In her alone is the precise truth, bearing an exact conformity to the inspired writings." ‡

But it is his contemporary, Tertullian, who furnishes us with a mass of argument as well as evidence to substantiate the true doctrine of the Church. In the first place he warns us not to be scandalized or astonished at the prevalence of heresies, since they happen only in conformity with the predictions of heaven. They are sometimes even advantageous to the Church; for, like persecution, they serve to separate the false from the true Christian: while their very name indicates the perversity of the deed, for it signifies a determination to resist authority, and to choose for yourselves. This, indeed, is the root and origin of all heresies, and that which stamps them with their true character. For the rule of faith requires, that if there be any diversity of opinion, we seek for the solution of the difficulty within the Church, and not without her. For which reason he also tells us that heretics should not even be permitted to dispute against faith upon the pretended authority of the scriptures; for the scriptures are not their property,—because the apostle himself has deprived them of the right of disputation, in commanding us to fly a heretic when once he has been admonished; and because such disputes can be of no advantage, seeing that heretics either reject portions of the scripture, or receive them not in their integrity, adding or retrenching as it becomes necessary to accommodate them to their system: or if perchance they do receive them whole and entire, they explain them in their own way; so that, instead of gaining any thing by such disputations they only become a stumbling block to the weak and ignorant. Should they, however, act otherwise, our first duty is to examine where is the deposit of faith, and to whom the scriptures, of right, belong; from whom, through whom, when, and to whom those doctrines are come, the belief in which constitutes a Christian; for where these doctrines and this faith are united, there also is the truth of scripture and the interpretation of tradition. It was only to his apostles that Christ revealed the doctrine he had received from his heavenly Father; we, therefore, have no other means of ascertaining this doctrine but from the Churches which they founded, and instructed either by word or writing. It then follows as an incontestable truth, that that is the true doctrine which accords with that of the apostolic Churches, as being that which these Churches received from the apostles, the apostles from Christ, and Christ from God. Our belief is that of the apostolic Churches,—i.e. proof is that we are in communion with them,—therefore ours is the true doctrine.* Such was the argument of Tertullian against the heresies of his days and who would not suppose him to be arguing against those of ours? Circumstances are no way changed,—neither the tactics of heretics, nor the principles of truth, nor the rule of faith: and can it be doubted whether, if Tertullian were alive now (supposing him to have remained true to his own principles, from which unfortunately he swerved in his latter days, and became in his own person what he had so strongly reprobated in others, a lamentable example of the pride of the human intellect and of the frailties of man), can it be doubted, whether, when questioned upon the true method of discovering the faith of Christ, he would have pointed to Canterbury or to Rome? To Canterbury indeed he might have appealed as to an apostolic Church, but it would have been to the Canterbury of St. Augustine, and not of Archbishop Parker. Down to Archbishop Parker, he would have said, “Canterbury is in communion with Rome, therefore is she of the true stock.” But the moment that he perceived the communion with Rome and the apostolic Churches to be cut off—all alliance with her repudiated as unlawful and contaminating—the English branch of the Catholic Church (which had hitherto been exemplary in her unity and in her dutiful submission to the Holy See), not only severing herself by a simple act of schism, but soon putting herself at variance upon doctrines which had hitherto been common to both; setting up a symbol of faith for herself, and withdrawing from all allegiance to the Church, because the ancient Church, which the Fathers so revered, and to which they ever clung as to the bark of Peter, had no longer any authority to teach her!—would he not have immediately put his anathema upon her, and have condemned her as a prevaricator?—would he not have placed her in the same category with the sectaries of his days, and demanded her to show her credential? He would have said, “I will not enter into disputation with you, for you have no right to be heard; you are no longer in communion with the apostolic Churches; you have abandoned the faith of your fathers, and with it have forfeited the rights of your inheritance.” That short argument would have been conclusive on the whole question. He would not have stopped at particulars, but would have declared that the Church of Christ was indivisible, that they had presumed to separate from her, and had therefore no longer any part with her. Her title as an apostolic Church was forfeited—she was now but a withered branch, instead of a living member of the parent stock.

Would he not also have pursued the argument, saying to the priests and prelates of Canterbury,—“Show me your pedigree,—let me see the connecting link which brings you up to the apostolic age, and unites you to the apostolic Churches; for I hear of a chasm which still remains to be filled up, before you can be entitled to prosecute your commission, and promulgate the doctrines once delivered to the saints.* History tells me that the ancient hierarchy of the country,—that which had been derived from, and had constantly communicated with the apostolic Churches,—was long since swept away, and that a new race was appointed in their stead, professing to derive their rights from other sources even from a lay authority, and totally unconnected with him to whom Christ said—“Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. To thee will I give the keys (the emblems of authority and government) of the kingdom of heaven; whatsoever you shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, whatsoever you shall loose on earth shall be loosed also in heaven.” (St. Matt. xvi.)—“Feed my sheep, feed my lambs.” (St. John xxi.)

Strangers to that great community which not only can prove its descent, but also its mission, from the apostles and their legitimate successors, still held together by one continuous line of close and mysterious compact, of which the successor of St. Peter is the necessary connecting bond, is it not clear that these men of the new principles are intruders into the fold? that they have come over the fence instead of finding their way through the door? “He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up another way, the same is a thief and a robber. But he that entereth in by the door, is the shepherd of the sheep.” (St. John x. 1, 2.)

Cranmer, I find, (he would have said), had a short and very efficient method of settling these matters. He propounded, that “all Christian princes have committed unto them immediately of God the whole cure of all their subjects, as well concerning the administration of God’s word, for the cure of souls, as concerning the ministration of things political, and civil governance.”

THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN MORTAL AND VENIAL SIN.

It is a mortal sin, not to hear Mass on a holiday of obligation.

I am well aware that the mere announcement of such a precept will excite laughter in many. But woe to us if we abandon all that has been the subject of derision. What serious idea or noble sentiment has ever been able to escape it? According to the judgment of many persons, that action only can be a sin which tends directly to the temporal injury of mankind; but the Church has not laid down her laws in conformity with an opinion so perfectly frivolous and thoughtless: the Church teaches other duties, and when she regulates her decisions agreeably to her doctrines, we must at least allow that she is consistent; if these decisions seem unreasonable, it must be proved that her whole doctrine is false; nor must she be judged with a spirit not her own, and which she reproves.

It is very well known that the Church does not so much place the fulfilment of the precept in the material attendance of the faithful at the sacrifice, as in the readiness of the will to assist at it: she declares the sick exempt from the obligation, as well as all those who are kept away by necessary occupations; while she holds those to be transgressors of it, who are indeed present in body, but whose hearts are far off by voluntary distractions: so true it is, that even in the most essential things she desires chiefly to have right the hearts of the faithful. This being premised, let us examine what dispositions are deemed a transgression of this precept.

The sanctification of the Lord's day is one of those commandments, which the Lord himself has given to man. Unquestionably no divine command needs an apology; still we cannot but see the beauty and propriety of this, which specially consecrates one day to the noblest and most important of our duties; which recalls a man to his Creator.

The poor man, worn down by fatigue, bent to the earth, and uncertain whether it will yield him a miserable sustenance, forced to measure by his labour the day, which is not long enough for him: the rich man, anxious for the most part to spend it so as to get through it quickest; surrounded by those things in which the world affirms that happiness consists, and yet every moment filled with wonder at not finding himself happy; undeceived by the very objects from which he expected complete satisfaction, and longing after other objects, which, when attained, will in like manner deceive him; the man overwhelmed by misfortune, and the man intoxicated by prosperity; the man wallowing in pleasures, and the man absorbed in the abstractions of science; the statesman; the private individual; in fact, all of us find, in every object that surrounds us, an obstacle in our approach to the Divinity, a power which tends to attach us to those things for which we were not created, and to make us forget our noble origin, and the important end for which we were sent into the world. Here, then appears manifest the divine wisdom of that precept which takes us off from mortal cares, to call us back to the contemplation of celestial things; which employs so many of even the unimpaired man's days in a school of the sublimest philosophy; which sanctifies the repose of the body, rendering it the type of that repose of eternal enjoyment, for which we all pant, and which our soul feels itself capable of enjoying; of that precept which unites us in one temple, where our common prayers, reminding us of our common wants and miseries, make us feel that we are brethren. The Church, the constant guardian of this precept, dictates to her children the mode of following it in the most perfect and consistent manner. And among the means she selects, was it possible to forget that rite, of all others the most necessary; constituting the very essence of Christian worship, for it is no other than the sacrifice of Jesus Christ himself; that sacrifice, on which rests all faith, all knowledge, all rule, all hope? Can the Christian, who voluntarily abstains from such a sacrifice on such a day, be the "just man who lives by faith;" (Rom. i. 17, &c.) Is it possible for him to display in a more barefaced manner how little he cares for the divine precept of sanctification? Is it not evident that he has an aversion to Christianity in his heart, and that he has renounced the greatest, the most sacred, and the most consoling object that faith presents; that he has renounced Jesus Christ? To pretend that the Church should not denounce the man who cherished such dispositions as a transgressor, were to desire her to forget that end for which she was instituted, and to allow us to fall back into the deadly air of heathenism.—Manzoni's Vindication of Catholic Morality.

SYMPTOMS OF SCHISM.

Puseyism has for some time past been lying not dead indeed, but externally tranquil, displaying its life for the most part by strange semi-Catholic writings, chiefly and mainly in the pages of the British Critic, in which breathes the spirit of the subtlest and acutest—perhaps also one of the most honest of the Puseyite leaders. However, within the last few days we have had a small movement—a storm in a puddle—from another quarter. Dr. Pusey, it is discovered, was preaching some sad heresies at Christ-church last Sunday week. It is stated that the Vice-Chancellor of the University "has sent to Dr. Pusey, in pursuance of the statute, for a copy of the sermon, and it will probably be submitted to a Board of Heresy. [Query, 'an Heretical Board?'] Dr. Pusey, it is said, has requested two days before he delivers up the sermon, and some think he will refuse at the expiration of them; the matter is creating great interest."* The following is the account of the sermon, as given by the Oxford Chronicle. Correspondents—we suppose clerical ones—of the London papers remark, that the version is substantially true, substituting Consubstantiation for Transubstantiation; but "the doctrine of the Mass was also affirmed."

"On Sunday last Dr. Pusey preached to a large congregation at Christ Church, and publicly and without reserve professed and taught the great fundamental doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church—namely, Transubstantiation. The text taken was that which describes the institution of the Lord's Supper by our Lord: Mathew xxvi. v. 26, 27, 28; compared with John vi. v. 54. Dr. Pusey took these texts in the literal sense in which the gross-minded Jews and uneducated disciples took them, and for which they were rebuked by our Lord. In the first part of his sermon Dr. Pusey adopted the precise line of argument employed by Dr. Wiseman, in his volume published in the year 1836, and which consisted of lectures delivered at the English College at Rome. Following Dr. Wiseman, Dr. Pusey maintained, that on consecrating the elements of bread and wine, a change took place, into the mode of which it was presumptuous to inquire, but which we were to regard as a wonderful mystery—that it should be bread and wine, and yet the very body and blood of CHRIST. In support of these statements, Dr. Pusey quoted the language of the Council of Trent, session xiii., c. 3 and 4. It may be remarked here, that Dr. Turton, the able and learned Dean of Westminster, in his work on the Eucharist, has ably criticised the principles of interpretation adopted by Dr. Wiseman, but of these criticisms, Dr. Pusey took not the least notice.

* We see that Dr. Pusey has since delivered in his sermon, and that three examiners have been appointed.

“The second part of the sermon was on the communion of the Remission of Sins: and here the reader will perceive comes the awful and practical part of the subject. Transubstantiation is not a barren, inoperative speculation, but constitutes a system of divinity, and determines the whole character of the revelation of God’s will to man; and Dr. Pusey went necessarily the whole length of the argument, and laboured to show, that ‘the remission of sins’ referred not only to the atonement on the cross, by the one offering of the body of CHRIST, but also to the celebration of the Lord’s Supper; here again he quoted ‘the ancient Church,’ as authority. This doctrine is also maintained in Tract 90, as we noticed at the time, this tract asserting, ‘that there is nothing in the thirty-first article against the mass in itself, or against its being an offering for the remission of sin, when considered as a continuation of CHRIST’S sacrifice,’—p. 63, first edition.

“Consistently with these views, Dr. Pusey, in practically applying his subject, spoke of the Lord’s Supper as the means of continuing and maintaining the spiritual life imparted in baptism; and urged to more frequent communion, both on the part of “the holy, and of sinners; the former that they may enjoy an antepast of heaven, the latter, that they might, peradventure, obtain the remission of sins!”

The writer in the Oxford paper goes on to describe the “grief and horror” with which the knowledge of these facts fills him; raves a good deal about “saving light,” “cloud of error,” &c. &c.; and expresses his indignation, that persons holding such doctrines should also “hold posts of honour and profit” in a Church by which these doctrines are disavowed, and thus “violate the most solemn obligations,” and “pour forth a flood of corrupting error.” From the statement of the sermon above set out, we confess we do not exactly understand why the worthy evangelical gentlemen of the Oxford Chronicle is so full of horror and grief. The Anglican establishment, no where that we know of, condemns consubstantiation—that is, the joint presence in the Sacrament of bread and wine with the Body and Blood. It condemns transubstantiation indeed, but consustantiation it carefully avoids condemning. The articles, as they were fashioned in King Edward’s reign, did indeed condemn all kind of “corporeal” or “real presence,” and pretended to refute the doctrine in detail by some sham materialist metaphysics. But in Queen Elizabeth’s time, in the year 1562, the articles received a material alteration in this very particular. The denial of the corporal presence strikes equally at the Catholic doctrine of trans and at the Lutheran doctrine of con. But it was the object of the religion makers, in Elizabeth’s reign, to make their religion as roomy and commodious as possible. Moreover, they had a special desire to get rid of the Calvinistic influences that prevailed under Edward the Sixth. Accordingly, they contented themselves with condemning transubstantiation, and adopted the jargon that the body, &c., is “verily and indeed taken” but “after a spiritual manner,” and “by faith.” However, we cannot refrain from setting forth to the admiration of our readers the position in which this doctrine appears to stand. The following passage from Bishop Burnet (Part. 3 Book 6), will exhibit the matter in its true light:—

The differences between these articles and those set forth by King Edward, are very particularly marked in the collections added to my second volume. The most material is the leaving out that express declaration that was made against the corporal presence of Christ in the sacrament, which I then thought was done in compliance with the opinion prevalent among the people of the Popish persuasion, who were strangely possessed with the belief of such a presence; but I am convinced by the letters sent me from Zurich, that in this great regard was likewise had to the Lutheran churches, with whom a conjunction was much endeavoured by some: so that perhaps this was one consideration that made it be thought convenient to suppress the definition then made in this matter by the convocation; but it does no way appear to me whether these words were suppressed by the consent of the convocation, or whether the Queen ordered it to be done, either by a direct command, or by denying to give her assent to that part of the article.

From this it appears that the Reformed Church, in the reign of Edward, did reject the real presence, formally and verbally; that at a later period the rejection was officially withdrawn—not on any score of truth or falsehood, but for the convenience of admitting error; and thirdly, that the historian does not know whether the rejected matter was left out by order of the Church or by order of the State. Is it possible for anything more clearly to illustrate the private judgment system which the Puseyites worship? Their establishment once condemned what they now publicly teach. It has since—we will suppose—withdrawn its condemnation. What is their reason for attributing more value to the second condemnation than to the first? They can have but two reasons to give. The first is a chronological one; that is—to make it a fixed principle in theology that an establishment is more likely to be in error between the years 1547 and 1553 than between the years 1562 and 1843. This is, at all events, a very clear principle, but whether it is deduced from the Scriptures or the Fathers, or the first four Councils, we have not learning enough to determine. The second reason is neither more nor less than that the private judgment of the Puseyite prefers the latter decision to the former. Authority is out of the question. There is the authority of the same body on both sides; and thus it is that unless the Puseyites adopt our chronological solution of the difficulty, they have no alternative but to base the main doctrine of their religion—the doctrine of the Eucharist—upon their own individual notions, and not upon authority. The case, therefore between them and the Evangelicals stands thus:—Dr. Pusey’s doctrine of consubstantiation, or their anti-Catholic doctrine of the Real Presence is not now condemned by the articles. As matters now stand, therefore, an Anglican may hold the belied in the Real Presence. But the Evangelicals have this advantage over the Puseyites that the Calvinistic doctrine has never been condemned. The Puseyite remains in the establishment on sufferance, and is allowed to hold his private opinion about the Eucharist against a prior formal condemnation of that opinion. The Evangelical holds an opinion which is equally consistent with the present articles, which has once been expressly sanctioned by the establishment, which has never been condemned, but the opposite of which has been condemned in the most pointed and elaborate manner. Really on this matter we must give our feeble testimony to the despised Evangelical, as holding more stoutly by authority than the more pretentious high-flying Puseyite. We shall be very curious to know whether this examination of Dr. Pusey's sermon by the Heretical Board produces any fruit.

Meanwhile fruit is being produced by other acts in other quarters but springing from the same root of bitterness. It is singular to see how in these times Church questions are everywhere reviving. Among all classes—Protestant and Catholic—the opinions of the sceptical eighteenth century are passing away; the importance of spiritual things is becoming again recognized; and the infidel notion that the great use of establishments is to offer a protection against fanaticism, and furnish a safeguard to “moderate” religion, is dying out. Everywhere the Churches of western Europe, orthodox and heretical, are beginning to bristle up into a new life; and as they had all sunk down more or less into too abject a submission to civil authority, so now they are all beginning to arouse themselves out of their miserable slumbers. Now then, comes the trial of strength; and now we are to see in which church dwell the real elements of vitality. One such contest we have had in Europe, and have seen it brought to a conclusion—the contest between Rome and Berlin—and the military despot of the North has been fain to bow his head to the spiritual Monarch of the South. In Prussia the Church has proved true and strong, and the gates of hell have not prevailed against it. A second struggle has been carried on for some years in Scotland, between a “Reformed” Church and the less despotic state of England. What has been the issue of that conflict? Why, the Kirk, with every right upon its side, has gone to pieces in the contest. In England there are symptoms much fainter and less decided, of such another contest, of which the end is not so certain. We confess we should not be very sanguine about the result; because in England we consider all parties in the establishment as having far too much worldly prudence, and far too great a readiness to compromise, for us to have much reason to suppose that on this side of the Tweed any great sacrifices would be made for principle. If the history of the past did not teach us this, we should certainly imagine we saw, in a document recently published by the Morning Herald, the small beginning of a great crack in the Law Church.

It appears that the Bishop of London, in his late charge, has issued certain orders to the clergy of his diocese, touching the due observance of certain disused Protestant rubrics. These orders were found, it is said unpalatable to the majority of the clergy, and “universally to the laity.” The anti-Puseyite clergy attributed them to the influence of Puseyite advisers, and declare that on that account they “feel that to be coerced into the use of such injunctions “is deeply humiliating.” The majority have “declined to comply,” and the Bishop has met their uncomplying spirit with a high hand. “At the confirmations which are taking place, he intimates to the clergy present, that their attendance is required in the vestry, and there in language which admits of no discussion or appeal, issues his commands. His decisiveness of manner precludes all hopes of objections being heard, and the clergy retire in mortified silence.” But they are silent for the time only. Their pride is wounded, and their anger roused, and they resolve to appeal to the Prime Minister to relieve them from the tyranny of their own Bishop! Most certainly this is a very pretty quarrel, and the notion it displays as to the reality of Episcopal authority is positively charming. These recalcitrating parsons actually address a letter to the editor of the Morning Herald, in which, having not so much as gone through the preliminary of making a formal remonstrance to their diocesan, “they put it to him, very modestly, whether it is becoming on his part thus to force upon the clergy, MANY OF WHOM ARE EQUALLY GIFTED WITH HIMSELF, the adoption of obsolete practices, which their judgment deliberately repudiates.” And they tell him pretty plainly, that if he continues in this course he will be deemed to be of “a self-willed and dogmatic spirit, and will never afterwards be venerated with that love and affection which the clergy should entertain towards their spiritual father in Christ.” If the father tells his children to do anything they don't like, the children won't love him any more, and will agree to set him down for a very obstinate arbitrary old hunk. Nice children after the spirit! We wonder whether these are the lessons of filial obedience they inculcate upon their children after the flesh. After all for a dispute between a bishop of London and “the majority” of the persons in his diocese this seems to us to be almost without a parallel. Ample materials here for a schism if there was any superfluity of honest adherence to principle on either side. But to make matters worse, we are told by these “spiritual children,” that they “know that the suggested alterations, injurious as they are, are but the precursors to others still more pernicious.” And so they set themselves to work to agitate against their bishop, “to send up petitions to her Majesty,” and make pathetic appeals to the Prime Minister! How long will it be before these obedient parsons discover the soundness of the lesson inculcated into them by the Irish Presbyterian Professor of Church History, now on a sympathising visit to the “disrumpers” in Edinburgh—the lesson namely, “that it is their duty to go and do likewise;” and that, forasmuch as “semi-Popery has been taught openly for years, and not a single minister has ever yet been deposed for the heresy, “Episcopal Government is a folly rather too expensive.” Of a truth, they seem apt pupils for such a lesson.—Tablet May 27th.

ON THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

The existence of a first cause is indispensable; it is a point of invincible necessity. The idea of effect, without a primary cause, has been rejected as an absurdity, by the universal consent of all mankind. Man, the only visible intellectual inhabitant of this globe, who is endowed with faculties competent to an inquiry of this nature, and who is alone capable of that reflection which elevates him, in so superior a degree, above the rank of animals confined to simple sensation, must, by the operation of reason alone, from the beginning have discovered the necessity of this first cause. The novelty and beauty of the interesting and striking objects that surround him, must have excited his attention, and have led him into that train of thought, which must always arise from a contemplation of the glory and splendor of the works of the creation. Although he be not acquainted with the motions and revolutions of the luminous bodies, interspersed through the sublime vault which forms the canopy of his dwelling, he is sensibly affected with the beauty and grandeur of the picture: but reflection, which in man is so closely connected with sensation, must suggest to his mind, that this magnificent object must be the work of some superior Being.

“The existence of God,” says Cicero, “requires no proof, a single glance of the eye is sufficient to convince us of it: for when we contemplate the heavens, and the beauty and harmony of the heavenly bodies, is not the idea of a supreme and intelligent Power, who governs the universe, involuntarily forced upon us?”

“Should we suppose,” says the same author, after Aristotle, “a society of men, inhabitants of a subterraneous dwelling—the earth opens and they see the sun—the view

“of the heavens and of all nature, strike their senses so powerfully, that we should suppose we hear them cry out with one voice, in the first transports of their admiration, that THERE IS A GOD!”

Such is the language of two of the most celebrated amongst the pagan philosophers; and such the reflections that would arise in the mind of any man of sound judgment, in similar circumstances.

When we hear the royal prophet cry out, that the heavens shew forth the glory of God, and the firmament declareth the work of his hands; that the day announces it to the day, and the night to the night; that the heavens have their peculiar language, which speaks to the eyes; that this language, resounds from one extremity of the earth to the other; that there is no people however savage, or whatever other language they speak, that do not comprehend this; must we not acknowledge in these words, the first cry of nature, as well as the inspiration of the holy spirit?

Such are the feelings of man with respect to a first cause, whilst he is yet in his simple unlettered state; whilst he is as yet unacquainted with what is given him to know, of the study of nature, or, as a celebrated modern naturalist defines it, of that system of laws by which Providence governs the universe: but when, more enlightened, he becomes acquainted with the laws of motion and the science of astronomy; when he is able to calculate the immense distance that separates the earth from these vast globes which move through the heavens; when the telescope brings nearer to his view, the several parts of which this mighty machine is composed; when he ascertains the amazing velocity, regularity and harmony of their motions; that the space of time in which these planets complete their revolutions in their several orbits is regulated, to the most invariable exactness, as is that of several comets, which appear within our sphere of vision, only after the lapse of several years, some of centuries. When he has, I say, acquired this knowledge, what must be his sentiments with respect to creation?—he can no longer entertain a doubt. As it forms no part of our plan to enter into astronomical investigation, we shall refer our scientific readers to the different tracts written on that subject, in which they will find that it is the opinion of the greater number, that the fixed stars are so many suns, equal in size and splendor to ours, which serve as centres to other systems, of an extent and magnitude beyond all human calculation. When we consider the trifling influence which these distant and immense worlds, seem to have on our sphere, can we suppose that they had no other end in the creation, than that of affording us a casual and transitory light during the night?—Whoever can follow the immortal Newton through all the wonders of this sublime creation, will be induced, from fair and philosophical induction, to believe that they are inhabited, and that thus myriads of rational beings, perhaps superior to man, and rising in regular gradations of perfection, up to the throne of God, form one vast, one innumerable host, who bend in thanksgiving and gratitude to that Omnipotent Power, who called them into this miraculous and incomprehensible existence, in order that they should answer the purposes of his eternal wisdom and goodness. Hence we are authorised to conclude, that no man of clear understanding and enlightened mind, can resist the conviction of this truth—that nothing short of infinite power and wisdom, could have given birth to those innumerable worlds, which for ages have rolled on, in silent majesty, through the immensity of space. What hand but that of the Almighty, could have wielded these elements, or what power, but that of Omnipotence, could have contained such immense masses within the orbits appointed for their revolutions?

Oh, man! how sublime thy destination, when it is allowed thee to, as it were, participate with beings of a superior nature, in the general act of glorifying the Author of this magnificent system! How grand the privilege! How proud thy pre-eminence above all other creatures, inhabitants of the earth!

The surface of the earth presenting to us objects not less interesting than the starry firmament, though somewhat less striking as to magnificence and grand effect, affords new proofs, that God is the primary cause of all existence. Here our wonder is not so much excited, the scenery being more familiar, more appropriate to human feeling, and more immediately connected with our senses, those organs that in inferior animals administer to mechanical wants only, but which in man are destined also for the superior purpose of affording matter for contemplation, and the higher operations of the intellectual faculties. Whether we consider the sea or land, the view is equally enlivening; the surface of the ocean, unruffled by the storm, ornamented with the innumerable barks which plough its silent bosom; the variety of fertile and verdant islands, which rear their heads above its level, offering their rich and abundant produce to all the inhabitants of the earth, connected by commerce; the almost infinite number of creeks, bays and harbours, of opulent cities the proud resort of man; of vast continents waving with yellow harvests which embellish its winding shores, impress on the mind the strongest sentiments of admiration and gratitude. This beautiful, this ever-varying element, sometimes appears strewed with brilliant stars: the track of a ship, whilst it cuts the azure waves, is often luminous, and forms a stream of electric fire. Twice in twenty-five hours it rises and falls, forming tides. This phenomenon is attended with circumstances highly useful and beneficial to man.

But when agitated by the storm, when its angry waves, roused by the spirit of the tempest, swell to the horizon, the sight becomes awful and tremendous; when the howling waste of mighty waters, rushing from the profound abyss, threatens with destruction the rocky ramparts that hem them in, it is then that the heart of the mightiest sinks within him—it is then that man feels his own littleness; it is during this horrid contention of the elements, that he is forced to cry out for protection and mercy to that powerful Being, whose angry breath throws nature into these fearful convulsions: prostrate on the earth, he is then forced to confess, with trembling, that THERE IS A GOD!—that he only can save him; that he only can arrest the roaring flood; he, that has marked the barrier, that for ever shuts out the incroachments of that daring intruder, who would else overwhelm the earth, and bury this beautiful part of his creation in one universal ruin.

The population of the sea is immense, its inhabitants innumerable: the aquatics seem not indeed so various in their species as the terrestrial, but they surpass them much in size, and, in the long duration of their existence: the elephant is small compared to the whale, whose length is frequently from sixty to seventy feet: it lives as long as an oak, and consequently in length of life no land animal can be compared to it.

Fishes in the beauty and lustre of their colours, surpass all animals either of the earth or air. Their numbers and rapid production is such, that, were they not to devour each other, and constitute so large a portion of the food of man, they would soon fill their own element, by their putrefaction poison the atmosphere, and destroy animal and vegetable life all over the surface of the earth. Their natural history can never be much known.—Amongst several instances of singular sagacity and ingenuity of organs, one merits particular notice—a non-descript has been discovered, who inhabits the bottom of the deep, and shoots up to the surface, on a long fishing rod, an artificial bait, like a bit of red muscular flesh; on this bait the animal has his eye (which is placed in the middle of his body) fixed, and when his game pursues it, he cautiously contracts his rod, and thus inveigles his prey within the reach of his claws. Would not the structure of this animal alone, to a reflecting mind, be a sufficient proof of the design and intelligence of the divine Artificer, who from matter, originally inanimate, could form such an admirable organization? The sea, as well as the sky, demonstrates, that nothing can be the result of blind chance: the wisdom of plan, and the perfection of mechanism, in every instance, point out the hand of Omnipotence, and the beneficence of a superintending Providence.

Although a designed and studied mechanism be less evident in the organization of plants, than in that of animals, yet we know enough of their history to convince us, that the same wisdom of plan, the same ingenuity of contrivance, is observable throughout the many thousands which have been classed by the naturalist. For a detail of their genera, species, or botanical characters, as inconsistent with our plan, we refer our readers to the proper sources of information on this subject, simply observing, that the extraordinary care taken by nature in the preservation of the seed (on which the succession of the plant so intimately depends), against accident or injury, is admirable—in this instance the design is single, whilst the means are diversified with a variety almost infinite. Pellicles, shells, stones, thorns, prickles, &c. &c., are employed in the prosecution of this object, which has been so completely carried into effect, that of the many thousands of plants which are scattered over the face of the earth, probably, not a single species has been lost, from their first formation at the creation.

The natural history of insects is but little known to man. The microscope has enabled him to discover in their organization, several proofs of mechanism, still more wonderful than that of plants, as more various and complicated, and as ministering to the functions of sensitive beings. The minuteness of the organs however, in a vast multitude of their species, is such, that they must for ever, in a great measure, escape his inquiries.

Amidst a vast variety, we may be allowed to select the elegance of structure, the wisdom of design, and the ingenious adaptation of the means to the end proposed; in the elythra, or scaly wings of the beetle; in the awl or borer, fixed at the tails of various species of flies, with which they pierce different substances, for the purpose of depositing their eggs; in the stings of insect; in their proboscis; in the organization in the abdomen of silkworms and spiders for forming their thread.

If we carefully look over the several distributions of science, it will appear, that the insect creation will afford many examples, from which man might have borrowed several of the discoveries and arts most useful in human life. From the spider and silkworm he may learn to spin; the use of the forceps or pincers, from the panorpa tribe, with which the male catches and holds the female; the use of the brush from a fly, described by St. Pierre; from bees, ants, snails, and other animals, he may learn to build convenient habitations, granaries, storehouses, &c. The glow-worm will afford him a specimen of a chymical process, which takes place within the body of a very small insect. It had been long a grand operation in chymistry to make phosphorous; it is found in the tail of the glow-worm, who, besides its formation, is endowed with the power of kindling it. The glow-worm is a female caterpillar, the male of which is a fly. "The caterpillar cannot meet her companion in the air, his native element: the winged rover disdains the ground. They might therefore never be brought together, did not this radiant torch, direct the volatile male to his sedentary female." (Paley.)

CONVERSIONS.—We have learned with pleasure that in a district within the Madras Vicariate, one non-adult and four adult Protestants have been received into the Church, and that five Native children were baptized.

Since our last issue, which announced that the Rev. Dr. Backhaus had baptized two Heathens, we are glad to learn that the Rev. gentleman's zeal has been further rewarded by the baptism of another Heathen.

CONFRATERNITY OF THE ROSARY OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

We have learned with great satisfaction, that the Committee of the Confraternity of the Rosary has most judiciously assigned a monthly subscription of ten Rupees towards the support of the BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE. Nothing could recommend an Institution like the Confraternity more strongly to the enlightened and pious portion of the Catholic Community, than such an admirable appropriation of its surplus revenue, as that which we have just commended. When it becomes generally known, ~~that~~ all sums arising either from the contributions of subscribers, or from the sale of such furniture as is not required for the religious festivals of the Confraternity, are to be consecrated, after defraying the just expences that must be incurred, to so holy a purpose, as that of educating and supporting orphans, the most respectable members of the Catholic body in Calcutta will be emulous to join the Sodality, in order to share in its good works. We would strongly exhort the Committee to persevere in the truly good course, on which it has so edifyingly entered, and to follow up what it has begun, by setting apart, according as means permit, funds for the permanent support of a certain number of Male and Female Orphans. It would be easy to arrange matters so, as that when a vacancy might occur, a preference should be given to the children of deceased Members of the Confraternity. Thus, in joining the Confraternity, every Parent would feel, that he did that which would contribute not only to his own spiritual welfare, but also to the temporal welfare both of his own children, should they, by his death, be left in a state of destitution, and of the children of any other Brother of the Confraternity who might be visited with a like misfortune.

PROTESTANTISM AND CATHOLICISM CONTRASTED

IN A SERIES OF FAMILIAR LETTERS, ADDRESSED BY A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA, TO HIS PROTESTANT RELATIONS AND FRIENDS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—It is with considerable diffidence that I venture to address you upon a subject of such vast importance as Religion, yet it is the importance of the subject which induces me to make the attempt, for our exertions in general must be commensurate with the object in view—now the object is certainly one of vital moment to either one or the other of us, for if the Catholic Church is right, the Protestant religion is wrong, or vice versa. In such a case, it is neither a proof of friendship nor charity in either party to remain silent; as I believe you wrong, I wish to lead you to what I conceive to be the right path, I therefore address you in the true spirit of friendship and Christianity; do thou so likewise. "Do, as you would be done by," is the Christian motto.—Years have now elapsed, my dear friends, since I returned from a sojourn amongst you; as many of you are aware, I first left my native land when but a youth for this country; I was then but little acquainted with the peculiarities of your faith, though not uninstructed in the rudiments of my own. I returned to my native home certainly prepared to meet with many prejudices against Catholics and their religion, but the reality far exceeded my expectations; I mixed much and freely amongst you; some of you are my near and dear relations—many of you are my intimate and esteemed friends; some of you are rich, and some of you are poor; I have since thought deeply and with concern of the difference of our Creeds, a difference that often mars friendship, and sours religion—that stands as a bar between good neighbourhood, and not unfrequently closes the latch against people of the same race, ay! of the same family; when then I found it thus, and heard your belief of Catholic doctrines and Catholic practices, I often remained mute from astonishment, and could only exclaim apart to myself; "Good Heavens! can it be, that my relations and friends think thus of Catholics? Where could they have derived their notions of them and their religion? Can these be the descendants of the Catholics of two or three generations back? Could this have been a Catholic country only three hundred years ago? But, alas! alas! the very ruins and old walls around me emphatically, though mutely told me a tale of the times of old, their dilapidated condition spoke: their sad story related their true history; even the moaning winds that whistled through those ivy clad ruins, seemed like the spirits of the past to articulate to me, "these broken down walls are the monuments of your Catholic ancestors, they are the relics of Catholic temples, it was the ruthless and sacrilegious hand of man, and not time which levelled most of us to the ground." Such was their silent and touching appeal to my religious feelings; they spoke unutterable truths; I felt when wandering over them as treading upon holy and consecrated ground, but polluted by man's violence; yes, my dear friends, I felt thus, and saw in some of your present places of worship in the ancient temple of the disciples of St. Augustine, the marks of Catholicity, the very figures of the buildings were Catholic, the sign of the cross could be traced in the very foundations, it was visible upon the walls; I could remark too the once magnificent altar cut down to a common communion table. These scenes were new to me, I entered those old and noble temples of Catholic times with feelings of awe and respect—awe for the dead, and respect for the religion once taught there; my thoughts quickly carried me back to times that were past, and the contrast of what they were to what they are was painfully acute. There stood the altar—there stands the Communion Table.—These places were once occupied by Catholics—they are now occupied by Protestants—the first were the ancestors of the last—the last are but the great-great-grandchildren of the first; they worship their God in a different form and in a different sense. What the former taught then as Christianity, the latter teach now as Idolatry. What the one believed was then the way to Salvation, the other believes is now the way to Damnation! It is but 300 years, since this wonderful vicissitude came over the religion of England and a considerable portion of Europe! “Strange! Strange!” could this change in religion have been effected by the Spirit of God? Was it by his impulse that these magnificent Temples were hurled to the ground. Were our forefathers of old then not converted to Christianity after all? Was the religion of St. Patrick, of St. Augustine, of St. Palladius, nothing but a tissue of idolatry and superstition, when it is so much calumniated, so little known, and so soon forgotten? Did it perish with the dead? Was it buried in the ruins around? No, no, my dear friends. But these were some of the thoughts and feelings which used to crowd upon my mind, (without however doubting for a moment the stability of my own faith) as I witnessed the effect and the consequence of the Reformation! But the effect which this extraordinary revolution had upon the material part, I found was nothing to what it had upon the spiritual world; man can easily destroy the Temples erected by his own hands, but that he should attempt to overthrow the once acknowledged pure Temple of God, was a thing awful for me to contemplate. It is true I paid but little attention to the matter before, nor in India had I much opportunity of seeing your various publications and tracts, and still less of beholding Protestants in a mass, and therefore knew not the extent of the evil, nor the deep rooted prejudices you bore towards Catholics, or the crude and erroneous idea you had formed of their religion, until I found myself amongst you at home, I then had ready access to your works; they were often indeed thrown purposely in my way by my Protestant friends, with the best intentions imaginable, and I certainly read them at times with such eagerness, that good hopes were entertained of me; but candidly the perusal of them had invariably the contrary effect, the contention of Creeds found therein only bound me if any thing stronger to my own Faith, and rivetted me if possible more firmly to the “Rock” and to the centre of Unity. When then I read your different publications—heard your preachers teach such different doctrines—Met members of the same family going separate ways—one to the Church and one to the Meeting House—beheld you jostling each other in the streets, going to hear contrary doctrines, and saw some of those who lived next door to a Church starting for a distant conventicle, and vice versa; I could not help exclaiming “and this is Protestantism!” this is the result of what they call “the glorious Reformation of religion!” this is its fruit, and this alas! is the way then in which my relations and friends have learned their false knowledge of Catholic doctrine. It is from those works—those Ministers they have imbibed their fearful misconception of the moral character and habits of Catholics;” Yes, my dear friends, I was astonished—I was shocked—I was grieved at what I saw and heard, indignation at the slanders cast against Catholics soon gave way to deep sorrow and pity: sorrow to find my friends and acquaintances so egregiously deceived, and so impenetrable to truth, and pity for the ignorant, at being so cruelly blinded: for were your Ministers and writers to state to you our doctrine truly, we should not find fault with them, nay, we would have to thank them; they might even go so far as to throw the garb of ridicule over it, and we would not complain so much, but let them leave the reality to public view, our blessed Saviour himself was so clothed, still he was not so disfigured, but that his friends and his enemies too could know him—this is the reason, that when Protestants become Catholics, they do not know it for the religion which they were accustomed to read and hear of in their early days; it was glossed over to them with so dark a cloud of calumny and untruth, and so deeply laid on, that nothing but the light of heaven itself and the grace of God could remove it; need you wonder then, my good friends, that I tried in turn to put Catholic works in your way, such as “Bishop Milner’s End of Controversy,” “Amicable Discussion” and more modern works, but alas! alas! I found a barrier in the path—prejudice on one side and bigotry on the other, with at times another dark figure in mid-way; few, very few indeed, I found would or could read those works, the food was unpalatable.

table, the doctrine did not chime with what they had been accustomed to read in Protestant works, or to hear preached from Protestant pulpits. They also no doubt met with some pointed comments on the Reformation, the authors of it, and the followers thereof; unavoidable subjects in controversial works; such thence were too bitter to the taste, and they were generally cast aside. Having then, my dear friends, failed in engaging you in most instances to peruse those learned works, I must now endeavour to invite your attention in a series of letters which I purpose to address to you through our now speedy and monthly channel of communication, the Overland Mail—and I will venture to hope, you will peruse them with some patience, coming from the hand of a friend and relation. If I but succeed in removing even from the minds of a few of you, some of those unhallowed prejudices which you entertain towards Catholics and their religion, I shall deem my time and labour not thrown away; you know me well, so I trust, I may calculate upon your giving credence to what I state as being my own belief: and that of the Catholic Church, as far as I enter into the subject; it may indeed seem presumptuous in me, to attempt to introduce the matter to your notice, considering the many profound treatises, which from time to time have been addressed by eminent Catholic divines to the Protestant public, but the above is my reason, nor does the battle always go with the strong—humble means may at times effect what more powerful ones may fail in, and I further hope that the balm of friendship may sooth what might otherwise irritate. If however I make use of any expression or sentiment which may appear harsh, I entreat you not to ascribe it to an acrimonious mind; or imagine that it is said with the intention to wound your feelings; for believe me no physician ever felt more anxious to conceal the unpleasant taste of his medicine from his patient, than I do, in my desire to bring this unpleasant but most vital subject before you, so as not to offend. I purpose but to skim over the surface; not to enter deeply into the mazes of the different points of religion under dispute between our Churches, my object is rather to remove some of the obstacles in the path—to clear away the rubbish, and to point out in a manner where the mine is to be found. Think not therefore that I am so vain as to suppose, that what I may say will convince you that I am right and that you are wrong! No, no, though this is my fervent wish, still I cannot altogether calculate upon so desirable a result, but I may indulge in the hope, that my letters may lead some of you to think better of the Catholic religion. All I crave of you then is to read them in that true spirit of Christian charity, which, believe me, dictates them; if you do this, I fear not but I shall have my reward; for be assured, I write not for gain nor for fame; that God alone is an observer of my motives, and that I seek for no other patron than him—through whom, if I may presume to use the expression, I beg to dedicate these series of letters to you; may he of His Mercy endue my words with the unction of his grace, May he open your hearts—remove your prejudices—enlighten your minds, and shall I say it, my dear friends, yes, yes, may he make you true members of the One, True and Holy Catholic Church, is, and ever will be, the sincere prayer of

Yours faithfully,
C. A. C.

THE MISSIONARIES OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

SIR,—Your reply to V. Q. among your notices to Correspondents on Friday last, practically attested as it has lately been by your pages, exempts me from making any apology for resuming the subject, of which I hoped, I had taken final leave; and offer some remarks on Mr. Pearce's letter which appeared in your paper of Monday, 10th inst.* These remarks will be of a general nature, for into the recriminatory details of that letter I shall not enter. The more there is of that kind of thing the more fully will my former observations on it be verified whilst the real question at issue will be more and more lost sight of. This, be it then remembered, was, and is; 1st, whether a certain pledge, alleged to have been given by Mr. Corrie, was given; 2ndly, whether, if given, it can be binding on the S. P. G. Missionaries?

The positions arrived at and maintained in, my former communications, and hitherto mistaken, were 1st, that it is by no means certain, in the present state of the evidence, that any such pledge was given; 2dly, if given, the observance of it would be irreconcilable with the Missionaries' Ordination Vows; a consideration, however, which is in the present case superfluous, since the Rev. Missionaries, whose conduct has been called in question never were informed of the existence of any such pledge. Which being the case, the distinction which I drew between the S. P. C. K. and the S. P. G., though not yet invalidated—may be dispensed with as superfluous, and any discrepancy, in this respect, between my statement and Mr. Jones' (if there be any) can be of no consequence, nor need I concern myself to enquire, whether they be or be not quite consistent.

One is rather inclined to inquire, what Mr. Pearce's instances of aggression can have to do with the matter? For, any how, the pledge, supposing it to have been given, has not been alleged as given to the Anabaptists but to the London Missionary agents. Are they identical? It would seem that they are not. Then all the aggression conceivable on the Anabaptists, supposing it to have occurred, has nothing to do with the supposed pledge. What then has Mr. Pearce to do with the matter, or what reason for coming forward in it? Is it owing to that one common bond of Dissenters, (who can agree among themselves in little else) aggression on the Church? for which the Anabaptists are eminently distinguished? Witness the statement, in p. 11, of the "reply of the Serampore Missionaries, &c." (stitched up with No. XI of the (Quarterly) Friend of India 1825) that "the number of the baptized (by the Serampore Anabaptists) of every nation from Dec. 1800 to Dec. 1821 was one thousand four hundred and seven (1407) of this number (they have reason to believe) the Europeans, who were chiefly soldiers, amounted fully to four hundred." Cox's history of the (Ana) Baptist Mission published last year, abounds with proof of the same.

Mr. Pearce's proceeding is, nevertheless, intelligible enough, however irrelevant. His statements stand as so much evidence to the fact (alleged) of aggression on a certain district, claimed by the London Missionary agents. He volunteers to attest, that the case is so, for the Anabaptists have suffered in the same place by the same cause. The Anabaptists are in that district too, although, on Mr. Pearce's own showing, "the London Missionaries were first in it by some years;" and, according to his theory, "labor and converts in a district give possession," and according to his argument, there should be no intrusion. But, be his theory and his statements what they may, let not the real question, as put above, be lost sight of, if the discussion is to be continued.

The hope has been expressed in some of the letters which have appeared, that good to the Missionary cause may result from it. Indeed let us hope so. Let us hope that Churchmen at least, will be led to reflect on the evil of contributing funds, as so many do, to the support of Schism, and not let their deeds contravene the Church's Prayers and help to thwart her discipline. Let the hope be cherished, that the disclosures now being made of, in some respects, the deplorable state of missionary enterprise, may lead some to reflect on the stress which scripture lays on the Unity of the Church as one means, if not the chief, by which the world shall be converted by the Church. Such reflections may lead, not to abandonment of the enterprise, as though the Gospel were not to be preached to all nations; but, to the conclusion, that, probably at least, along with the Gospel was divinely given some method of propagating it, and, if so, there must be some radical fault in that liberalism or empiricism which, in our days, makes it a matter of diversified experiment, beginning in ignorance, continued in confusion, ending in failure.

Let us hope, that people will also pause and reflect, while on Mr. Pearce's confession, that Heathens and Christians are employed indifferently in the capacity of School-masters, taken in connection with the following extract from Cox's history above quoted, (vol. 11, page 313.)

"Little attention has been paid to schools in Monghyr, though at one time there were twelve or fourteen day-schools for boys. It was discovered, however, that while their heathen masters instructed them in reading the Scriptures (!!) they did all in their power to prejudice their minds against Christianity." They were, therefore, all abolished.

Let us hope too, that people will be startled at the morality involved in the following words of Mr. Pearce's letter: "as it is a sin to live in fornication, but a virtue to avoid it by marrying, Mr. Wenger very properly, on the ground of the evidence which he had received"—to wit, that certain parties were living not in adultery but in fornication—"married the parties without delay."

The Church truly teaches, in the marriage service that "marriage was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication;" but who would hence conclude, as Mr. Pearce has done, that fornicators should be married without delay?

Yes, let us hope, that people, Church-people at least, will pause ere they support a sect which, having cast off obedience to the Church, has so far lost the very sense of discipline, awe, of propriety, as to allow fornication to be a title to the ministration of the rites of holy matrimony.

Truly, if fornicators can thus avoid ~~the~~, and the shame of sin too, Mr. Jones' statement becomes mournfully intelligible, when he complains of the difficulty of enforcing penance, seeing that contumacious offenders go off to the dissenters. On Mr. Pearce's system even unbaptized catechumens, by committing fornication, may gain a title to marriage—but can the unbaptized marry any how, "in the Lord"—is that the HOLY Matrimony of the Gospel? It is now a week since Mr. Pearce's letter has been before the public—none of his party have protested against or even objected to this part of it—I conclude, therefore, that in these remarks I am not unwarrantably earnest.

* Mr. Street has mistaken us. We referred to the general question of Puseyism, as connected with the National Church, not to the petty dissensions of rival Missionary Societies.—Ed.

I remain, Sir, your's truly,
A. W. STREET.

Bishop's College, July 17, 1843.

THE CALCUTTA FREE SCHOOL AND ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

We have read with much interest the report of the proceedings of the Calcutta Free School for the year 1842. It is a most deserving, useful, and excellent institution to which we cannot too urgently direct public attention, and we press upon all those who desire to apply the sums they are enabled to expend in charity to a really practical end, the high expediency of their considering the objects and the working of this worthy institution with a view to devoting a portion at least of their eleemosynary contributions in aid of the purpose to which it's funds are applied.

There is however one very material point which requires consideration; and that is the cost, comparatively taken, of the subsistence of the children which it's contingent expenses, and of the maintenance of the teachers and establishment. We do not intend to notice the matter invidiously, but the facts we shall submit are so glaring that they command attention, more particularly, that of Journalists professing perfect impartiality, and it is necessary that they should be noted.

In the balance sheet we find the sum of Rs. 15,000 debited, as for the maintenance, with attendant cost of clothing, books, and contingencies, of the children, and no less a sum than 19,572 Rs. on the same side as expended for the salaries of masters, medical men, office and native establishment. Thus we find that the charge of procuring the means to educate exceeds by about one fourth the total cost of all other outlay incurred on account of the parties to be educated. The proportion is very excessive when we compare it with that of other educational institutions conducted on different principles; and when the comparison is carried further and the worth of the educational power purchased in the one case by a large outlay is contrasted with the value of that so poorly (as we shall show) procured in the other, thinking men will be induced to conclude with us that there is a radical fault in our educational system which requires serious consideration. We are alluding to the comparative charges, as regards costs of teachers at St. Xavier's College. There each teacher supports himself at the average personal charge of twenty five rupees a month (we have it on authority), not one among them but is either theoretically or practically of high attainments in his respective line, and further instructed in the art of teaching, an art by itself most difficult of attainment with any degree of perfection, but of all acquirements most necessary in the proper conduct of a sound educational process.

The examination programmes of this College show us of what it is capable, and the very superior character of the system of instruction there adopted. The report before us gives four masters and mistresses of the Free School, costing Rs. 10,144-10 in the year, a fraction above Rs. 2,250 for each person; and we find that for this, the first class of boys had not finished even the "reading" of the Holy Scriptures, being only as far as the second book of Chronicles; their "historical" knowledge extended in English history (and save Scripture History they know no other,) to the end of the reign of the Second George; and their "Chronological" attainments are bounded by the period marking the end of the reign of Charles 1st. In the useful knowledge of Arithmetic, the first class stop at "reduction of vulgar fractions" and "discount." Now the "reading" which extends to George the Second, and the chronology which reaches only to Charles the First, seems to argue that the difference between the two, the intervening space chronicled, has been to the pupils a sort of limbo historically speaking, the actual presence of words with the virtual absence of ideas attached to them. We may be very wrong, but it looks so. If it be so, surely this part of education is rather a worthless offset to Rs. 10,144 for teachers.

But it may be urged, that the argument we take is unfair; that we compare the Protestant teacher with the Catholic ascetic teaching for the sake of his religion: that in the one case, the charge includes the teacher and his Protestant want, an orthodox establishment of wife, and babes; while in the other the Professor of St. Xavier's College is a more isolated Celibate, segregated, solitary, devoted to a fixed idea, living for it, and dying in it. Doubtless to compare man with man, habit with habit, or creed with creed in such a matter would be unfair, for the relation of the one to the other would bear no comparison; but it is fair to contrast the result of the labours of the men. Now if the one gives inferior education at excessive cost, and the other superior instruction with a charge next to nothing debitable to the instructor, we may say that there is a remedy required for some great evil in the costly Protestant system. The Jesuit is accused of professing religion to serve temporal purpose: the Protestant is chargeable with making a profession of religion to serve a worldly one. In the great question of education of youth the former may stand open to imputation of attempting to proselytise in religion while he seeks to draw about him by the superiority of his secular teaching a greater number of scholars of all creeds and classes; the other is liable to be blamed for assembling pupils not that they may be taught, but that he may get a salary for being supposed to teach them.

These are serious considerations, and they will merit the mature consideration of high clerical authority. The progress made by the Jesuit teachers of St. Xavier's we do not envy, nor regret; on the contrary, the stimulus their efforts will give to the general impulse to supply knowledge is most valuable; as it will bring down the price at which knowledge has been hitherto bought in this country, and most materially improve the quality of the article supplied. We earnestly entreat the attention of that zealous, and well intentioned prelate, our present Bishop, to the general question, and in all respect venture to suggest that his strenuous endeavours should be applied towards the diminution of the cost, and improvement of the character of Protestant education in Bengal.—Calcutta Star, August 2.

TRADING PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES.

We are now at liberty to speak upon a question, which we take occasion to introduce as a not inapt sequel to our remarks on the costs of education, and emoluments of Protestant teachers in this country. It relates to the secular pursuits of some among the large and useful class, whence many of those teachers are supplied; we mean the Missionaries of different sects of the reformed religion. The subject is one upon which we have frequently thought, and we now are able to speak, as the papers no longer contain the advertisement addressed to the charitable and humane on behalf of the Rev. W. Carey. We trust that all have given that wish to give in alleviation of their pensioned Missionary's pecuniary distresses, and thus we trust that our present notice will do him no harm. The subject is one well worthy the attention of all those who desire to see the objects for which Missionaries are at large cost sent out to this country, properly; and legitimately carried through.

The Rev. Mr. Carey came before the public stating that he had been some forty years actively employed at Calcutta in Missionary duties, that he had received a pension from the Baptist Mission Fund of a hundred rupees a month, but that having entered into some small transactions to benefit his family, and having been unfortunate, he was in debt and begged the assistance of the Christian public to help in freeing him from his embarrassment. The plain English of the matter is that Mr. Carey being in a part of the country not unfavourable for commercial enterprise, had entered into trading, and agricultural operations, and had lost money by them. What circumstances may have induced Mr. Carey to take this unlucky course, as it turned out, we know not: he may have had some pecuniary pressure for money: a sick wife to send his sons to educate, daughters to marry, and thus found speculation thrust upon him as a means of alleviating his pecuniary wants—if he succeeded: but if the contrary, as would be most likely, for ministers of the gospel are not bred to commerce, he ran the risk of exhibiting the not over edifying spectacle of an insolvent Missionary. But we will not pause upon the instance. Mr. Carey is described to us as a worthy, hospitable, generous, warmed-hearted man, one of the open-handed who are not made to make money; and we will suppose a hundred palliatives to justify his having unfortunately made an injudicious use of his peculiar position in a productive district. But let us take up the principle.

Societies of pious, and philanthropic persons band together for the purpose of extending to heathen countries the blessings of revealed religion. They educate chosen men to the task of instruction and conversion, and send them forth on an errand, we speak it not profanely, of as purely divine a character as that on which the first preachers of the Glad Tidings were sent forth to do their blessed work among all nations. From Europe, from America, these Missionaries of the reformed churches come in great number. They are of course never placed by their employers in circumstances unbefitting the character of their sacred task; they are almost always maintained in a fair state of worldly respectability with all the actual necessities of life, many of its comforts, and sometimes even something more: in return for this they are bound to devote their entire energies to the holy work they have undertaken: they certainly are not to lay the hand to the plough, and slack it when in mid-furrow: they are not to forget that their work is spiritual, and they must be understood to separate themselves as much as possible (we mean the working, preaching Missionary) from all secular concerns. But what if any man among them forget this obligation, and slur over the stringency of the paramount claim which the duties of his mission have upon him? What if he take wages for the cure of souls, and cure hides with it? What if his mind wander away from watching the progress of his converts to calculate the advances for his cocoons? What if the sordid interests of traffic interfere between him and his flock? Will they respect him, honour him, treasure up his precepts and take his preaching as the world of everlasting life, when he has been bargaining with them for Mammon? Surely not: this man is a holy huckster, but no Missionary.

But of course it will be said, "this is not true; this is an exaggerated supposition; this is a dubious fact." We appeal, with respect and submission, to no less an authority, than the Right Reverend the Bishop of Calcutta. He found the Missions in the Straits actually disorganized a few years ago, by the inordinate spirit of trade; he made special remark upon this fact on his return to Bengal, and issued a variety of sound and excellent precautional instructions guarding against the abuse; but stated so roundly the extent of the evil as to say, in his own quaint but powerful language, quoted to us by excellent authority, that "he found the missionaries up to their necks in nutmegs."

This will show to what length this trading spirit will go among salaried Missionaries if not checked by constant controul. Now having observed, as in the case of Mr. Carey, that signs of a reproduction of the evil were among us, and worse still, that no public notice was taken of a public avowal of Missionary trading we deem it our duty to speak, if no one else will, and beg that the same purifying hand that drove out the leprous canker before will again be active to prevent its return if, as happily may we trust be the case, that prevention only is requisite. But much care must be taken. The spirit of traffic and of gain, even by second hand, or benamée, must wholly disappear among men devoted to the sublimest task on earth, that of preaching the doctrine of eternal life. We could write enthusiastically upon the enthusiasm of zeal which should animate such men, not outwardly manifested to be seen of men, but silent, concentrated, active, enduring, patient, like the "inner Ætna of deep thought," which Filicaja, Italy's best sacred poet, describes as reigning in him. Poor human nature! think of her turning amidst this to hides, and horns, gallnuts and assa-fœtida!!

This subject, if pursued would lead us very far indeed. We venture this one article upon it solely with the intent to do good and we trust the end may be answered. We expect to be soundly cudgelled with words for saying even so much.—Calcutta Star, Augt. 3.

PANDEMONIUM.

"To show vice her own feature."

What a lamentable thing it is that when men—clergymen, in particular, sit down to write, they do not adhere to truth, and how painful it is to be compelled to question the veracity of persons whose education and standing in society ought to place them above even the suspicion of uttering what is false. Mr. Stratford Stratford's father (the Rev. Hugh Hammer Morgan) is, as we have before stated, a clergyman of the Church of England, and holds an office "not to be named" in Hereford Cathedral—id est, he is one of the great guns, vulgarly called canons, of that edifice. This individual published a letter in the Times of the 27th May, exculpatory of his son, and, by strong inference, vindicating his purposed cowardly and murderous attack on the proprietor of this journal. Mr. Morgan calls the assassin-like outrage on Mr. Chisholm a "melancholy mistake," inferentially arguing that if we had been murderously assaulted, it would have been "no mistake," and what we had a right to expect, for presuming to advise his son—for daring to caution him against play, and warn him of the danger of cards and dice, and the thousand ills of a gamester's life. O, no, we repeat, it would have been held by the Reverend Hugh Morgan no mistake, and perfectly justifiable if we had been black-thorned out of existence by his hair-brained son, and his brace of cowardly confederates! So much for the peace-preserving and Christian feeling of this meek and pious clergyman, one, we say, holding an office "not to be named," in the Cathedral at Hereford.

As a proof of the veracity of this son of Mother Church, who commences his letter of violence by asking permission to "insert a few facts," he states that we have designated his son "a gambler in the strict sense of the word." We appeal to our readers and the public whether we have, in any article that we have penned referring to the imprudences of young Stratford, called him a "gambler." We have never done so; our term was gamester, and there is a mighty difference between the two words, as the reverend gentleman must know; but perhaps a little perversion of truth in this particular, as well as others, suited his purpose as assisting in the task of exculpation that he had undertaken, and which had much better have been left alone.

Mr. Morgan farther says that we attempted to insinuate that his son "sought play for excitement or for gain." Does the reverend gentleman imagine that the public will believe, even on his representation of the matter that when his son sat down to play he sat down not for "gain"—in fact, to lose: If Mr. Morgan can persuade the world to believe this, he is a better logician than we take him to be, and "knows all qualities" with a more "learned spirit of human dealings" than we give him credit for possessing. The reverend gentleman further goes on to state that we have asserted that his son (in reference to his play-table transactions) is "one for whom there can be no sympathy, and for whom there should be no defence." We have simply to rebut this by an unqualified contradiction—in short, by stating that we have "asserted" no such thing. Mr. Morgan says his son "has never gambled (gamed, he means, we presume), except on the two or three occasions on which he has so severely suffered." Have we said he has? Is it not his "once folly thrice told" that we have inadvertently upon? Did we not say how excusable it might be for a young man to be once caught in a gaming-table trap, but how inexcusable it was to be a third time caught in the same snare? How unfortunate it is when clergymen sit down to write that they should disregard truth and "pelter in a double sense!" Not all the logic of all the reverend Churchmen in England can persuade the world that a young man with his intellects about him, by again and again falling into the same snare, is worthy of much pity, and certainly very little sympathy.

The Reverend gentleman brings scripture to his aid in the defence of his son, and pleads for "the confidence and unsuspicion of a too generous nature," by roundly stating that in "emerging from College life into the world he has fallen among thieves." Hear you this, Messrs. Page and Bernard (the young gentleman's friends who won a large sum of money of him in last August) Hear ye this, Messrs. Charles Coghlan and John Mynde Cooke, for we presume you are the "thieves," the "gang of scoundrels and sharpers," meant by the reverend gentleman, and among whom the "unsuspicious" and "generous natured" Mr. Stratford Stratford has "fallen!"

The Reverend gentleman further goes on to speak of his son's "just liabilities," and of "the large sum out of which he had been swindled." What just liabilities can an honest man have with "thieves," "scoundrels, and sharpers?"

The reverend gentleman next says that his son was "attacked in honour and reputation by the organ of the very persons who had preyed upon him; that, with a wounded and honourable spirit, he had recourse to those means which have, owing to a most singular mistake, unfortunately led to the injury of a worthy and unoffending gentleman." If Mr. Morgan means to insinuate that this Journal is the organ of the parties who won bills (not money) of his son, we have no hesitation in characterising it as one of the most deliberate falsehoods ever uttered by man. This paper, which has for years been the scourge of play-table vice—of gamesters and gamblers of all grades, is now taxed with being the "organ" of "thieves," "scoundrels and sharpers!" It is fortunate that the assertion springs from the quarter it does, because enough has been said to show how little value is placed on truth by the Reverend writer of the letter in the Times.

The Reverend gentleman goes on next to state that "Mr. Chisholm, with the feelings of a Christian and a gentleman, has intimated, through his friends, his unwillingness to press the charge against one who never could have intended to injure him." We wonder had Mr. Edward Drummond, who was murdered by the assassin M'Naughten, stated in his lifetime his unwillingness to press the charge against "one who never could have intended to injure him," whether the public would have been satisfied, and whether Mr. M'Naughten was to be let free to murder his intended victim. We should rather think not. It is a public matter, and if Mr. Chisholm has so little regard for public safety as to be worked upon to forego the prosecution of his "too generous natured" assailant, Mr. Chisholm will forget his position as "a Christian and a gentleman," will be guilty of a great public wrong, and will incur the censure of every honourable mind. But let Mr. Chisholm do this—let the magistrate countenance such a proceeding, and we plainly tell them what we shall do—indict Mr. Stratford and his confederates (Richards and Underwood) for conspiring together to assault us with an intent to do us some bodily harm—in short, to murder us. This will be our course of proceeding, and the reverend writer of the letter in the Times must take care that he is not made a party to what appears to meet with his encouragement and support.

We now come to the concluding portion of the Reverend gentleman's letter:—

"I will conclude with requesting you to allow me to contradict one statement which appeared in your paper. The weapon with which this dreadful mistake was committed, is stated to have been three inches in circumference. It was not more than half that size. This is not meant for a palliation, as far as Mr. Chisholm is concerned; but, certainly, it gives a wrong impression as to the transaction in general." We need only reply to the above by extracting from the Times the reporter's letter as to the size of the stick which Stratford used to inflict the "murderous outrage" on Mr. Chisholm.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir—In my report of the murderous outrage by Mr. Hugh Stratford Straford, I stated that the stick with which the wound upon the head of Mr. Chisholm was inflicted was "about three inches in circumference." Mr. Hugh Hanmer Morgan denies in a letter which appears in Saturday's Times, the correctness of my statement with regard to the size of the weapon alluded to, and has endeavoured to impress the public generally with an idea that it was no larger than a common penny cane. I have measured that portion of the stick which is now in the possession of police constable Griffiths, of the D. division, and find that the circumference of one end thereof is two inches and three-eighths, so that after all my "guess" was not very wide of the mark. I should not have troubled you with this but for the circumstances of Mr. Morgan having been so extremely desirous of fixing upon me a charge of gross exaggeration.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant,
YOUR REPORTER AT MARYLEBONE POLICE COURT.

May 28.

A more unfortunate result for the veracity of the Rev. Hugh Hanmer Morgan's remarks in defence of his son, could not have appeared. Morgan has unfortunately injured his son's cause by recourse to what, upon the face of it, is untrue. This is to be lamented, for enough is being said among all classes to prejudice mankind against the ministers of religion, without having to record so gross an instance of exaggeration as that which appears in almost every sentence of the letter of Mr. Morgan.—Satirist, June 4.

RECENT CHARGES.

This, of course, made the crown the depository and administrator of all power, both spiritual and temporal. But still more explicitly to meet every difficulty in limine, and to crush every possible objection which might eventually arise on the score of the commonly-received opinion, that bishops—that is, they who had hitherto been considered as the spiritual governors of the Church—required both the sacrament of ordination, to confer upon them a spiritual character—distinguishing them, and separating them thereby, from the rest of men—as well as jurisdiction from some competent and recognized authority, before they could duly enter upon their episcopal functions, Cranmer,—to satisfy by anticipation all scruples on these points, thus laid down the law, clearly foreseeing it would soon become necessary for the times, "In the admission, says he, of many of these officers (such as bishops, parsons, vicars, &c.) he divers comely ceremonies and solemnities used, which be not of necessity, but only for a good order and seemly fashion; for if such officers and ministrations were committed without such solemnity, they were nevertheless truly committed: and there is no more promise of God, that grace is given in the committing of the ecclesiastical office, than it is in the committing of the civil office." But as if this were not sufficient to meet the whole case, he goes on to say,—“A bishop may make a priest by the Scripture, and so may princes and governors also, and that by the authority of God committed to them, and the people also by their election.” And still further, to prevent any possibility of mistake as to his meaning, he thus proceeds with his commentary: “In the New Testament, he that is appointed to be a bishop, or a priest, needeth no consecration by the Scripture, for election or appointing thereto is sufficient.”

Being furthermore asked whether Christian princes could, without the intervention of ecclesiastics, make and constitute priests or no? He boldly avers the affirmative. And whether all the bishops and priests of a region being dead, the king of that region should make bishops and priests to supply the same? He replies,—“It is not forbidden by God's law.”

Is it surprising, then, that this doctrine prepared the ground for what followed, and that in a few short years, when these very necessities arose, we find the hireling unable to enter by the door, climbing up another way, and sinking the spiritual in the temporal power, for the attainment of his object?*

No wonder that Burnet should observe, that “Cranmer had some singular opinions about ecclesiastical functions and offices which he seemed to make wholly dependent on the magistrate, as much as the civil were:”† and no wonder that doubts should have been raised upon the validity of the ordinations of men who had been tutored in such a school‡

Receiving their mission, as they condescended to do, from the secular power, it was not surprising that they should be negligent on other essential points, as we know to have been the case at the ordination of Sampson, when Cranmer dispensed

* See these opinions of Cranmer in Burnet, Record No. xxi, vol. ii. Ed. 1840.

† Vol. i. p. 270.

‡ Whether Cranmer, in this, as well as in other points, wavered, changed, and conformed his opinion to suit circumstances, is but little or nothing to the argument as it is here used: for it is clear that such opinions not only prevailed extensively abroad, but in England also. Burnet, referring again to the matter, observes, “In Cranmer's paper some singular opinions of his about the nature of Ecclesiastical offices will be found; but as they are delivered by him with all possible modesty, so they were not established as the doctrine of the Church, but laid aside as particular conceits of his own. And it seems, that afterwards he changed his opinion; for he subscribed the book that was soon after set out, which is directly contrary to those opinions set down in these papers,”—p. 447, vol. i. 1540.

with the rites and ceremonies, to which he, with his puritanical notions, even then objected.

No sooner had Parker, the first of the intruders, been elected by Queen Elizabeth to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury,—that same see where these doctrines had been so fondly cherished,—than we find him, in a most solemn and deliberate deed, making his public profession of faith in entire conformity with these principles, acknowledging and confessing to have and to hold the archbishopric of Canterbury, and the possession of the same entirely, as well as the SPIRITUALITIES as Temporalities thereof,—only of her majesty and crown royal of these her realms.* But there was a remnant of the old orthodox principles, and a remembrance of ancient usage, still left in the country.

“Immediately after Archbishop Parker and his fellow Protestant bishops had assumed their titles, their consecration was called in question by the Catholic clergy. ‘Objections,’ says the Rev. D. Neal, ‘being frequently thrown in the way of the new bishops by the papists, made them uneasy; they began to doubt of the validity of their consecrations, or at least of their legal title to their bishoprics. The affair was at length brought before Parliament, and to silence all future clamours, Parker’s consecration, and those of his brethren, were confirmed by the two Houses, about seven years after they had filled their chairs’†

“Now what was the natural course to be pursued under such accusations as were made against the new bishops? When told publicly, frequently, and by numerous class of learned men, that their consecration was ‘counterfeit’ and invalid, would not common-sense prompt them, if they really believed episcopal ordination and apostolical succession necessary for the valid exercise of their episcopal functions,—would not common-sense prompt them to publish the register of their consecration,—the form by which they were consecrated,—and the bishops by whom they were consecrated? But if the form of their consecration was called in question; if the persons who imposed hands upon them, were declared, upon good grounds to be no bishops; what would prudent men, with the sentiments we have just mentioned, have done in this case? Why, if it had been possible, they would have called in some lawfully and validly consecrated bishops, and they would have received from them, either absolutely or conditionally, as circumstances required, a consecration which would have allayed all doubts, and silenced the objections of their opponents.

“But not one of these prudent steps was taken. Hence we may conjecture that Parker and his colleagues were of the same opinion with Cranmer and Barlow, and the foreign divines. With them the appointment of their prince was sufficient. They make, therefore, an appeal to the queen, their mistress and their head, and to the parliament, their lawgiver, to protect them from further insult; to throw the mantle of this high authority over their shoulders, and to declare to the world that they were legally bishops of the new Church established by law in this country. The act drawn up for the purpose, and passed 1566, shall speak for itself. The preamble sets forth:

“‘Forasmuch as divers questions, by overmuch boldness of speech and talk amongst many of the common sort of people, being unlearned, hath lately grown upon the making and consecrating of archbishops and bishops within this realm,—whether the same were and be duly and orderly done, according to the law or not, &c. Therefore, for the avoiding of such slanderous speech....it is thought convenient hereby partly to touch such authorities as doth allow and approve the making and consecrating of the same archbishops and bishops to be duly and orderly done, according to the laws of this realm

“‘First, it is very well known to all degrees of this realm, that the late king, Henry VIII, as well as all the clergy then of this realm,’ [this is untrue] “in their several convocations, as also by all the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons assembled in divers of his parliaments, was justly and rightfully acknowledged to have the supreme power, jurisdiction, &c. over all the state ecclesiastical of the realm, and the same power, jurisdiction, and authority, did use accordingly. And that the late King Edward VI did lawfully succeed the late King Henry VIII in his imperial crown, and did justly possess and enjoy all the same power, jurisdiction, and authority before mentioned. And that also King Edward VI, by authority of parliament, caused a godly and virtuous book, entitled The book of Common Prayer and administration of Sacraments, &c. to be made and set forth—but did also add to the same book, a very good and godly order of the manner and form how archbishops, bishops, priests, &c. should from time to time be consecrated, made, and ordered....[Moreover] at the parliament holden at Westminster in the first years of the reign of our sovereign lady, the queen’s majesty that now is, by one other act and statute there made, all such jurisdictions, &c. spiritual and ecclesiastical, as by any spiritual or ecclesiastical power or authority hath heretofore been, or may lawfully be used over the ecclesiastical state of this realm, and the order, reformation, and correction of the same, is fully and absolutely, by the authority of the same parliament, united....to the imperial crown of this realm. And by the same act, there is also given to the queen’s highness, her heirs and successors, full power and authority by letters patent, from time to time, to assign, name, and authorise such person or persons as she or they may think meet and convenient, to exercise, use, occupy, and execute, under her highness, all manner of jurisdictions, &c. in any wise touching or concerning any spiritual or ecclesiastical power or jurisdiction within this realm; thereupon, our said sovereign lady, being most justly and lawfully invested in the imperial crown of this realm, hath, by her supreme authority, at divers times, since the beginning of her majesty’s reign, caused divers grave and well-learned men to be duly elected, made, and consecrated archbishops and bishops, &c. according to such order and form, and with such ceremonies in and about their consecrations, as were allowed by the said acts. And further, for the avoiding all ambiguities, and questions that might be objected against the lawful confirmations, investing, and consecrations of the said archbishops, &c. hath not only used such words and sentences as were accustomed to be used by Henry VIII and Edward VI but also hath used and put in her majesty's said letters patent, divers other general words and sentences, whereby her highness, by her supreme power and authority, hath dispensed with all causes or doubts of any imperfection or disability, that can or may, in any ways be objected against the same: [from which] it may be very evident.....that no cause of scruple, ambiguity, or doubt, can or may justly be objected against the said elections, confirmations, consecrations, &c. Thus far the preamble. Then it is enacted: 'That all consecrations, confirmations, &c. made by virtue of the queen's letters patent or commission since the beginning of her reign, shall be judged good and perfect, to all respects and purposes. And that all persons that have been, or that shall be, consecrated archbishops and bishops, &c. pursuant to the form or ordinal [of Edward VI] are declared and enacted to be rightly consecrated and ordained, any statute, law, canon, or other thing to the contrary notwithstanding.*'

"This is the sole authority upon which the ordination of the ministers of the Church of England rests. The parliament gave Henry VIII. supreme spiritual jurisdiction in his own dominions, with the power to elect bishops, to command them to be consecrated, to appoint what number of bishops should be necessary to consecrate them, to institute the form and ceremony of their consecration, and to allow them, according to his good pleasure, to exercise their episcopal functions. Edward VI. inherited, with his father's crown, the same privileges. Elizabeth had consigned to her by parliament whatever spiritual power and authority were exercised and claimed by her father and brother. When in possession of this power, she 'caused divers grave and well-learned men to be duly elected, made, and consecrated archbishops, bishops, &c., according to the laws of Henry VIII. and Edward VI.; and she dispensed with all causes, or doubts of imperfection, or disability in the same.

"They were therefore as good bishops as the queen and parliament could possibly make them. They were made by law,—bishops of a Church established by law. In this there was consistency. For they who looked up to the queen as their head, and to the parliament as their lawgiver, would necessarily be satisfied when both the queen and the parliament declared them bishops duly elected, duly made, duly authorised. After this memorable act of parliament, Archbishop Parker and his associates set at defiance all the ambiguities, objections, and cavils of the papists. The queen had elected them,—had commanded certain persons to consecrate them,—had appointed the form of their consecration,—had dispensed with every 'imperfection and disability,'—and had given them jurisdiction 'to preach the word of God, and to administer the sacraments: she had done all these things with the solemn sanction of parliament; they were satisfied,—completely satisfied; and they justly submitted to be taunted with the appellation of either the Queen's Bishops, or Parliament Bishops†"

All this (Tertullian would have continued) satisfies me that the chain is broken, that the Anglican Church no longer derives from the apostles, but that she has set herself up as an intruder and a stranger in the land, upon principles at utter variance with those which governed the ancient bishops and rulers of the Church, and that she thereby forfeits all claim to apostolical succession or jurisdiction. And we must confess, on our part, that Tertullian would have reasoned rightly and consistently, and we are convinced that he would have been as forward as we are, in demurring to that strange and illogical "inference" of the Lord Bishop of London, "that in this country, the clergy of the National Church, and they alone, are entitled to the respect and obedience of the people, as their lawful guides and governors in spiritual things: that they alone are DULY COMMISSIONED to preach the Word of God, and to minister his holy sacraments." (To be continued)

ARCHES' COURT, SATURDAY, JUNE 3.

Morse against Morse.

This was a suit for a divorce on the grounds of cruelty and adultery, by Mrs. Ann Emma Morse, against the Rev. Francis Morse, rector of Baxterley, in the county of Warwick. The parties were married in 1833, and the cruelty was alleged to have commenced almost immediately after the marriage. The adultery was charged with a servant named Ann Lewis, a woman named Charlotte Ann Sophia Damen, and another named Sarah Barnett.

Dr. Haggard and Dr. Harding on a former court-day, contended that the case had been fully proved, and that Mrs. Morse was entitled to a sentence on both grounds.

Dr. Bayford, for the husband, this day endeavoured to show that the proof was insufficient both as to the identity of the party and as to the facts charged in the libel; that, although the husband's conduct could not be defended, and his language had been violent, he was not proved to be guilty of legal cruelty or of adultery.

Sir H. Jenner put several times interposed, and suggested to Dr. Bayford whether he thought he benefited his client by provoking a detailed examination of the facts of the case. In delivering his sentence, the learned judge observed, that he should have been very unwilling to be forced to be dragged through all the details of the case, for the sake of the profession to which the defendant belonged. He was satisfied with the proof of the identity; he thought there was sufficient proof of the adultery, and that there was abundant proof of the cruelty. There might have been quarrels and irritation on the part of his wife; but what had the conduct of Mr. Morse been, particularly in regard to the young woman named Damen? How could the Court attribute any blame to Mrs. Morse for remonstrating at her husband's conduct towards these women? Then his language and behaviour to his wife, calling her "Jezebel" and "old Devil," and throwing the tongs at her; how could that be justified? He (the learned judge) had no doubt that Mrs. Morse had fully proved the contents of her libel, both as to the cruelty and the adultery. He was unwilling to go through the facts of the case, considering the station and profession of the party. The divorce pronounced for.—Times, June 5.

HIBERNIAN SOCIETY.—A report has just appeared of the eleventh anniversary meeting of the auxiliary of the London Society for establishing Schools and Circulating the (Protestant) Scriptures in Ireland, held in Blackburn on the 20th ult., and published in the Blackburn Standard, March 22nd. The speeches of the orators and the report of the Society contain the most barefaced statements.—The Rev. J. Bardley stated that no less than 400 persons who had been Roman Catholics, and as such employed as teachers, had been led to forsake the darkness of Popery. Now this gentleman is publicly challenged to give us the names and places of these Catholic teachers who have thus become apostates.—The Rev. F. Law said, “that even upon the Church of Rome itself Protestant light (what light is that?) was beginning to have an effect, for it was now desirous to conceal some of its enormities and absurdities. He had heard of one priest who denied that the Church held the doctrine of Transubstantiation, and he knew also of an instance in which another of the Church’s most stringent rules was on the point of revolution in order to make a convert!—the Rev. J. Birchall, instead of thinking with the other Protestant speakers, that Popery was nearly extinct, complained that “English Protestants had great reason to take shame to themselves for having so long neglected to cultivate that spiritual wilderness. The English Reformation failed to emancipate it. Ireland had no Reformers—the principles of Protestantism had not been disseminated there.” Yet, strange enough, this Protestant prophet concluded by saying, that “he thought he discovered in the work going on that the hour of the Church of Rome was nigh at hand!” Forsooth, the Irish Protestant Church is so refreshed after her long sleep, so eased by the annihilation of her ten bishoprics, that she is only the more strong and animating for the fight!—The Rev. E. J. Speck, one of the secretaries, however, beat all the rest in the brazen impudence of his assertions. Take the following as a sample of one of the grossest Protestant untruths ever uttered: “It had already been noticed that its priests were not to be trusted; that they adapted themselves to circumstances the better to deceive the people; and he mentioned the fact that he had at one time seen a Bible printed at Galway, under the authority of the Church of Rome, in the notes to which the Protestants were called rogues and thieves and scornful miscreants; but it was found that such violence defeated its own object, and the Bible was withdrawn from circulation, and a few weeks ago he had seen in the same town of Galway a new Bible, which apparently was to be sold for 3s.; but that was merely a deception; for let a poor peasant go into the shop where it was professed to be on sale, and he would find he could not obtain it without a licence from the priest. Thus it was that Popery professed to give the people the Bible, whilst in reality it withheld it.” Now, here are two most barefaced falsehoods. First, that there was a Bible printed at Galway, &c. I have not only my own practical knowledge, but the positive statement of one of the most influential Clergymen in the diocese of Galway, that no Bible of the kind was ever printed there. Secondly, that, although a Catholic Bible is offered at 3s., no Catholic can obtain it without a licence from the priest—the real truth being that Catholic booksellers are daily and hourly selling these Bibles, and thousands of Catholics purchasing them without requiring any such licence!—Correspondent — Tablet.

CANADA.—“Some five or six Bibles, as we” (the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph) have heard, were burned in Canada by the advice it is said of a Canadian priest. Others think it took place in New York somewhere near the boundary line. Wherever it occurred it was certainly wrong, but for this reason only—that it offended the prejudices of the Protestant community. No doubt Catholics had been previously insulted by having those spurious and mutilated editions of the Scriptures forced on their families, but still they should not have committed them publicly to the flames. Those impudent people who frequent Catholic houses, to insult the inmates by offering them their false copies of the Word of God, ought to be hereafter warned by parents and guardians of youth to desist, and if they persevere, then let their books and tracts be thrown after them into the streets.

“One fact, in connexion with this subject, ought not to be omitted. An edition of the Catholic Scriptures was published in the Spanish language by the American Bible Society, for distribution in Spain and South America. The society regretted shortly after, this concession to Catholic principles, and hence the whole stereotyped version was committed to the flames by order of the Society. See the last annual report of the Bible Society. The Protestants set us the example, and destroyed what they believed to be an incorrect copy of the Word of God; the Canadian Clergyman followed the example, and destroyed what Catholics believe to be a false and corrupted version of the Divine Word.”

The Russian Government perseveres in its system of propagating the Greek schismatic religion in the kingdom of Poland. Still it appears that the Cabinet of St. Petersburg feels the necessity of being better with the See of Rome. In fact, M. de Boutenieff is charged with the task of opening negotiations with the Holy See for the purpose of establishing more amicable relations between both states. M. de Boutenieff is to leave Constantinople for Rome as soon as M. Titoff, at present on leave, returns to his post.—Augsburg Gazette.

THE KIRK BEGGARS.—The clerical mendicants, who are asking alms for the “Free Church,” mark the doors of houses with chalk in the course of their night-walks. The doors of Catholics and Episcopalians, whom in their ignorance they confound, are marked with two crosses and a curve: the doors of the faithful are “passed over”—the blasphemous hypocrites!—Scotch paper.

REMARKABLE DEATH.—On Sunday last, as the “Ordinance of the Lord’s Supper” was being dispensed in the United Secession Church, Old Meldrum, Mr. Alexander Webster, one of the elders, who had just brought into the church a portion of the “sacramental elements,” suddenly expired.—Register.

[VOL. V.]

PROTESTANTISM;

ITS INCONSISTENCIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

But God is Faithful, for our preaching, which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT.

2 Ep. Cor. Cap. 1. 18.

Throughout his Epistles, as well as in the Acts of the Apostles, we are repeatedly admonished by St. Paul, of the indispensable importance of religious Unity. At one time, he tells us, that there is one Body, one Spirit, one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism, and he warns us to be careful to keep the Unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. At another, he instructs us, that a primary end of the Institution of the Pastoral office is, that we may all meet in the Unity of faith, and be no longer tossed about by every wind of doctrine. In effect, reason itself clearly points out Unity, as an essential characteristic of truth, and the want of it, followed as that defect must be by discord and strife, as a certain indication of error.

It is impossible to indulge in this train of reflection, and not advert to the extraordinary spectacle, which Protestantism, under all its multifarious names, presents at this moment, both in this country and throughout the British Empire. It is not,—(for what we are about to mention has been the evil genius of Protestantism from its very cradle),—it is not, that from that unhappy parent, the Reformation, Lutherans, Calvinists, English Protestants, together with other sects too numerous to recount, derive their origin. Great as this evil may be, fatal as it must prove to the welfare of Christianity, yet it is not the misfortune, over which we now propose to lament. Another; one, in some respects, still more injurious to the interests of religion, claims our attention. We allude more particularly, to the dreadful dissensions by which English and Scottish Protestantism is at present distracted.

From the early history of the Reformation, it is certain, that the religious dissensions, which that melancholy event occasioned, greatly contributed to the growth and dissemination of infidelity, under the appellation of Deism, Socinianism and Arianism, or Unitarianism, as the modern disbelievers of the Divinity of Christ would designate their impiety. We have only to reflect on the moral constitution of man, in order to perceive, that it was most natural that the Reformation should have promoted so deplorable an evil. For the Reformation labored to uproot all the grand principles on which the reverence of the Christian Universe for the Gospel had hitherto reposed. It taught its followers, to regard all the doctrines which they had previously regarded with profound veneration, as so many degrading idolatrous superstitions. It encouraged its adherents to set at defiance the solemn doctrinal decisions of the Catholic Church, which, up to the period of their revolt, they and their ancestors for centuries venerated, as divinely sanctioned and unerring. Every one knows the bad effects, which even a few instances of fraud and breach of worldly faith committed by those in whom great trust was reposed, has ordinarily on the victims of such misplaced confidence. By such perfidy, the mind is soured, an unfavorable opinion of mankind in general is conceived, suspicion and distrust are substituted for unsuspecting simplicity, and, in a word, all the finer and nobler feelings of the human breast are blunted and deteriorated.

Now if these lamentable results ensue, when man suffers only from the occurrence of a few isolated instances of broken faith and integrity, what, we ask, must be the direful effect produced on his moral constitution, when he adopts, in opposition to all the sacred and revered maxims of his previous life, the terrible conviction, that, even in the awful concerns of religion, and within the hallowed precincts of the sanctuary, Imposture and Superstition have been worshipped as Divinities, and that the worship he has hitherto cherished, with more than filial devotion, is nothing more, in reality, than the hoary accumulation of incrustated error. Let any man, placed in the circumstances we have described, once admit such a conclusion, and how, we ask, will it be possible, afterwards, to impart to his mind such security or certainty of religious truth, as will hold firm the anchor of his faith, and prevent it from being carried about by the unsteadiness of caprice or the violence of passion? If he has been deceived in believing those doctrines, the truth of which was attested, not only by the millions which belong to the Catholic Communion, but also by the numerous Schismatical Churches of the East, all which retain the dogmas of the Mass, of the seven Sacraments &c. &c. how shall he securely repose his faith on the unsteady, vacillating, and often conflicting authority, which alone, every denomination of Protestantism supplies, in all that relates to the peculiar tenets of the reformation? It is evidently impossible, that, in such circumstances, an inquiring mind, which seeks to rest its belief on solid and consistent principles, can ever be at peace.

What then will be the result? The result, we must naturally look for, will be, either, as, alas! too often happens, that the mind already predisposed by primeval corruption and by acquired bad passions, will rush to the conclusion so favourable to licentiousness, that all revelation is an imposture; or, on the contrary, if, as through the Divine mercy it sometimes occurs, the enquirer be happily prevented, by the Grace of God, he will discover in the Catholic Church, the strength, the order, and the beauty which become the house of God, and the place where the glory of the Lord dwelleth. But compared with those, who, by occasion of Reformation or rebellion in religion, are hopelessly shipwrecked in faith, the number of the favored souls, of whom we have just spoken, will be ordinarily small.

About twenty-five years have now elapsed, since, in the Scottish Church in Ireland, an event occurred which may illustrate these observations. At the period referred to, the progress of Arianism, or, as it is now fashionably styled, Unitarianism, among several of the more distinguished of the Irish Presbyterian Clergy began to excite great alarm in the minds of those Presbyterians, who still professed their belief in the sacred dogma of the Trinity. For a time, the struggle was carried on as covertly as circumstances would allow, between the two parties, who abetted opposite opinions, on the important subject just mentioned. But the question was one of too portentous a nature, and it engaged the minds and hearts of too many, to allow the controversy upon it, either to slumber, or to be, as it were, silently carried on. The smouldering embers soon burst out into a terrific fire, and the Arian party, at first apparently of no numerical consequence, suddenly became strong enough, to dispute with their former brethren, the possession of several of the Churches, which had been originally built for Presbyterian worship. Alarmed at this abrupt and unexpected defection of so many of their late associates in religion from the belief of a doctrine, which, from their very infancy, they, in common with the present adherents of the Arian party, had been ever taught to submit to, with an unhesitating and reverential faith, several of them perceived, that, if in the short period of their own lives, so many of their former brethren had been led by the primary principle of Protestantism, to reject, as superstitious, a dogma, which these had previously held in profound veneration, it was impossible to say, to what extremes the same principle might not, afterwards, conduct others of their communion, who, encouraged by the late successful revolution, might desire to propagate some favorite religious novelty, in virtue of their own interpretation of the Sacred Volume. Under the influence of this judicious reflection, and strengthened by aid from above, many Presbyterians, at the period of which there is here question, were led to inquire into the grounds of the Catholic Church, in which alone, despite of early and strong prejudices, they saw asserted that sacred inflexibility, that stern resistance to innovation, and that unerring authority, without which they now felt, that the maintenance of religious unity was absolutely impossible. In this way, hundreds who, heretofore, were, in all human appearance, alienated for ever from the true faith, were, by divine Providence, conducted to the peace and repose which can be found only in the Catholic Church. What the exact number was of those converted on the occasion here referred to, we cannot now determine. But we can state on authority, that whilst in Belfast, the head quarters of Presbyterianism in Ireland, there was, about 30 or 40 years ago, only a Catholic congregation of 1000 or 1500 persons, the Catholic population of the town exceeds, at the present time, twenty-three thousand.

BOMBAY.

We learn with pleasure, from the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette, that Bishop Whelan, the zealous Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of that Mission, has already succeeded in establishing, under the care of one of the Clergymen by whom his Lordship was accompanied to India, a Seminary for English and Classical Education. We congratulate our Bombay Catholic Brethren on this auspicious event, and we wish every success to the new Institution. If during the last century exertions like those of Bishop Whelan had been made, the Catholic Community of India would stand in a far more respectable and influential position, than that which they now occupy. It is painful to think, that for so long a time, and whilst there were private resources in abundance to aid in the good work, not a single Catholic educational establishment was erected throughout India, until within the last six or seven years. We trust that the privation of the important benefit of education under which our Brethren labored here, will cause them to appreciate duly the blessings they now enjoy, and to show that they are resolved to profit by them.

GLORIOUS ATTESTATION IN FAVOR OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Letters have been just received, which announce, that in January, 1843, Bishop Castro at Pekin received intelligence, from Corea, that towards the close of the year 1839, Bishop Jinbert, the Rev. Messrs. Chastan and Mauban, together with seventy Christians were beheaded for the faith. In addition to this large number of glorious martyrs for Christ, one hundred and eighty other Christians were put to death by being strangled, perhaps, because these latter followers of the Saviour belonged to the humbler classes of their countrymen. We have to record, moreover, the death by fever or dysentery of four of the apostolic labourers of the Society of Jesus in the flourishing Mission of Madura. Thus does God give testimony to his Church, by the unceasing miracles of so many heroic souls, who seal their faith with their blood, either on the Martyr's scaffold, or in the often not less trying ordeal of the humble and untiring discharge of the labricious duties of the Catholic Priesthood, in a dangerous climate, and amidst all the privations of poverty. Oh! glorious Church of Christ, ever beautiful Spouse of the Lamb, how truly was it predicted of thee, that thy youth should be renewed like that of the Eagle. Nineteen centuries have now nearly rolled over thy head, and thou still retainest, together with the hoary honors of age, all the vigor and fecundity of youth; thou still beholdest thyself with thy Virgin Priesthood, the joyful Mother of young children, whom, like Mary, blessed among women, thou too, a Virgin, bringest forth in thousands for thy Virgin Spouse in every quarter of the universe. "O City of God, glorious things are said of Thee. Thy foundations are in the holy mountains. The Lord loveth thy gates above all the tabernacles of Jacob. Shall not Sion say This man and that man is born in her? And the highest himself hath founded her."

THE EDITOR OF THE STAR.

We have often felt that we owe some debt of gratitude to the Editor of the Calcutta and Eastern Star, for his noble and generous defence of the Catholics, in the many instances in which our Institutions and our Religion have been most wantonly attacked by the rabid and fanatical sects around us. We now express our feelings of gratitude, and beg of the Editor to accept them, not as coming from one who would servilely flatter him in order to secure his powerful assistance in the defence of our cause—(we hope we are able of our own-selves to do this), but as from one neighbour to another, who, unsolicited and unsought, has, from his own principle of justice, exposed the falsehoods and prejudices of the fanatical sects, who are never remiss in their abuses and misrepresentations of our Religion and of our Institutions.

It may be necessary to state that we had reason for some time past to look a little closely at the bearing of our brother, especially in regard to the principles on which his opinions were generally founded,—we hope we will be excused for our presumption;—but the STAR occasionally defended the Catholics when they were falsely attacked by the Anabaptists and others, and as such defence is but rarely, we are sorry to say, vouchsafed us by Protestants, however justifiable that would be,—we were apprehensive that some early prejudices might yet remain to mar the effects of his advocacy of truth against falsehood—of facts against the base productions and aspersions of unprincipled men.

But although a Protestant, he has proved himself to be above the prejudices of Protestants,—above the cant,—the truckling to the powerful and the great, which others have so repeatedly displayed, when our religion, and the institutions connected therewith, have been noticed: and we heartily congratulate him on the eminence his papers have attained as a proof that their principles are duly appreciated by the public.

Let us not be misunderstood in what we have above stated. Our object has never been nor ever shall be, so long as the BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD continues under our management, to court the assistance of a contemporary by flattery or sycophancy, whatever be the advantage we may sacrifice by our independence. In the defence of truth we are more than sufficiently strong, even in our weakness; and we need not therefore the aid of another, however powerful that aid may be. But when a contemporary comes forward voluntarily, —unsought and unsolicited,—actuated solely by his love of truth,—to expose the follies, the fanaticisms, and malice of those who are constantly at their dirty work of calumniating our Holy Religion, we—and not only we, but the whole body of Catholics,—are bound to express the gratitude justly due to him for his noble and generous conduct.

We shall, accordingly, always feel grateful for his voluntary defence of the Catholics, as we now do for the article extracted below from last Sunday's Eastern Star.

With regard to the "worthy Enthusiast," to whom our contemporary alludes, and to his speech subsequently printed and sold, we considered at the time, as we consider now, both the man and his work unworthy of the least attention from us. Almost every paragraph of the speech carries its own condemnation, and shows the man of tongue to be possessed of one, that can never inculcate truth when our Holy Religion or its institutions form the subject. We need only refer to the Protestants themselves who have any knowledge of the history of the Jesuits, to say how much this individual has risen in their estimation by his speech. It is throughout an exaggerated, and in some points quite imaginative, account of the order of Loyola, interspersed with a great many assertions, which go far to prove that the "worthy Enthusiast" is no respecter of the commandment "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour."

"The Calcutta Star noticing the report of the Calcutta Free School, and supporting the charity, yet calls attention to the accounts, in which the entry for cost of clothing, books and contingencies for the children is Rs. 15,000, while the Charity is debited with five thousand rupees more than that sum for the salaries of masters, medical men, office and native establishment! There cannot be a doubt that the system under which this can be is a faulty one. The sum for tuition is very much too large, with reference to the aggregate expenditure, and the teaching is very inferior to what may be obtained for a comparatively insignificant sum. It is said that the teachers at St. Xavier's College support themselves at the average personal charge of twenty-five rupees a month! and all as teachers very able men. There has been a good deal of nonsense written lately about the Jesuits, and one worthy enthusiast has been at the pains of making an awfully long speech about them and their villanies, and at the cost of printing it without rational hope of profit,—I mean not pecuniarily but morally, for, though people will be led by the nose, if that representative of dignity be delicately handled, they will not be dragged by it without kicking. I was reading the other day an account of a description in the "States" of Jersey as to the proposed establishment of a Jesuit's College there, for giving a sounder and more moral education than can be found in France, and an extract was made from the Jersey Chronicle which is really the only answer that such a pamphlet as I have alluded to deserves. It is as follows:—

"We are not apologists of the crimes of the Jesuits. Doubtless there have been bad men in their societies as there are in all others; but must a community suffer eternal odium for the sins of a few? Has the dean a right to denounce Dissenters as regicides, because the Puritans beheaded Charles I.?"

"But have these men no brilliant chapters in their long history."

"Their history is one of perpetual struggle against Heathenism and Atheism. Infidelity never encountered opponents so accomplished and indefatigable. The sharpest weapon with which the Protestant minister assails scepticism is borrowed from the Jesuit armoury. It was they who, undeterred by the terrors of a certain and torturing death, first planted the cross in the howling wilderness of China. They have fallen there, beneath the sword of persecution—by thousands upon thousands; but still they struggle on—not to be dismayed—not to be subdued—not to be overcome!"

"When the brutal soldiery of Spain deluged, in their lust of plunder, the American continent in blood, who but the Jesuits followed in their cursed footsteps, staunching the bleeding wounds, and alleviating the miseries inflicted upon that unhappy people! And what was their great reward? Let Mr. Southey, the Quarterly Reviewer, answer: 'They drew together in Paraguay one of the happiest, most moral, most equitably governed communities that ever existed, consisting of nearly three hundred thousand Indian converts.' And when the intrigues of the Choiseul with the Courts of the Peninsula induced the Spanish Government to banish them from the people they had reclaimed from barbarism to Christianity, and who but for them would have resisted the decree of the mother country to the death, how much property had these grasping men accumulated during this strong prosperous rule over those rich countries? Blush, slanderers, blush—barely two thousand pounds!"

"Persecuted in the infancy of their existence by the accursed Inquisition, they have never lost for an instant heart or hope. They ever stood between the nobles and the people; and hence the hatred borne towards them by the aristocratic-governed monarchies of Europe, who compelled Clement, with much reluctance, to banish them from Rome. They were expelled once from France by the influence of rival teachers; the second time, because they would not countenance the harlotry of Madame De Pompadour with the King. Had they been more complying, the intrigues of Choiseul, both in Paris and Madrid, would have been fruitless against them."

"Even the sceptic Lalande lamented their fall; and Voltaire admits they deserve well of their country. Whatever their state-crimes, whatever their offences against crowns and coronets, they were ever the steady friends of the toiling multitude. Never did the hand of trembling poverty knock in vain at the Jesuit's cell; never did the stricken child of calamity appeal to them for succour fruitlessly."

"Their fortunes have been abundantly varied. Martyrs in one kingdom, and honoured councillors in others. From some countries they were driven by imperial debauchees and royal harlots. Here an Egyptian plague has smitten them; they have been assailed and, for the moment, vanquished by insects and creeping things!"

"I am happy to be able to borrow such an answer, and it would have been difficult to have found a better: for those who have no opinion of their own, this is at any rate as good an authority as a Calcutta tract."

ON THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

The apparatus, by steam, which pushes a boat forwards, and the principle by which sky-rockets ascend in the air, may have been taken from the device, made use of by nature, for the motion of some species of aquatic insects.—The larva of the dragon fly, according to Adams, swims, by ejecting water from its tail.

In the gossamer spider, we find an elegant and curious instance of an animal being raised into the air, and traversing a region to which he is naturally a stranger, by means of his thread; although the animal has no wings wherewith to fly, the Creator hath laid for it a path in the atmosphere. The thread which it spins from its bowels, being specifically lighter than the air, sustains it, wafted by a levity not its own: the thread is an air balloon!

The armourer might have taken from the back of a wood-louse, or the tail of a lobster, a most perfect model of a coat of mail!

For a particular description and minute detail of the structure of insects, we refer to the ingenious and learned Archdeacon Paley's Natural Theology, Philosophical Transactions, &c. in our own, and to the works of Spallanzani, Fontana, and the different foreign academies in other languages.

As we ascend the scale of larger animals, our views become more distinct, and our knowledge more accurate, with respect to their characters and history. In an aggregate view of this branch of knowledge, much has been added in these later years.

With the variety of animal forms, with the exterior shape and figure of birds, beasts, and fishes, man is well acquainted. Common experience, without the aid of science, enables him to perceive, that difference of configuration is always varied, so as to correspond to the wants and habits of life of the animal.—He may not know, that the lungs in birds, communicate with their bones, and fill with air all their interior cavities, certainly for the purpose of proportioning the specific gravity of the bird, to the medium through which he is to fly; nor, that the swim in fishes, answers the same purpose—but in neither instance can he be ever mistaken; he sees the fish sink to the bottom, or rise to the surface at will. The clothing of feathers, so remarkable for smoothness, lightness, and warmth, together with his wings, point out the bird as an inhabitant of the air: by a single look, he distinguishes, from the shape and form of the bill, whether it be of the granivorous or carnivorous kind, the exterior form being ever true to the destination of the animal. Although he be not acquainted with the mechanical structure of the lion, the tiger, or the vulture, the strength of the muscles, the size of the limbs, the shape of the teeth, beak, and claws, and the sanguinary fierceness of the eye, convince him, that it is an animal of prey.—So of all other creatures, their organs are ever proportioned to the ends most useful to themselves.

The ears of the hare point backwards, and like trumpets are ever open to catch the distant sound: this, together with the length and lightness of his limbs, shew him to be an animal of flight, and endowed with these peculiarities of form, in order that he should escape his numerous pursuers; whilst the hound, intended by nature for the chase, infallible in scent, and having, in common with all beasts of pursuit, the concavity of his ears pointed forwards, traces out the hare through all his windings.

The animals that are destined to live in cold regions, are provided with a thick covering of fur, of which those of hot or temperate climates are destitute.

Amphibious quadrupeds, seals, otters, and aquatic fowls, are supplied with webbed-feet, which serve as paddles or oars, and are an admirable compensation for fins.

This wonderful relation of the several parts to their respective ends, so evident to common sense, is little, when compared to the light thrown on this subject by the study of natural history.

“In the single ounce of matter, which composes the body of a Canary bird, and which seems to be all employed, we have instruments for eating, for digesting, for nourishing, for breathing, for generation, for running, for flying, for seeing, for hearing, for smelling, each appropriate, each entirely different from all the rest.”

This cluster of contrivances in this small animal, as it is called by Archdeacon Paley, naturally leads to the following beautiful reflection of the same author:—

“If one train of thinking be more desirable than another, it is that which regards the phenomena of nature, with a constant reference to a supreme, intelligent Author. To have made this the ruling, the habitual sentiment of our minds, is to have laid the foundation of everything which is religious. The world, from thenceforth, becomes a temple, and life itself one act of adoration,—The change is no less than this, that, whereas formerly God was seldom in our thoughts, we can now scarcely look upon anything without perceiving its relation to Him.”

Why God, who in the infinity of his power, might have created beings capable of all functions, without mechanical organs, or material agency, had made choice of this system, on so universal a scale, is not for us to inquire.

He certainly might, had it been his will, have formed his creation, according to the system of the paradoxical but ingenious Berkeley; he might have formed a visionary world, consisting only of ideas and optical deception, or modelled it in some other way, so as that man, in his present state, could never have comprehended any part of it. But in the actual creation, his goodness is not less manifest than his power: by employing mechanical agency, he approximated his works to the faculties and capacity of that creature, who, by a connected chain of reasoning, was to have discovered, not only the existence of the Creator, but also that such knowledge could not consistently have been granted him for finite purposes only; that such a gift, such a dispensation, could not be for the transitory existence of this earth only, but must have been given to man, as a certain, as an infallible pledge of immortality.

But it is to the dissecting knife that we are particularly indebted for the information, so immediately apposite to our subject: it is the anatomist that has laid open to our view that amazing system of mechanical laws, so manifest in the structure of the animals that are subjected to his inquiry.

The bony frame, which supports and gives stability to the bodies of animals, when scientifically examined by the eye of the anatomist, appears the most perfect and wonderful machine that can be conceived: it is a masterpiece of design and skill; whether we consider the form and configuration of the whole collectively, or examine the several parts of which it is composed, our wonder is increased, and the more we are convinced of the wisdom, foresight and intelligence displayed in its structure. No part, however minute, can we discover, that is not adapted to some peculiar use, highly important to the functions of the animal, every point of the bony compages being perfectly correspondent to the shape, form, and insertion of the correlative muscle or tendon, to whose action it is subservient, or to the vessels to which it affords a safe passage and protection in the almost infinite variety of their distribution. In their disposition we see models of every species of machine; the ball and socket in the shoulder and hip-joints; the hinge in the knee and elbow:—"a limb shall play in its socket and swing upon its hinge, many hundred times in an hour, for sixty years together, without any sensible diminution of its agility—This is partly owing to that astonishing property of animal constitutions, of assimilating its nourishment, so that in every portion of the body, let it consist of what it may, substance is restored and waste repaired." (To be continued.)

LETTER No II.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Prejudice and other unchristian passions we must renounce, if we hope calmly and effectually to study not only the beginning, the growth, and the progress of the Protestant Religion, but that of the Roman Catholic Church. It is of all others a study the most important; our very salvation may rest upon it, for while we foolishly fancy we are in a fair way, we may be quite the reverse; we may in our self-security be breaking one or more of God's commandments—we may be bearing false witness against our neighbour—we may be robbing him of his moral character; a crime, I need hardly remark, of the deepest die, for culpable ignorance will not excuse us then in the sight of God, who gives us eyes to see—reason to understand, and grace, if we seek it, to judge rightly of our neighbour. But in order to accomplish this, we must bring the whole strength of our minds to bear upon the subject, and the greatest enemy we have to encounter are ourselves; we must master our own feelings first, and clear away everything which may obstruct the view, before we can hope to see the matter as we ought; we must act in this respect as we would did we wish to espy a distant object through a telescope; any dust that may have accumulated upon it's glasses, must be wiped off, before we can hope to view objects distinctly; so we must treat our different passions; this is indeed a point of such paramount importance, that I must in this letter more fully revert to this painful subject—painful because it sets forth some of the worst qualities of our nature, not only prejudice but calumny, misrepresentation, and falsehood itself—they stand as bars against the entrance of true Christianity; I shall here however dwell more particularly on the first, for the prejudices of Protestants in general against Catholics and their religion are carried to an extraordinary length; the other evil workings of the mind, I shall also perhaps touch upon. It is manifest you (speaking generally of Protestants) love dearly to read of Catholics, of their works and of their doctrines, when presented to you by your own writers, or your press would not be teeming as it does with tracts and works about us, for fuel for the fire is only required according to the consumption; you read, therefore, those works with avidity, and apparently with pleasure, but alas! few of you attempt to analyze the ingredients of which they are composed; they are dished in a savoury manner to your feelings, and you devour them greedily, without looking narrowly into the component parts; yes, if you are not the authors, you bare the promoters of them if you do not sow the seed, you are the receivers of it, and the soil which gives it nourishment and growth; charity might here dictate, that your giving shelter to such rank weeds proceeds from ignorance and the difficulty of ascertaining the truth, did not the fact of many of you being well informed in other matters, even familiar with the religion of Mahomet and the Brahmin, preclude even this, it is to be feared, culpable excuse; this may be the case with some; but evidently with most of you, your erroneous notions and entire ignorance of the Catholic religion, arise from another cause, viz., that you will only read the prejudiced side of the question; or if you do happen to look into Catholic authors, it is generally with a jaundiced eye, and with a pre-determination not to believe what does not correspond with the Protestant version, or with your own long and dearly cherished opinion, so that I fear, my dear friends, your prejudices, that is, your unwillingness to peruse, and to give credit to Catholic writers, more than the loathsome calumnies and falsehoods that are offered to you; for most generous and liberal minds turn with disgust from the latter when once detected, but prejudice is a weed that is often carefully nurtured, and it is of so insinuating a nature, that it frequently entwines itself round the mind even of the most noble, so that nothing can be seen, but, as it were, through a dark and almost impervious foliage. How then remove this enemy to truth, I mean here by "truth" what we state of our own religion to be our real belief; what is said of us by our opponents, gives me the greatest concern, and so much do I apprehend its withering effect, that were it possible, I would conceal the word Catholic or Roman Catholic until the conclusion of these letters, for it is more than probable, that some of you in reading the heading of the first letter, will cast it impatiently from you, whereas were it an Essay styled "an Earnest appeal to Protestants against Popery," how eagerly would it not be snatched up to learn its contents; there appears indeed at first something singular and unaccountable in the dislike and aversion with which Protestants receive or peruse Catholic Controversial works, and the marked satisfaction with which they read their own writers on the same subject. Now it not unfrequently happens, that Catholics peruse with greater zeal Protestant Books against them, than their own in defence, as if they liked to see themselves misrepresented and calumniated, this apparent inconsistency however of our natural feelings, only requires to be adverted to a little, in order to see clearly to the bottom of it; the inferences to be deduced therefrom, are, I conceive, self-evident; the Catholic fearlessly goes through the controversial field of his Protestant opponent, feeling he is shielded with the armour of proof—he examines his works, and the grounds of his defence and his means of attack; the more he scans it, the more invulnerable does he find his own position; and the more clearly does he see the weakness of his adversary; Protestants will seldom venture to make the like reconnoitre, though often invited and pressed by the other, as they fell a consciousness of weakness, and a sort of presentiment that they would be shaken in their faith; I draw this conclusion from some experience and observation; I have frequently found the greatest difficulty in persuading Protestants to peruse Catholic Books, and have had them often courteously declined, even though I have at times gone so far as to propose to read work for work; I once pointed out to a young Protestant Lady touched with Methodism, a quotation in Milner's End of Controversy taken from Fletcher of Madely, and because candid Fletcher does not give the most amiable account of Methodism in his own day, she threw the book from her, and said there was not a word of truth in the quotation, so much did prejudice, and loving, in this instance, darkness better than light, blind her mind; on another occasion I presented for perusal an interesting Catholic work, written it is said by a Catholic Lady, and a Convert, to a Protestant family, with whom I was on very intimate terms, but when I inquired of Mrs. — what she thought of it, the husband answered for her, and said "I really would not permit her to read it, for fear it might unsettle her mind;" and indeed he had some reason to apprehend this, for she afterwards told me with a candour which I could not but admire, that she believed her own Church to be in error on some points; these are two cases out of hundreds that daily happen; may not then the inference be reasonably drawn from these premises, from this fear of looking into Catholic books, from the reluctance to renounce prejudices—from the reckless determination not to believe the solemn affirmation of Catholics, that the ground of defence is exceedingly weak that stands in need of these auxiliaries; does it not show, that if these bulwarks of Protestantism were once removed, a certain monitor would then force them to leave it. It is not then without deep intent that Protestants are iniquitously told by their writers that "Catholics are not to be believed even upon their oath." It tells heavily upon Catholic writers. Oh! we may write, and we may preach, and act, but even facts are not believed; Is it not a calumny and a gross falsehood, to say that the Dukes of Norfolk, the Earls of Shrewsbury, the Lords Cliffords, Staffords, Peters, &c. &c. disregard the obligation of an oath, when it is recorded in the Annals of our country that all those Noblemen for ages back renounced their seats in the House of Lords, rather than become recreants to their Faith and prove themselves regardless to the sacredness of an oath! and yet, with this noble act recorded in our Parliamentary History, and with others registered in characters of blood, for numbers of our priests and people have bled upon the scaffold, in the reigns of Henry the Tyrant, Elizabeth, &c. sooner than breathe the foul air of perjury—sooner than take the oath of Supremacy; yet this falsehood is said and believed of Catholics. But before I entered into this digression, I was going to observe that Protestant controversial works will frequently be met with upon the table of reading Catholics, when the like works of Catholics will rarely be found with the same class of Protestants, I have then, my good friends well grounded reasons to apprehend your deep rooted prejudices; if however you will consider the matter dispassionately as you ought, you will come to the conclusion that it is your duty as professing Christians to read Catholic authors and not to condemn us, without first hearing the ground of our defence; in justice you ought to do this and in fairness you cannot deny it to us. This principle is one of the noblest features of the British Constitution, established, by the way, by Catholics, not to condemn the accused without giving him a hearing, or allowing him to draw out his own defence; If one of you had a cause of importance pending in one of your Courts of Justice; suppose a case of life and death; What would you say? what would you think? If your opponent's Counsel undertook to explain the merit of your case, and that your own Counsel were not to be heard, or if heard not believed, though facts could be adduced in your favor as evidence, not only circumstantial but positive proof; What, I say, would you think, if you were after such a farce and unjust trial pronounced guilty? Would you call it fair? Would you call it just? No, you would call it, as all good men would, diametrically the reverse, yet, my dear friends, this is the manner you act towards us Catholics. The works of our writers and divines are not read, and if read, not believed. We are accused, we are condemned, and upon whose evidence? Why, that of the Counsel of our opponents. Their explanation is taken, and we remain unheard; Is this honest, just, and Christian like? If, for instance, we solemnly declare that we do not worship Images, Saints, &c. your minister tells us, he lie that we do! and you suck in the poisonous lie, you believe it; it is one of the reeds upon which Protestantism leans; Prejudices then, whether it arises from education or from a darker root than this, is a weed which must be removed, as a gardener would weed his garden before he sows his seed, or a husbandman his fields, so we must, as it were, plough up our minds, and harrow up all obnoxious weeds and lay them aside! Were we assured by an authority next to Divine, that if we were to sow a field with gold dust, that we would afterwards reap a crop of massive gold, with what care would we not remove every stone and extract every thing which might prove injurious to its growth, yet, the value of this, valuable as it might be, would be nothing to our preparing our minds for the true faith of Christ. The investigation therefore as to which is the true and one faith is far more incumbent upon Protestants to make, than upon Catholics; the first have infinitely more potent reasons for doing so than the latter, and therefore they are less excusable than the other, if they neglect it. They are desired in their own books of instructions "first to examine the doctrine, and according to that to judge of the purity of the Church;" secondly, they are informed, and called upon to believe, that no Church whatever is exempted by God from the possibility of falling into error, or, in other words, that she may teach to her people false doctrines; she has, according to Protestant belief, no divine security against it; Protestants therefore are not bound by their religious principle to give belief to the doctrines of their respective Churches if opposed to their own individual opinion and judgment, at the same time that they are expressly taught that "out of the true Church of Christ there is no ordinary possibility of salvation," the Church of England holds the same opinion: she says, "those are to be held accursed who presume to say, that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth." If there is any meaning in language, these dogmas are of awful import to Protestants, they are told, that their Church may and can fall into error, that it is not obligatory upon them to remain in her belief if contrary to their own, yet, that there is no ordinary possibility of salvation out of the true Church of Christ: this is placing man upon a fearful precipice, making him the arbiter of his own salvation; the prospect is really startling to every reflecting Protestant, and were the principle believed and acted up to, it would produce madness and despair; but though the word of God condemns the two first propositions, that there is no Church which has any divine security against falling into error in faith, and that we are to be guided in religion by our own interpretation of Scripture and private judgment, the third condition is as sound and as binding as it was in the days of the Apostles, that "out of the true Church of Christ there is no ordinary possibility of salvation," or in the words of St. Paul. (Heb. XI. 6.) "Without faith it is impossible to please God." Bearing this last point in view, and at the same time not losing sight of the numerous faiths, or sects to be found in Protestants, it behoves you, my dear friends, to examine most minutely if you are in this true Church of Christ, and you must indeed be wonderfully cold and phlegmatic, if you are not at this moment roused to the state of your condition, when you may behold the most learned members and divines of the Church of England shaken in their belief in the truths of Protestantism, after the most mature study and consideration; they merely pause before they enter, like sheep at the threshold of the Fold; it concerns you then, most vitally to look to the path you are in; It will not save the blind from falling into the pit, simply because they imagine they are in the right road; so, rest not satisfied because you may consider yourself born in such and such a creed, because you may be a Lutheran, or a Presbyterian, or a Quaker, or a Baptist or a Church of Englandman, &c. &c. It is enough that you differ in religion to make you doubt, and that doubt to raise an apprehension that you may not be in that Fold "out of which there is no ordinary possibility of salvation;" It is not an uncommon thing to hear Protestants say, if the danger of their opposite beliefs is pointed out to them by Catholics, "Oh! we shall know all in the next world which are right, and which are wrong." There is, to say the least of it, a fearful deal of self-assurance, and impious presumption implied in thus seeming indifference respecting so awful and irremediable a step, a step which cannot be retraced; it is a terrible game at hazard; it is an iniquitous spiritual Lottery thus to stake the eternal damnation of the poor soul; the chance is indeed truly appalling; shall we then neglect to study the scheme when we know there is such a mighty prize, or such a ruinous blank in the wheel of our spiritual fate? oh! consummate folly to omit this, when we see so many around us who pretend to have within their religious scheme of salvation this one peerless prize, True Faith, for what would you say, my friends, of a person who was necessitated by an irrevocable decree to enter a boundless abyss wherein life or death was to be his fate according to the road he took, and that you were to say to him; having the strongest reason to believe he was in the wrong road, "Friend, you are going by the wrong path: it is true you see in many ways seemingly leading to the way of salvation, but there is only one true road, and if you do not take that, you are lost for ever?" what, I say, would you think of him were he to reply, "Friend, I thank you for your caution and warning, but I shall know which was the right road after I irrecoverably fall into the abyss leading to everlasting life or death?" Would you not believe him a fool or a madman, who would not pause or take the trouble to enquire beyond all doubt if there was any truth in the friendly warning; and your amazement would be increased ten-fold at such reckless folly, were you to hear him profess that he had no positive certainty he was in the right road and that though he had a guide, that guide distinctly told him he could afford him no absolute assurance that he himself might not be in error as to which was the right course, all he the guide could say, was, that he had a chart of the country leading to this wonderful and fearful abyss, but as to which was the true road he could not positively declare to him, he therefore begged to place in his (the traveller's) hand the chart, that he might use his own reason and judgement, and that if he differed from him in opinion he might go his own way, only he could certify this much to him, that out of this true track, which ever it might be, there was no ordinary possibility of salvation, that all others consequently led to certain death? Would you not, my friends, be petrified with astonishment and horror to behold this unhappy individual still presumptuously going on in the same way, though he saw numberless others by the use of this very chart going quite different roads, and heard them call out to him and to each other, "We have found out the true path to this haven of rest, you are egregiously mistaken, join us?" What! no pause, no doubt, no inquiry, no calling to God to guide and direct him through the numerous paths offered to his view? Would you not exclaim, "Is he sane or in his right senses? What blind infatuation. What fatality hurries heedlessly on to that bourne from which no traveller ever returns," Oh! my friends, I have not words to express, no ideas to portray the extent of my sorrow, when I contemplate this traveller, but a type of yourselves, this guide, but a figure of your Church, this fearful abyss, Eternity, this life, Heaven, and that, death—Hell! What a stake!! Believe me, my dear friends, it is truly harrowing to the soul of the Catholic to see his Protestant relatives, friends, and neighbours, thus awfully situated, He himself belongs to a Church which he firmly believes cannot fall into error, and which it is even admitted by learned Protestants was once the true Church of Christ; a Church which the Apostle St. Paul tells us "is the pillar and ground of Truth," and with which Christ promises to be "to the end of time," which he commands us to hear and obey under pain of his reckoning us as Heathens and Publicans, a command, alas! Protestants most clearly reject. The Catholic then believes, that this his Church cannot possibly fall into error, because God with other divine promises says, the Holy Ghost will guide her in all Truth; therefore he has nothing to doubt, nothing to fear, he believes her to be the guide and expounder of this otherwise incomprehensible chart, the Scripture; consequently he gives credit to the promises of God, and discards the assertions of man; he believes the Church of God cannot fall into error in Faith, the Protestants believe she can; This is then our relative position; Will you not then pause and make a minute survey of the path you are in, and of the opposite one pointed out to you by the Catholic, at least bear in mind the injunction of Christ to the Jewish Doctor, for can you "love God with thy whole heart, with thy whole soul, with thy whole mind, and with thy whole strength," and leave out, "and thy neighbour as thyself," for can you love your neighbour and calumniate him, grossly accuse him of crimes, which he does not commit; but repudiates with all the fervour of his soul. This you must unequivocally do as regards Catholics and their religion, for it matters not whether you do this in culpable ignorance or iniquitous knowledge, but that you do it, excuse the expression, the proofs are most damnable, the calumnies and falsehoods, are recorded in the written works of your Divines—they are hourly before your eyes, they are weekly preached from your pulpits; you solemnly assert that we worship images and pictures, offer divine adoration to the Saints, grant indulgences to commit sin, pay for confessions, believe that we can be saved by our own good works alone, &c. &c. When Heaven and Earth are witness that all this is the deepest calumny, the foulest falsehood; that this is no part of our religion; and yet you will with this dark fact before you; with this monstrous breach of charity upon your tongues and in your hearts, persuade yourselves that you practise the 26th verse of the X. Chapter, of St. Luke, and obey Christ's behest in the 28th text of the same Chapter, "This do and thou shalt live," Dowhat? falsely malign your neighbour! Every sound Christian would pronounce such a sentiment as the deepest blasphemy, but no less deep is the wound which such a melancholy fact inflicts upon spiritual charity, when you thus rob the Catholic of his Moral and Religious character. Pause then, I beseech you, and cease to advance heedlessly on the dark danger, which lurks in the gloomy path; you can only avoid it by a most scrupulous inquiry, but this must be done in the true spirit of Christianity; pride must be met by humility, ambition by poverty of spirit, anger by meekness, prejudice by candour, and justice. If you do this, fear not, but the God of Mercy will direct you whether you are or are not in the One, Holy Catholic Church.

I am, my dear Friends,
Your's faithfully,
C. A. C.

(Lines presented to Mrs. Amelia I—on the Feast of St. Anne, Mother of the B. V. M. 1843, on the occasion of the baptism of her infant Daughter.)

Hail, blessed Anne, sweet gracious name,
Mother of th' illustrious dame,
Mother by nature and by grace,
Ornament of the holy race,
Whence came down the blood of Jesus,
Shed in mercy to redeem us.

Bright model of a mother's care,
Receive a mother's ardent prayer,
Amelia's throbs—her ev'ry sigh
Present before the throne on high,
For the sweet babe she loves so well,—
Her little Angel, Isabella."

While beauty paints her modest face,
With years let her advance in grace,
Still imitating all she can,
As Mary copied mother Anne,
Until the Virgin, rose-full blown,
Shall breathe and live to God alone.

And her should God, as Mary choose,
Could mother's self the child refuse!—
The rose in trust by God is giv'n,
It grows on earth, but grows for heav'n.

* The name of the Infant.

We have much pleasure in giving insertion to these lines, as well on account of the tenderness and beauty of the sentiments they convey, as because we are assured that the compliment they bestow is well merited by the Infant and the amiable Mother to whom they were presented.—Ed.

RECENT CHARGES.

Having thus concisely put forth some few of the grounds upon which we venture to question this bold assertion,—a “pious and salutary doctrine,” no doubt, “and very necessary for these times,” as the articles would express it,—we will state but one single argument in defence of our counter-claim, drawn also from that well-furnished armoury of Tertullian, whose language and sentiments are as analogous to these times as they were to his; and for this simple reason, that truth is immutable, —by the same principles by which she was vindicated sixteen hundred years ago, she must be vindicated to-day;—she must be scrutinized by the same tests, and by those tests must she stand or fall. I have examined your pedigree, would he say to us, I see by the order and succession of your bishops, as long as you enjoyed them, that you descended in a right line from the apostles; I find you still in communion with all the apostolic Churches; you still look to Rome as to the spiritual mother and mistress of the world; you have neither diversity nor contrariety of doctrine among you, but are bound together in one uniform belief, under one sovereign and supreme authority. If this be your condition, he would add, humiliated as you may be in the eyes of the world, driven from your temporal possessions, felled and condemned, tormented and persecuted, (as it often becomes true members of a Church militant to be), for these are but additional tokens of the disciples of a crucified Master,—rely upon it, the title-deeds are yours; and though you have inherited, with your spiritual patrimony, but scorns and buffets in these latter times, to you does it belong to promulgate the law of your divine original, to you has the commission descended:—“All power is given to me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world” (St. Matt. xxviii.), AND TO NO OTHER. Your rights can no more be alienated than the law of God can be rescinded; your office may be usurped, but your inherent privileges remain unattainted. They are the schismatics, not you.

Such, doubtless, would have been the verdict of Tertullian, and such is ours. In reading the history of those times, could we doubt for an instant but that Pole was a true and legitimate successor of St. Augustine, and could we believe that Parker was anything but an intruder? When this latter held the last of the ancient hierarchy the venerable Tunstall, a prisoner of state in his palace of Lambeth, could any one question which was the martyr, and which the persecutor,—which was the true apostle of the ancient faith; he who, like St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, was in chains, or he who was ministering to the tyrannical will of an apostate sovereign, who now presumed to exercise the authority which in all former times had been confided to the supreme head of the Christian world, by right of its delegation to him to whom Christ said—“thou art a rock, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it;—feed my sheep, feed my lambs?” Doubtless then the right reverend prelate has done well to put it hypothetically. If the view he has taken be correct, then indeed his inference might be drawn; but it happens that this his view is not only incorrect, but is diametrically opposed to all ancient principle and to the well-established and universally-recognized usages of the primitive Church, as manifestly appears from those helps to a right understanding of these matters to which the right reverend prelate refers us,—“the sense in which they were understood by the disciples and immediate successors of the apostles, and which was derived from them to the early Church at large;” so that we may conclude with Tertullian, and with all the learned and saintly doctors of the Church, that they who are unable to prove their succession, are incapacitated from the exercise of their functions, and are lawfully cut off from the communion of the faithful, and from all the true and apostolic Churches.*

Having, then, by these few but convincing arguments (and it is a course of reasoning which we might pursue throughout a hundred ramifications, and through the entire history of the Christian Church) sufficiently shown, that the people of this country are not only absolved from their allegiance to pastors who have betrayed them, but are legally bound in obedience to others, who, few and mean as they are in the eyes of those whose spiritual precepts are, alas! so fatally governed by the worldly interests which surround them, are, nevertheless, the representatives of the ancient hierarchy of the country, still drawing their commission, (yet more directly and immediately, indeed, as if to put all cavil out of the question), from the very same power and authority which sent Augustine into England to propagate the religion of Rome amongst our Saxon ancestors;—we will now proceed in our defence against the gratuitous attacks of the right reverend prelate. “We hold,” says he, “in opposition to the Church of Rome, that the offering of a propitiatory sacrifice to God, is not one of the functions and privileges of the Christian ministry. Jesus Christ by one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;” and we derogate from the absolute worthiness and sufficiency of that offering, if we suppose that any supplementary sacrifices are required for the purpose of propitiation. If God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself;† we need no other reconciler. We have indeed our sacrifice, and our altar, and our priesthood, to offer the one, and to minister at the other. But the sacrifice is a spiritual sacrifice, and the altar is figuratively an altar. We slay no victim, we offer no victim slain,”—&c.—(p. 10.)

* We have, for the sake of brevity, purposely abstained from giving the solemnly expressed sense and will of the Church upon the doctrines in question by the right reverend prelate, because these are very easy of access to the reader, who, when interested in the question, will not fail to have recourse to them.

Treating this point in the same manner as we have done the last, we might speedily fill our pages with the most apt and convincing quotations from the fathers of the four first centuries of the Church, in proof of the doctrines which prevailed in their days upon the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass; but as we have much to compress within a short compass, and as the evidence we could adduce is readily discovered by those who might perchance require more ample details than we have space to allot to them, we shall content ourselves with a few only.

“Inflamed,” says St. Justin, “by the word of his calling, as it were by fire, truly we are the sacerdotal offspring of God; as he himself attests, saying that, in every place among the nations, we offer to him well pleasing and clean victims. These victims lie acceptis from his own priests alone. Wherefore, showing preference to all those who through his name, offered the sacrifices which God ordained to be offered, that is, the Eucharist of bread and the chalice, which, in all places of the earth, are celebrated by the Christian people, God declares that they are well pleasing to him. But the sacrifices of you Jews, and of your priests, he rejects, saying: ‘I will accept no offering from your hands; because, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, my name is great among the Gentiles, but ye have profaned it.—Malach. I. But I myself say, that those prayers and thanksgivings are alone perfect, and the victims pleasing to God, which are offered by good men. These, Christians alone have learned to offer, in the commemoration of their dry and liquid food (bread and wine), in which commemoration they are reminded of the passion which Christ suffered.”—Di. cum Tryphon. Judeo, p. 209.

“Giving advice,” says St. Irenæus, “to his disciples to offer their first fruits to God, not as if he stood in need of them, but that they might not seem ungrateful, he took bread into his hands, and giving thanks, said: This is my body. Likewise he declared the cup to be his blood, and taught the new oblation of the New Testament, which oblation the Church receiving from the apostles, offers it to God over all the earth—to him who grants us food—the first fruits of his gifts in the New Testament, of which the prophet Malachias spoke: ‘I will not accept offerings from your hands. For, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, my name is great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense is offered to my name, and a clean sacrifice.’ (1) Manifestly hereby signifying, that the first people (the Jews) will cease to offer to God; and that, in every place, a sacrifice, and that clean, will be offered to him, and that his name is glorified among the Gentiles.”—Adv. Hæc. L. iv. c. xvii. p. 249. “Therefore, the offering of the Church, which the Lord directed to be made over all the world, was deemed a pure sacrifice before God, and received by him; not that he stands in need of sacrifice from us, but because he that makes the offering, if his gift be accepted, is thereby rendered worthy of praise. As, then, in simplicity the Church offers, her offering is accepted by God as a pure sacrifice. It is our duty to make an offering.” &c. See p. 209, ibid. c. xviii. p. 250, 251.—Faith of Catholics of the five first centuries of the Church, p. 267, et seq.

Need we trouble our readers with any further witnesses, to prove which of the two is the ancient doctrine of the Church,—that the mass is propitiatory sacrifice, by which “the fruits of that bloody offering (the sacrifice of the cross) are most plentifully received: so far is it from truth, that hereby the least part is derogated from it. Wherefore, according to apostolical tradition, the mass is duly offered, not only for the benefit of the living, but also for those who, though dead in Christ, are not fully cleansed from all defilement,”—whether this short definition, we say, of the council of Trent, and this evidence of the fathers, be more confirmable to primitive belief, or the singularly unmeaning definition of the Bishop of London,—“But the sacrifice is a spiritual sacrifice, and the altar is figuratively an altar: we slay no victim, we offer no victim slain,” &c.

“Our blessed Saviour’s charge to St. Peter,” the bishop goes on to say, “and through him to all his ministers, was, Feed my sheep. Whatsoever acts of kindness or authority are requisite for the due execution of that charge, with respect to those to whom we stand in the relation of pastors, it is ours to exercise, and theirs to acknowledge and submit to: but in our ministerial acts, both of kindness and authority, especially the latter, we are to have respect for the Church’s laws and ordinances; and beyond what they require, we may not claim obedience. And it is well that it is so: for a spiritual authority, not so limited, in the hands of fallible and imperfect men, would be perverted, as in the example of Rome, to the ends of an intolerable tyranny over the secret thoughts and consciences, as well as the outward acts and observances of those who should be subject to it.”—P. 12.

But does not the right reverend prelate recollected

* On this passage the learned commentator of Irenæus, Dr. Grabe, a Protestant divine, who had made the writings of the fathers his more particular study, observes: “It is certain that Irenæus and all the fathers, either contemporary with the apostles, or their immediate successors, whose writings are still extant considered the blessed Eucharist to be the sacrifice of the new law, and offered bread and wine on the altar, as sacred oblations to God the Father; and that this was not the private opinion of any particular Church or teacher, but the public doctrine and practice of the Universal Church, which she received from the apostles, and they from Christ, is expressly shown in this place by Irenæus, and before him, by Justin M. and Clement of Rome.”—Note in Irenæus p. 323.

* Heb. x. 14.

† 2 Cor. v. 19, that the same Saviour gave a still further commission to the same St. Peter, and through him to all his ministers: "I will give to thee the keys (those emblems of authority) of the kingdom of heaven. And whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven?" (St. Matt. xvi. 19.) And after his resurrection, did he not most emphatically confirm this delegated power to his apostles and disciples, when he made them priests of the Most High? "Peace be to you; as the Father hath sent me, I also send you. When he had said this, he breathed on them; and he said to them, receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose you shall retain, they are retained." (St. John xx. 21-2-3.)

Now, was all this solemn confiding of authority, this especial delegation of the powers of government, nought but so many empty words? or did it not rather convey some substantial rights even over the consciences of men, with such limitations, certainly, as they to whom the power was given, apparently without any, might fully understand? The power was evidently two-fold, and in its very nature discretionary;—but how can a discretionary power be exercised without a knowledge of the circumstances? As the Bishop admits the validity of ordinations, and believes that the imposition of hands confers the Holy Ghost on the ministers of God, so also does he hold the power of absolution to reside with the clergy so ordained;—but here does he begin to innovate upon the ancient doctrine, and to restrict the authority of such ministers to a mere ceremonial: the priest pronounces the words of absolution indiscriminately upon all, and abandons all right to judge of the propriety of the exercise of his functions. His is a power to loose, but not to bind, and half the injunctions of our Saviour are thrown to the winds: "Whose sins ye shall forgive, they are forgiven: whose sins ye shall retain, they are retained." Let us now for an instant pursue the course pointed out to us by the right reverend prelate himself, and see whether we cannot sufficiently ascertain—even from the scanty historical evidence which has descended to us from the early ages of Christianity, independently of the authority of the Church—in what sense these words were interpreted by the primitive Christians; with which interpretation, if our own be found to coincide, we have even an absolute proof that such has been, and therefore ought to be, the doctrine of the Church. For unless the doctrine of the Church be immutable, and as eternal as herself, she can be no true umpire in controversies of faith, nor possess any power to restrain the fancies, or the rash and perverse judgements of men.

REVIEW.

Annals of the Propagation of the Faith. Vol. IV. March, 1843. No. XXIII.

The number just issued in England of these Annals is, in some respects, more than usually interesting. It contains correspondence from the Jesuit mission of Madura, and from the missions of Cochin China and Tong-king. The former are brought down to the 16th of February, 1842; the latter to the end of 1841. The account of the sad tortures inflicted on Messrs. Berneux and Galy, in Cochin China, will be read with a painful and edifying interest. Of a truth these are no dilettanti "missionary enterprizes," no "commercial colonies," like some others that might be named.

"On the 13th of June they were not satisfied with mere threats; after the questions came the bastinado: Mr. Galy received twenty strokes of the ratan, and I received only seven. We had asked of the Lord the grace to suffer becomingly, without uttering any cry: we were graciously heard; a stone would not have been more silent or motionless. They beat slowly, and in the intervals between the blows they asked Mr. Galy if he suffered. 'Much,' he answered. 'See,' said the mandarin, 'the soldier is tired with beating, and he is not tired of suffering.'

"The next day, the same punishment; I received thirteen blows upon the wounds of the seven of the preceding evening. When I raised my head to answer the questions of the judges, they said amongst themselves, 'His face is not changed; it is as if they were beating the ground.' After me, Mr. Galy was treated to ten new blows. This ratan is a horrible thing: every time that it fell upon our bodies, it made a bloody furrow, from five to six inches long. 'Danh dan!' (strike hard) cried the mandarin to the executioner; and the latter, on his part, performed his business conscientiously. One might have taken his stick for a red-hot rod of iron. The pincers and nails will come immediately: they will be welcome; the grace of God who sustains us will be stronger than the tortures. May Jesus ever live!"

"One day, our Cai made a sign to us that a Christian was waiting for us in a retired part of the prison: we repaired thither in all haste. It was Philip Phê, the youngest of the three confessors of Quang-tri. The sight of this fine young man, whose manly countenance forms an agreeable contrast with the mildness and piety of his words, had on us the effect of an angelical apparition; he had come out of his dungeon, accompanied by a Christian soldier, under pretext of going to purchase some medicine. It would be impossible for us to tell all the happiness we felt during our interview; it was a foretaste of heaven. Yet the calmness of the young confessor was a little disturbed by the recital which we gave, at his desire, of the circumstances of our arrest, and of the trials which we underwent at the refecture. In his turn he related to us, with deep emotion, the sufferings of Mr. Delamotte: but he recovered all his joy when he spoke to us with rapidity of his own. He then added; 'Heaven, the object of my hope, is well worth these few tribulations, which we suffer, in imitation of Jesus Christ, our good Master.' Every word of encouragement would have been superfluous; we felt ourselves much more excited by the tranquillity of his countenance than he could have been by our discourses.

"At this time all our examinations were not concluded. We recommended ourselves to his prayers, and to those of his venerable companions, and we separated, after having asked of God the favour of dying on the same day. He has come again several times, always under the guard of the same Christian soldier, the good Lorenzo, whose presence imposes on us no restraint. It was also Philip who brought us the official news of our condemnation to death, a sentence which he thought was to be executed after a short delay. Words never struck so delightfully our ears as these: You shall die in three days. In announcing them to us, he shared our enthusiasm: Lorenzo himself wept. He was to attend at our death, in order to relate all the details to the three confessors, who did not expect to proceed to execution until towards the tenth moon. A person who might have seen us without knowing our destinies would assuredly not have taken us for three men condemned to death. We were not in a pleasing ecstasy, as at the first interview; but our joy was more animated: all our conversation was in blessing the ineffable goodness of the Lord. When the moment for separating came, Philip's eyes filled with tears, and his voice failed him when about to bid us his last farewell. We also were deeply affected; we appointed to meet in heaven, whither we promised to hasten his entrance, and that of his glorious companions. Why were we to meet again upon earth?"

This little volume is full of the most edifying narratives of this nature, and we can think of no better religious reading for this month of our gracious Lady and Patroness than a book so entirely devoted to Her honour, and to the benefits of Her worship as the one now before us. We earnestly recommend it to the attention of our readers.—Tablet, May 6.

CONVERSIONS.

TORNESS.—On the 23rd ult. Mrs. Samuel Cum- ing, a lady of this town, made a public profession of faith, at the chapel at Follaton, the seat of Stanley Cary, Esq., and was solemnly received as a member of the Roman Catholic Church, by the Rev. M.J.C. Carroll, A.M.—Western Times.

THE GLOBE AND CATHOLICISM.—We understand, that Catholicism is spreading even in our agricultural districts, and that Catholic missions are about to be commenced at Aylesbury and Buckingham, in Bucks, and another at Luton, in Bedfordshire. Puseyism is preparing the way for Popery in England, and there seems to be a general spirit of religious discontent abroad.—Globe.

ROME.

The Diario di Roma, of the 29th ult., states that 29 sailors belonging to the French brig-of-war, the Cassard, which was at anchor off Civita-Vecchia, received their Easter communion from the hands of Mgr. Rossi; and that two others of the same crew one a Lutheran and the other a follower of the sect of Abbé Châtel, had renounced their errors.

FRANCE.

The Univers of last Saturday states that Brother Charles has recently arrived in Paris to collect subscriptions for rebuilding the monastery of Mount Carmel, near Nazareth, which was destroyed by the Turks after Napoleon had left the country. 500,000 francs have been already collected for the undertaking by Brother John, Baptist, and Charles, who have traversed a considerable portion of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in furtherance of their pious mission.

Dr. Blum, a young Jewish physician, at Strasbourg, has followed the example of his former co-religionist, Marie Alphonse Ratisbonne, and has become a Catholic.

LISBON.

May 8, 1843.

(From a Correspondent.)

We have at length official information from Government that the Pope has ratified the choice of H. M. F. Majesty, and confirmed her nominees to the Patriarchate of Lisbon, the Archbishopracy of Braga, and the Bishopric of Leiria. The respective Bulls, indeed, have not yet arrived, but are daily expected.

To obviate any difficulties that might be raised against the nomination of Fr. Francisco de S. Luiz by the intruded Cannons, who now occupy the Cathedral of Lisbon, the Pope has addressed a special letter, in the form of a brief, to the Patriarch, dispensing, in his case, with the votes of the Chapter, and authorizing him to take immediate possession of his See. This brief has already received the Bene placitum regium, and his excellency is in the full exercise of his authority.

This event is doubtless one of great interest, and is hailed with joy by vast numbers—I may safely say by the majority of the subjects of this diocese. There can now no longer be any doubt on the minds of the faithful respecting the legitimacy of the authority of their spiritual ruler; and however opposed some persons may have been to the Patriarchal dignity being conferred on its present holder, they must now yield: the Church has spoken, and her voice must be obeyed. The Pope's letter is written in a style of commendation, and breathes throughout that paternal feeling of affection for which the Holy Father is so remarkable. The Patriarch, as is natural, is highly gratified by this kindness of His Holiness, and will no doubt be stimulated by it in his exertions for the cause of God and his Church. There is a wide field, unhappily thickly covered with briars and thorns, open before him; and may God enable him to labour strenuously in its cultivation, until he convert it into what it was of old—a garden smiling with rich and abundant fruits of virtue and holiness.

The person appointed to the Bishopric of Madeira was, some weeks ago, recalled, and Government ceased to urge his confirmation in that See. Costa Cabral, however, still anxious to promote his favourite, proposed his elevation to the Bishopric of Castello Branco. The opposition of the Internuncio to his promotion to that See was of course as resolute as it had been with relation to his confirmation at Madeira; and this worthy pet of the worthy minister has obtained leave to return to the island with the title of Bishop-Elect of Castello Branco. This is evidently an attempt on the part of Costa Cabral to embarrass still more the progress of the negotiations, and gives us too much reason to fear that Government has no great eagerness to come to a complete and speedy reconciliation with the holy See. For Bishop of Madeira her Majesty has her eye upon a person every way qualified for that office, and a man entirely to the mind of the Internuncio. The only difficulty in the way of the nomination of this pious, orthodox, and learned priest, is his own personal opposition to the dignity which it is intended to confer upon him; and this opposition, though resolute, I might almost say obstinate, will, it is hoped be eventually overcome.—Tablet, May 30.

PROTESTANTISM;

ITS INCONSISTENCIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

But God is Faithful, for our preaching, which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT.

2 Ep. Cor. Cap. 1. 18.

In our preceding number, we showed, that the religious Revolution called the Reformation, by the very principles of its origin, tended greatly to unsettle the foundations of Christianity, and to introduce general scepticism on all the doctrines of revelation. It would be easy to demonstrate, for history bears testimony to the melancholy fact, that those principles did not remain inoperative. On the contrary, and several of the leading Reformers even in their day foresaw the result, the progress of Deism, Socinianism, Arianism and general Scepticism in religion has, since the Reformation, been fearfully accelerated. That the present state of Protestantism, (we speak more particularly of British Protestantism of every denomination,) will contribute much to aggravate the evil here referred to, cannot, we think, be doubted, by any unprejudiced reflecting person. It is true, unquestionably, that through the Divine mercy, many, as happened in the instance lately cited by us from the Scottish Church in Ireland, who, otherwise, would never advert to the importance of inquiring after religious truth, will, by occasion of the present Protestant dissensions and schisms, be brought within the pale of Catholic Unity. But many, many more will fling revealed religion to the winds, and vindicate themselves, by saying, that, disgusted with eternal contentions and disputes on one point or another of the Gospel, and seeing no hope of the satisfactory adjustment of these dissensions, they knew not whom or what to believe, and they therefore abandoned all further inquiry as useless.

Far it be from us to justify such a conclusion. We undertake not even to be its apologists. We know full well; that God always gives his good spirit to those who ask it, that, as it is his will that all men come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved, so he supplies always to the sincere and pious inquirer suitable means to conduct him to the true faith. In these circumstances then, the man, who, by occasion of schism and dissension, falls into Scepticism and Infidelity, is certainly grievously culpable before God. But if he be guilty, are they innocent, whose dangerous principles, together with the fatal and interminable quarrels inevitably arising from their maxims, furnished the temptation to which his infirmity unhappily yielded? Assuredly not. They had undertaken the awful responsibility of the pastoral office in his regard: they encouraged him to look up to their Ministry as to that which was appointed by God to teach him the faith and morality of the Gospel. He hearkened with reverence to their teaching, until he found, not only that they could not agree among themselves on the doctrines they were to teach, but moreover, that their disagreement was incurable, because they recognised no tribunal, whose decision could control the private opinion of the disputants, so long as these professed to ground that opinion on their own conscientious interpretation of the sacred Scripture. To the Scripture and the Scripture alone, as interpreted by himself, each Protestant had, in the last instance, the right of appeal. The interpretation of any other tribunal, except that of his own judgment, might indeed merit perhaps, some courtesy, but it could not be final in his regard, without the abandonment of the fundamental principle of Protestantism, viz., the right of private judgment. Once, therefore, that Pastors, who recognised such principles as those just recited, were divided amongst themselves, on any points, which were really, or in their estimate, of importance, all hopes of the restoration of a secure and lasting peace were at an end, and the wound of dissension, although through human policy it might be dissembled for a time, was sure to fester and to exhibit eventually all the angry symptoms which attend invariably on a neglected or injudiciously treated ulcer.

But if in the green-wood those things happened, what might not he apprehended, as likely to occur in the dry? If the Pastors recognised no Guide which was qualified to retain them together in one and the same path; if they who called themselves Guides wandered in uncertainty hither and thither, surely the flock could not be censured, for falling into a similar misfortune.

A Member, for example, of the English Protestant Church, one who has even received a respectable education, is circumstanced as many of his brethren happen to be at present. He hears, on the Sabbath a Clergyman, an anti-Puseyite, preach in the morning, and in the evening of the same day, he hears, from the same Pulpit and from an approved Clergyman also of his Church, principles and doctrines wholly subversive of those which, a few hours previously, he heard inculcated. He returns home and he finds, by perusing the public Journals, that a scene like that which he has just witnessed, is being enacted in every part of the British empire, at home and abroad, and that not only the Clergy of the second order, but the Bishops also have embraced opposite opinions in this great controversy. Thus, then, the doctrine, which in one Diocese, is eulogized as apostolic and orthodox is proscribed in another as new and heretical, and the Clergyman, who, in one place, is honoured for his fidelity in adhering to the teaching of the primitive Church, exposes himself to censure and suspension, if in a neighbouring Diocese, he ventures to propound the very same tenets, which at a few miles distance he had preached with the approbation of the Ordinary. In these circumstances how is the Layman of whom we speak to decide? The Church to which he belongs, has not any living, speaking, infallible tribunal, to which he can have recourse, and which by its sentence can terminate not only external discord, but, moreover, determine, with unerring certainty, what internal belief each of its subjects is bound to hold, on the controverted doctrines. The utmost his most sincere efforts to come to a right conclusion can effect, is, that he may estimate the chances or probabilities of the truth or falsehood of the conflicting doctrines, by having regard to the numbers, integrity, abilities and learning of the respective parties by whom these adverse opinions are upheld. Need we remark, that an appeal to a standard such as we have here described, must leave the mind of the inquirer in its original state of perplexity. He has never seen, and he knows but little of many of the persons, by a reference to whose judgment and integrity he is to calm his anxiety and to be enabled to decide accurately on the questions at issue. Besides, he is aware that, oftentimes, those who are extolled in Society for superior learning, have obtained fame by their proficiency in profane, rather than in sacred letters. On a close inspection, too, he will discover that all the passions of the human breast have found vent for their violence, in the combatants on either side, and thus that the path has become so shrouded by the mists and vapours of partizanship, that further inquiry may be abandoned as hopeless. Hence, not knowing which party is right and which is in error, he will become indifferent with regard to both, and from this indifference, the transition to general Scepticism in religion is by no means difficult or improbable.

In addition to what has been stated, we may further remark, that it would be inconsistent with the primary principle of the Reformation, for a Protestant to regulate his belief by any such reference, as we have described, to the superior numbers or learning of any religious class or Society. It was not by any similar reference that the first Reformers were guided. They, as Luther boasts of himself, stood alone, wholly disconnected from every existing Society or Church, and using intrepidly the Evangelical liberty with which Luther had made them free, they differed from the rest of the world and from one another, just as it might please them, altogether careless of the rank, qualifications, or numbers of those, who thought otherwise. This glorious privilege of discord, they with their last breath, transmitted to their respective followers, and by these the prerogative has been retained and exercised, to an extent, as the world knows, quite large enough to satisfy the religious republicanism of the most daring Innovator.

BAPTISM.—In the preceding week a Mussulman youth, aged 12 years, after having been duly instructed, was baptized in the Cathedral Church by the Rev. Mr. D'Mello.

MADRAS.—We learn from the number of the Madras Catholic Expositor for the present month, that the total receipts of subscriptions in July to the different charitable Institutions in the Madras Vicariate, are as follows:

East India Orphanage,.....	50	14	0
Military Orphan Asylum,	193	9	6
Propagation of the Faith,.....	279	9	6
Catholic Institute,	21	2	0
Building of St. Francis Xavier's Church,	101	0	0
College of the Blessed Trinity,...	8	6	0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

The great interest evinced by the Catholic Community of Bengal in the welfare of the Catholic Orphanage has been blessed with success far beyond what even our most sanguine hopes could have anticipated. Hardly a week elapses, in which some destitute child is not received into that Asylum, raised up by a Merciful Providence, not only to succour its temporal wants, but also to be the safeguard of their faith and morals. The fact is, that in India, as in Ireland, Protestantism would be practically unknown among the humbler classes of Christians, if it were not for the artful and bigotted policy of those wolves in sheep's clothing, who profited of the hunger and poverty of the poor Catholic Orphans, to seduce them into Schools and Institutions, erected apparently for charitable purposes, but in reality, in order to make them exchange the heavenly inheritance of the true faith for a miserable mess of pottage. According as our Orphanage prospers, we shall see this unholy scheme defeated. Already more than one hundred little ones of Christ are not only happily secure against its iniquity, but are, moreover, daily prepared by a judicious and virtuous education, to become useful members of Society. It is truly gratifying to find, that the blessing of such an Institution is duly appreciated as well by the British Catholic Military, as by the Catholic Inhabitants of Bengal. An interesting and edifying proof of our statement, is afforded by the Will of the late Private Hannon, of H. M. 10th Regt. In compliance with that Will, the sum of Rs. 25 13 as 10 p. the entire amount of private Hannon's effects, has been lately paid to the Treasurer of our Orphanage. What an example; what a lesson is taught by the conduct of this poor man? May his alms receive the blessed recognition awarded by the Saviour to the Widow's mite. Ought not such an instance be treasured up as a precious record of Catholic faith and piety, and ought it not to shame into generosity those on whom

God has bestowed abundantly the good things of this world. Every Catholic of Bengal should remember, that the ordinary monthly outlay for the Orphanage is about 700 Rs. and that this sum can be raised only by the uniform and unanimous exertions of all the members of our Communion. In such a cause we cannot be too generous. Notwithstanding all that has been recently accomplished for our poorer brethren, we have reason to believe, that in Calcutta alone, 600 Catholic children are on the high road to perversion and spiritual ruin in the several proselytizing Institutions of the city. Having put our hand to the plough, let us not disqualify ourselves for Heaven by looking back; let us continue generously to proceed as we have begun, and never give over, until we shall have provided for the spiritual and temporal welfare of every destitute Widow and Orphan of our Community.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE

Letters received by the late Overland state that the Rev. Mr. Talbot, a Clergyman of the Established Church, has been received into the Catholic communion by the Right Rev. Doctor Wiseman. Mr. Talbot is Nephew to the Right Honourable Lord Talbot.

By the same letters we learn that the Beautiful Gothic convent built by the Loretto community of Rathfarnham on the sea-coast in the healthful and romantic locality of Dalkey, has been just completed. The Noviciate of the community will be established in this House, and the young Ladies of the Loretto Boarding school will have apartments fitted up also there, for their accommodation during the summer vacation. The expense of the Building is supposed to be about 15,000 pounds.

Another Branch of the Loretto community has been recently established at the small town of Gorey, in the County Wexford. The expense of the new building is estimated at 4,000 pounds; already the Convent Poor schools there contain 200 Girls, and the pay schools 40 young Ladies. Both the Convents here mentioned have been built under the superintendence of the eminent architect, Welby Pugin, Esqr.

CHINA.

Letters from China state that two French Priests have proceeded to the frontiers of Corea, in order to take the place of their brethren, whose martyrdom we recorded in our preceding number. One of these two holy candidates for martyrdom is to be consecrated Bishop by Monseigneur Reeloles, Vicar Apostolic of Least and to succeed to the Martyred Bishop Imbert, whose death our late issue also made mention of.

Three French Priests have lately embarked at Bordeaux in the Gange. Two of them are destined for Cochin China, and the third for China. Thus in the Catholic Church and in her communion alone, in the Nineteenth as well as in the first ages of her existence, is verified the memorable sentence of Tertullian "Sanguis Martyrum, Semen Christianorum—" The blood of Martyrs is the Seed of Christians.

SINGAPORE.—Our regular correspondent at Singapore, whose favor we received per Regina, informs us that the Rev. Mr. Chophard is still living in the Nicobar Islands, but that the Rev. Mr. Bowie is the Priest that was murdered by the savages, and not Mr. Chophard, which was erroneously mentioned by him and published by us. A recent letter from the Rev. Mr. Chophard mentions that he entertains great hopes of the successful issue of his mission in christianizing the savages in the Islands of Nicobar.

We also learn by this opportunity that his Lordship, Bishop Hilaire, intends shortly to visit Malacca in order to exercise his jurisdiction there, and that the Rev. Mr. Paul Bigaudet is to be placed in charge of Malacca. On the arrival of the Spanish vessel Victoria from Cadiz with about twenty priests of different orders bound for Manilla, preparations were made to have a High Mass performed on the Sunday following, but great was the disappointment when the Vessel cleared out on the evening of Saturday, and sailed immediately for its destination. Dr. Hilaire sung the High Mass on that occasion in order that the inhabitants might not be disappointed.

THE FRIEND OF INDIA.

The Catholic Herald of Saturday last has a glowing article expressive of his gratitude to the Star, for his noble and generous conduct, in defending the Catholics. The Star accepts the compliment, and turns round upon "some Protestant writers," whom he reproaches for their "want of charity." We cannot but applaud the Editor for his anxiety to diffuse a spirit of charity among the Protestants; and we think that a similar effort in reference to the Catholics and their organ, the Herald, would not be altogether superfluous. In his very article, the Protestants are called the rabid and fanatical sects around us; the Star is lauded for having exposed the falsehoods and prejudices of the fanatical sects; their writings are called the base productions and aspersions of unprincipled men; and our contemporary is described as having been actuated by his love of truth to expose the follies, the fanaticism and malice of those who are constantly at their dirty work of calumniating our Holy Religion.

We extract the above from last Thursday's Friend of India. Our contemporary finds fault with us for the strong terms we made use of in the article from which he quotes: but he must be aware that they were used in défense and against the unprovoked attacks of the so-called Christian publications. When we are proved to be the aggressors, we shall be ready to confess our fault and be open to the censure that may be passed on us. But daily and weekly, have we had calumnies propagated against the Catholics with no other foundation but what the most extravagant imagination of a prejudiced mind could conceive. As an instance—there is a Poem lately published by one Mr. T. W. Smyth, which, amongst a great many plagiarisms, acknowledged and unacknowledged, has introduced some calumnies against one of our institutions, which the prejudice (to say nothing stronger) of the author has induced him to invent. When we designate such productions as fanatical and malicious are we not justified in using these terms? And what shall we say of the Friend of India himself, when in his review of the work, he expresses a hope that the effort of the author will prove successful, as the profits of it are to be divided among four or five of the charitable Institutions in Calcutta? May we not say that the Friend recommends the diffusion of fabrications against the Catholics? And then, if even for the benefit of charitable Institutions—does he not advocate the perpetration of evil, that good may spring therefrom? We think not, but his recommendation tends to that.

LETTER No. III.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—The Holy Catholic Church! which is the Church is the point at issue between us? Must she be One, must she be True, and must she be Holy to be the Church of Christ? This is a question in itself so simple, so consistent with every attribute of God, so congenial, I may say, to the Holy Trinity itself, and to the leading rule of our Faith, one Lord, one Faith, and one Baptism, or one Shepherd, one Fold, and one Flock, that I am sure, you will one and all concur with me, that she must have all these qualities with other prerogatives, before she can be considered the pure spouse of Christ, or be deemed worthy of her divine founder. We find the Patriarchs and the Prophets portray in glowing terms the chasteness, the beauty, and the perpetuity to all generations of this one Church of the one living God; in the Canticles she is represented under every emblem of innocence and loveliness, of power and stability: "Thou art all fair, my love, there is no spot in thee, my dove, my undefiled is but one; fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army set in array," such is but a portion of the inspired song of Solomon: "Once have I sworn by my holiness, I will not lie unto David, his seed shall endure for ever," Psal. "And they shall call thee the City of the Lord, the Sion of the Holy one of Israel," Isais LX. 14. In the New Testament again she rises upon us in grandeur under the Holy inspiration of the Evangeiists; the first is but a figure—a shadow of the reality that follows: the ancients of the old law saw the Church as it were in a vision, or "as the morning rising," they foretold the coming of Christ—they saw the rays of his glory through the dark vista of time, as we see the preceding light of the sun long before that glorious orb appears; they painted in touching language the comeliness of the future and eternal City of the Lord, the Sion of the Holy one of Israel, the Church of Christ; theirs was the night, and they beheld her rise out of the dark ocean, "fair as the moon," but the Apostles of the new Covenant were the first witnesses to the fulfilment of the patriarchal prophecies regarding Christ and his Church; they were the first to see the day of Christ dawn, and view him come forth with his "purespouse" "bright as the sun:" they were the first to hear from the lips of this Divine Being these glorious promises to his Church: "And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, and I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven." Matt. XVI. 18, 19. "And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," XXVIII, 20. "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you for ever," St. John XIV. 16. "That he might present unto himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish," Eph. V. 27. "Which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and the ground of truth," 1. Tim. III, 15. These are but a few of the many sublime prophecies uttered by the men of God, or of the gracious promises made by Christ to his Church, that he himself would be with it, even unto the end of the world, but enough to convince any one but an Infidel that this Church must be One, must be True, must be Holy, and must be Perpetual, as being the house of the living God; to doubt this would be to doubt the truth of Christianity; to deny it would be to question the Omnipotence of God; every professing Christian then must believe, that such a Church has continually existed from the period of the Apostles, and will live unimpaired to the end of time, always visible. We are at present the living instruments of carrying down in our age the accomplishment of the Divine promises; the next age will take it up from us, as we did from the preceding one, and thus link by link, as generation succeeds generation, as the terrestrial world revolves without intermission, and seasons follow in its train, so will the Church of Christ run over the course traced for her by the divine hand, until all is accomplished, and the world is no more; Christ has promised so: "Heaven and Earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away for ever," Shall man doubt then and disbelieve? No, no. The question then resolves itself now not into whether Christ has had ever a visible and a pure Church on earth, for that I presume you will not dispute in the face of such gracious promises, but the vital question is which of us, Protestant or Catholic, personifies, and is really and truly this Church of Christ, with its one Faith, one Baptism, and one Fold, and an awful and a terrible question this is, on whichever side we view it; even if we deem ourselves within the ark of Salvation, we cannot but behold with awe and sorrow our friends and our fellow-creatures without it; it is something like being spectators on shore of a frail bark about being engulfed in the stormy main, within our sight, but beyond the chance of salvation; we may feel grateful that we are not so situated, but we cannot but behold with grief and terror the desperate situation of our friends and fellow-beings; if nature sickens at such a scene—if tears dim our sight, and horror blanch our cheeks, how keenly on the other hand must not the Christian soul feel, and how poignantly must not religion weep to think, that the salvation of myriads of millions of human beings of every age is endangered in the stormy ocean of human opinion, by not possessing the true faith; there are, my friends, but two scales, we must be either in the right or the wrong one; you believe, and we believe, "out of the Church of Christ there is no ordinary possibility of salvation." "Confession of faith;" or as St. Paul says, "without faith it is impossible to please God," or in the emphatic language of St. Mark, "He that believeth not shall be damned," or again in the synonymous words of St. Matt. XVIII. 17. "But if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an Heathen and a Publican." What weighty and eternal consequences then rest upon this question, which is this "glorious Church," holy, without spot or blemish? How deeply it concerns us then to take care that we be within her Fold—within the glorious ark of Christ: Protestantism reckons itself to be this Church, so does the Church of Rome; it is as certain, however, as that there is but one Sun to give light to this world, than there is but one Church to enlighten us on our way to the next, thus she is appropriately called, "The pillar and the ground of truth;" or as the sublime Prophet Isaias describes her, "a path, a holy way, a straight way, so that fools cannot err therein," C. XXXV.

8. The conclusion therefore is incontrovertible that only one can be this Church, and that if one have the true faith, the other is without it, for truth is but one and indivisible, it cannot be cut in twain, it is the life-blood—the very soul of Christ's mystical body; the Church, may in this be compared in some degree to the formation of man, with an invisible spirit, with a visible and a corporeal body; let but Christ take his immaculate spirit away from it, his Divine essence of truth, and that body which was once so pure turns into a corrupt body—a thing without life,—as man becomes extinct the moment that the source of life, the spirit, quits his body; the difference between the two lies in this, that the one is actuated and influenced by a divine spirit, which is invulnerable and incorruptible, the other again, though made to the image of the Divine spirit, is not perfect, may be overcome by the wiles of the devil, may fall into error and commit evil—that immortal soul in fact may be lost, as its short lived receptacle runs into dust, but the Church of Christ cannot perish, or fall into error, because the invisible Being, the invigorating soul of it is the Lord of eternal life, who said, "Lo, I am with you even unto the end of the world." Though then some of the external members of this body of Christ, the Church, may fall into error and evil, the internal and divine nature of the whole remains unchanged, as some fruit in a rotten condition may fall off a good tree, yet the tree itself and the fruit which remains may be sound and good. The example of Judas Iscariot illustrates this observation; even this earth itself contains within it many deadly poisons, but as a whole it is good and sanctified by God; the dews of heaven fall upon it, in like manner as the grace of God descends upon his Church, some upon barren rocks, some upon graceless souls. We must, then, my dear friends, look out for some distinctive and definite marks by which we may be guided to the Church of Christ; as the miner is induced to seek for gold by significant signs which he observes in the soil, so we must search for qualities in the Church that are consonant to the attributes of God, such as Holiness, Unity, Truth, Catholicity or Universality; in whichever then of professing Christians these qualities exist, there unquestionably the Church of Christ is to be found; they ought to be as it were so many Polar-Stars to the Christian mariner in his exploring voyage towards eternity—as so many beacons, pointing out the proper channel to the Port of Salvation; and if, therefore, my friends, you find them, follow them, and reject the opposite characters; you appear indeed to recognize these fundamental marks of the true Church as you repeat in your daily prayers, the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church;" This will be the theme of my next letter.—"The Catholic Church."

I am, Your's faithfully,

THE STAR.

We reprint from the Bengal Catholic Herald a warm eulogium of the principles upon which our Papers are conducted, and which in religious matters have always led us to reprehend bigotry when coupled with intolerance, perhaps more harshly than may have been pleasing to all ears, but with no desire to say a syllable more than the occasions have appeared to us to require. If we have defended the Roman Catholics it has only been when their religion and its professors have been assailed in an unchristian spirit, and when it has been forced upon us that all the bitterness of the worst times are characteristic of sectarian controversy in an enlightened age. We are told by some of our Protestant writers here what Roman Catholics would do if they possessed temporal power; what those Protestants have the will to do is not very dimly shadowed in their writings, for there is a rancour in them, an affectation of piety, nay prayer itself, cannot disguise. We are happy to believe that there are few of these men, but there are enough to do mischief to the holy cause of religion and to rouse the indignation of all lovers of truth and justice. There is an absence of charity in these men which is shocking to those who believe in the inspired testimony borne to its virtue. It is greater than faith or hope, yet rabid on points of faith, nay even on the forms of religion, charity they have not; it is ever on the tongue but the heart knoweth it not. The lion shall lie down with the lamb sooner than a difference of opinion be pardoned. In all the business of this life men may differ and be friends; touching the concerns of the next, there are unhappily those who not only arrogate to themselves the divinity to judge, but the last exercise of Divine power, to condemn. Of mole-hills of dissent they make mountains, yet forget that though they should remove them, without charity they are nothing, that it benefits them no more than a faith in miracles would do though it should enable them to remove the mountains from the earth, that without charity their eloquence is as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. Would that such men had engraved on their hearts the following eloquent truth. It is an amplification of St. Paul's words: "For now we see through a glass, darkly."

"In this mortal state of imperfection, we obtain no more, through the word and ordinances of God, than an obscure, confused, and perplexing view of the mysteries of his nature, perfections, purposes and works of creation, providence, and redemption; but, in the state of glory above, we shall know these matters in the most immediate, clear, distinct, perfect, and satisfying manner, like to that in which we are now known by our most familiar friends, or shall be known by God, angels, and glorified saints."

We say were this remembered and controversy forsworn, peace and good will would sanctify the great family of man.—Calcutta Star, August 21.

THE CLERGY.

To the Editor of the Englishman.

Sir,—One of the branches of knowledge which the Clergy of our Church acquire in the course of their expensive education, is (if I may judge from the letter of your correspondent AN EXILE) the art of vituperation. He begins by accusing me of bad feeling, though my letter was intended to deprecate an enquiry which must turn out to the disadvantage of himself and his brother Chaplains.

His argument in favour of the large income bestowed on them, in contradistinction to another branch of the public service is twofold; first, that their age on arrival and expense of education are greater; secondly, that their functions more important.

It is very true that a Chaplain, at 26, is older than a Cadet at 16, but how this proves him to be older than a Captain at 36, is difficult to be understood. My comparison was not new comers the Chaplain with newcomer the Cadet, but newcomer the Chaplain with the man of twenty years toils and hardships. Had the Chaplain gone through the same extent of service, and been exposed like the Roman Catholic Missionaries in Cochin China to imprisonment, starvation, and cruel torture, nobody would have thought him overpaid by any pecuniary reward bestowed upon him, if indeed such a man had thought money worth acceptance.

As for the expensive education of Clergymen, I have yet to learn that it is necessarily so. On the contrary young men, who, as your correspondent informs us, "have attained high literary honors in England," get prizes, scholarships, exhibitions, and other scholastic helps, which with the retired and studious habits of a candidate for the ministry, ought to be amply sufficient to maintain them through their course of study. But allowing that they are not so fortunate, but have to defray the whole expense of fitting themselves for their profession, there is another class of public servants, whose education is at least as expensive, and who are not permitted to enter the service till 24 years of age,—I mean the Doctors. How are they paid? They must pay their own passage, and all expenses out to this country, whilst the Chaplain is brought at the public expense. They receive on arrival less than 200 rupees a month, where he gets 500. Yet what did the Court of Directors reply to a solicitation for some further indulgence? That if the present members of the medical service were dissatisfied with their position, hundreds could be got equally competent, glad to accept service.

This brings me to the second part of your correspondent's argument; namely, the comparative importance of the clerical profession. Allowing this to the fullest extent, AN EXILE will see that the pay of professional services is not measured by their importance, but by the rate at which they can be obtained. He would gladly, he says, exchange his rupees here for shillings at home. So would most others. His present pay and allowances are probably not much short of a thousand pounds a year. Five hundred and a snug parsonage house in England would be a very pleasant exchange! But the incumbent of a snug living was not exactly the sort of labourer to whom I was alluding as ready for the Indian vineyard; I spoke of curates, and I have not very long ago seen a list of such, well educated men, university men, receiving £20, £30, and £40 a year. Would not such think an Indian Chaplainship great promotion? Why, one year's income of the retiring pension is more than they can expect to save in their whole lives, if ever such a thought as that of laying up riches that perish enters into their heads. But I am not convinced that high pay conduces to "the seeking to lead others to an immortality of happiness." I expect more zeal in the missionary who has only one coat and no scrip, than in him who carries the bag. The soldier in Horace, who had lost his purse showed desperate valour; but when his money was recovered, he shunned a forlorn hope, saying Ibit eo quo vis qui zonam perdidit.

One word more and I have done. AN EXILE should bear in mind that his salary, whether large or small, is extorted by the dominant power from a people who do not acknowledge our faith. If it were paid out of the contributions of the Church, there could be no objection to it being as liberal as the means of the members would permit. But some modesty I think is requisite in apportioning sums paid to a foreign Clergy out of the taxes levied on Hindoos and Mahometans, lest the day of retribution should come, and when the Idolaters and followers of the false prophet get the upper hand, they should in their turn tax Christians in support of their horrid rites and impious ceremonies. It is obvious that whatever remonstrances Roman Catholics and Protestant Dissenters might justly make against such an exaction, our Church could say nothing. Out of our own mouths they would condemn us.

I remain, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

ANGLICANUS.

THE VIRGIN MOTHER.

(From the Madras Catholic Expositor for August.)

See, how she tends those children! her family is numerous—all daughters; some are sixteen, and some are but two, three, and four years of age; with what care—with what chastened feelings and meek accent does she not afford tuition to the elder children, and with what more than motherly tenderness does she not nurse and watch the younger and the weaker; she corrects without giving pain; her rebuke is clothed in gentleness, it hurts and wounds not, but soothes and allays the feelings, for her every word is weighed by prudence, and tempered by meekness; patience is the only rod she uses, and with perseverance she thus cures the most obdurate; inflexible tempers yield to her mild sway, as an unpliant plant does to a gentle heat; when she gives secular instruction, religion is always present; it intrudes not, but her children ever feel its holy influence; it throws a hallowed softness and calmness around it; they feel her work, is the work of the purest love, nothing earthly in it, they are therefore enchanted by the charm of such a holy spirit, for its fragrance is of heaven, not of this world, and thus she turns what is often elsewhere bitter into sweets. But when she teaches the truths of Christianity: Oh! that the sinner could but see the holy fire that glows within, and shines in her face, it would recall his thoughts from earth to heaven, but her abode is the sacred Sanctuary of Innocence, where she sets and forms the infant mind in the pure mould of religion; A feeble and infantile voice now cries out for her 'Mother,' she hastens to nurse the fretful and sickly little girl—rocks it to rest, or soothes it on her lap to sleep; is there honey upon her lips, or is it the gentle and seraphic music of her voice which has so soon lulled that poor orphan child to rest? She smooths its pillow, as she lays it down to repose, for a moment or two she bends over the innocent and the helpless, like a figure of Charity stooping over the unfortunate, but what is that which glistens as it falls upon the child's cheek, a tear! the tear of tender compassion made holy by the pure spirit with which it is intermixed; but that limpid drop falls not unacknowledged or unnoticed; her little ward as it feels this balm of human nature opens its eyes only to close them with a retributive smile! the reward is enough! and angels witness and record the act on High; this pure soul, distilled by the spirit of religion on earth, is transformed into a brilliant in Heaven; Sleep on, my dear, a mercenary watchman not thy couch, but an angelic being in a human shape; You are, poor child, like a lamb that has lost its mother in a flood; but here nature fails to furnish and complete the parallel religion only could have given you such a mother, who comes and takes you up, and feeds and tends you as if you were her own, because you are one of God's little ones, and her, fellow creature—this is heavenly love! Behold now this virgin Mother with her holy Sisterhood leading the young ones to the Temple of God; what maternal care is now shown; as some lead the juvenile procession, others bring up the rear; how weak is that guard, and yet how strong; a phalanx of soldiers dare not break through that line; the angels of the Lord surround the group and lead it to the sanctuary; mark now the fervour and devotion of those humble and devoted servants of the most High—those Guardians of the Innocents—If you felt cold and lukewarm before, you cannot view them, and not feel abashed; you see such noble disinterestedness—such ardent zeal—such deep humility—such profound piety, that if you have a soul, and have not given it wholly to the evil one, you must feel it all in one religious glow; it is a sight which may warm the tepid sinner, as the rays of the morning sun, may the benighted and frozen traveller; the whole cluster is like the blossom of the vine, until it ripens into beautiful fruit for these little children guarded by Motherly virgins—are the choicest fruits of the Lord's vineyard on Earth; See, they return in the same order in which they went forth. Now witness this virgin mother, issue from her sacred Asylum under a somewhat different garb; what is that which she carries in her hand? The God of Charity and herself only know, but whereto does she now wend her way? to the sick Hospital! a gleam of joy passes over those pallid faces as the bed-ridden patients see that handmaid of mercy, enter; a murmur of blessings resounds through the ward as they behold the soother of sorrow, the allayer of affliction, and the comforter of sinners, approach! temporal charity she carries in her hand to relieve the distressed, and the oily balm of religion she pours into the troubled souls, she thus helps the physician, and acts as a precursor to the minister of the Gospel; she relieves their parched lips—smooths down their uneven pillows, and breathes into them part of her own spirit, humility, patience, resignation, love of God, and their neighbour, and then leaves them better than she found them; follow her now, if you will, and see her go into the humble and the lowly cottage; there may be pestilence, death, poverty, and misery there, and yet she enters; and faces a danger which the boldest man would fly from, but she possesses in an extraordinary degree a divine essence—charity—which knows no fear, and she too knows death would be life to her in such a cause. If it is a house afflicted with poverty, she administers temporal relief to the wretched family to the utmost of her power; she may find tears of gratitude bedew her hands which the now happy mother of numerous children lets fall as she receives her bountiful alms; if the husband is there, he retires to hide his emotion; and the starving children stand by and look with a sort of awe and delight at the angelic visitant; at the meek daughter of Charity; they note by their mother's face that relief is at hand, and the wretched she thus makes happy. If again it is a house of sickness she comes to, she performs the duty of the tender nurse and the good physician; to all she is a spiritual adviser; the works of mercy, Corporal and Spiritual, influence her acts; she goes forth clothed in humility, and religion guides her in all her ways. At the close of day, after her labour of love, she returns to her holy sanctuary—the doors are closed for the night—the Bell rings to prayers, and sleep—the sweet sleep of a pure conscience, visits the couch of this 'Virgin Mother,' and if you want to know who is this Virgin Mother, know, that she is, The professed Nun !!!

Madras, 22nd June, 1843.

"LOOK AT THIS PICTURE AND ON THAT."

GLASGOW, 28th Feb. 1615.

At this time Episcopacy, without prevailing in Scotland, was the established form of Church government—Spottiswoode being Archbishop of Glasgow; but the spirit of the Covenant was urging the people into open defiance of civil equality as of religious authority. While denunciations of Prelacy resounded from every Presbyterian agitator, the Episcopal party attempted to give it another direction, by raising a cry of No Popery and of the Jesuits, which, though exceedingly agreeable to the Presbyterians, did not divert them from their attack on the Establishment. In pursuance of this policy, John Ogilvie, the son of Ogilvie of Drum—educated at the Colleges of Orléans and Graz, and ordained priest at Paris, returned to his native country after an absence of twenty-two years, and was apprehended at Edinburgh for celebrating mass. He was confined in the prison of Edinburgh for eight days, with small sustentation, and (by means of pricking with pins, &c.) was compelled and witholden perforce from sleep, to the great perturbation of his brain, and to compel ad delirium." In this tortured condition he was hurried to Glasgow, tried before Archbishop Spottiswoode for saying mass, and found guilty. He was executed within three hours after his trial and sentence.

When George Wishart, the precursor reformer and conspirator, was executed at St. Andrews, for heresy and treason, he, while in the pangs of death, threatened Cardinal Beaton with that death to which he was an accessory before the fact, having carried the proposition of assassination to the court of Henry the eighth—and his prophecy was fulfilled. Many of the prophecies and prayers of Knox, in like manner, received full and horrible accomplishment. And when Robert Bruce, the successor of Knox as one of the Edinburgh preachers, got into trouble for practising against King James the lessons he had received in the school of Knox, no one so much distinguished himself for attachment to the King and to order, as John Watt, the convener of the trades of Edinburgh. But Bruce, in the spirit of his party, declared "that he was persuaded a judgment from heaven was abiding Mr. Watt for his injurious treatment of him." He was accordingly shot dead in the Borough Muir of Edinburgh, by some unseen person; and Bruce's biographer adds, that "when he came to this hasty end, they could not but observe Mr. Bruce's words fulfilled."

The Catholic victim, however, felt and acted otherwise; one of Ogilvie's last prayers was in accordance with the faith he professed. He prayed for forgiveness and mercy even to those who persecuted him, and were the cause and the instruments of his cruel death.

6th August, 1622.

Andrew Hathorn, burgess of Glasgow, and Janet Pollock his spouse, were tried and condemned to banishment for life from Scotland, for the treasonable harbouring and sheltering of George Mortimer, a priest.

24th May, 1843.

The episcopacy of 1615 is destroyed. Spottiswoode died in exile, and his son, the chief law adviser in Scotland of Charles the Second, was beheaded by the party whom his father vainly attempted to propitiate by the blood of a Catholic priest. Presbyterianism was, in 1638 and 1688, made the State Religion, and bitterly avenged the inferiority to which it had for many years been subjected. But now, Presbyterianism, in its turn, is falling to pieces—the Presbytery of Glasgow is rent in twain—the minority clinging to the State—the majority volunteering into Dissent. The Catholic Church alone gives evidence of vitality and truth—a bishop and coadjutor, 10 priests, 7 schools and 50,000 Catholic inhabitants.

In 1560, Archbishop Beaton, the last prelate of the Catholic Church in Glasgow, fled to France from the fury of the Scotch Reformers—carrying with him many of the records and much of the history of Scotland and Scottish institutions. He deposited them in the Scotch College at Paris; but what he saved from one set of revolutionists, were destroyed by another—the French republican committing to the flames what the Scotch Calvinist had been prevented from consuming.

After a long night of darkness and persecution, the Rev. Andrew Scott was, in 1828, consecrated Catholic Bishop in Glasgow. Fitted by nature for exertion—nurtured under the operation of the penal laws—highly educated, and, above all, having the steadiness as well as the sagacity of his country, he seems to have been made or fitted for the times he lives in. To be useful to the Highland Catholics, and give fixedness to those of Ireland, he, the first of all, introduced the plan of raising large sums by trifling individual contributions and thereby was enabled to erect a splendid temple in Glasgow, the first, in fact, after the style of the middle ages, which is now being revived in almost every locality of Great Britain, where Catholic rank or Catholic industry is found. Greenock and Paisley, and Airdrie, as well as others in Glasgow have been added. And now, from Airdrie to Greenock, reached by steam-boat or railway within the same space of time that a modern street can be traversed on foot, there is a Catholic bishop and his coadjutor; 19 priests; and 72,000 Catholics, with flourishing schools, giving the gratifying promise of intelligence and order, and secular as well as religious happiness. Fortunate as have been all the plans of Bishop Scott—thereby instructing that, like everything successful, they were framed with wisdom, he has been still more fortunate in the acquisition of Bishop Murdoch as his coadjutor—capacity, firmness of purpose, and judiciousness of conduct, exhibiting him not only carrying out Bishop Scott's plans, but also laying for himself the basis of greater and more extended measures for the benefit of religion. What is to follow belongs not to us to say; but while the heart swells with a joy that religious attachment only can experience, the imagination stretching out into that mighty future, and contemplating, on the one hand, Andrew Hathorn and his spouse, of 1622, and the 72,000 Catholics of 1843, is not unreasonable in figuring to itself the faith that St. Mungo planted in Glasgow again to be as wide in its influence, as it was then in its intensity.—Edinburgh Courier, May 25.

Tertullian, and those writers who preceded him, appear to speak only of the public confession of sins, and the penances enjoined by the canons; but, in the third century, we have abundant evidence of both the doctrine and discipline of the Church on the general subject of auricular confession, as a necessary part of the sacrament of penance.

"God sees into the hearts and breasts of all men," says St. Cyprian, "and he will judge, not their actions only, but their words and thoughts, viewing the most hidden conceptions of the mind. Hence, though some of these persons be remarked for their faith and the fear of God, and have not been guilty of the crime of sacrificing (to idols), nor of surrendering the holy Scriptures; yet if the thought of doing it have ever entered their mind, this they confess, with grief and without disguise, before the priests of God, unburdening the conscience, and seeking a salutary remedy, however small and pardonable their failing may have been. God, they know, will not be mocked."—De Lapsis, p. 190.

Having mentioned some other sins not greatly criminal he adds:

"The fault is less, but the conscience is not clear. Pardon may more easily be obtained; still there is guilt: and let not the sinner cease from doing penance, lest what before was small, be aggravated by neglect. I entreat you, my brethren, let all confess their faults, while he that has offended enjoys life, while his confession can be received, and while the satisfaction and pardon imparted by the priests are acceptable before God,"—Ibid.

Speaking of the culpable indulgence shown to some, who had fallen in the time of persecution, he observes:

"The miserable men are thus deceived; and when, by doing sincere penance, by prayer and good works, they might satisfy God, they are seduced into greater danger, and fall lower when they might rise. In the case of smaller failings, it is required that sinners do penance for a stated time; that, according to the rule of established discipline, they come to confession (exomologesis), and that, by the imposition of the hand of the bishop and clergy, they be admitted to communion."

"There is yet a more severe and arduous pardon of sins by penance," observes Origen, "when the sinner washes his couch with his tears, and when he blushes not to disclose his sin to the priest of the Lord, and seek a remedy. Thus is fulfilled what the apostle says: 'Is any man sick among you, let him bring in the priests of the Church.' (James v. 14)" —Homil. ii. in Levit. t. ii. p. 191. "At the last day, all things will be revealed, whatever we shall have committed; what we have done in private, what in word only, or even in thought: all will be laid open. But if, while we are alive, we prevent this, and become our own accusers, we shall escape the designs of the accusing devil; for thus the prophet says: Let us be our own accusers."—Homil. iii. in Levit. t. ii. p. 196. "Observe that the divine Scripture teaches, that we must not inwardly conceal our sins. For as those whose stomach is overloaded with indigestible food, and humours, if they vomit, are instantly relieved: so they who have sinned, if they hide and retain their sin within their breasts, are grievously tormented: but if the sinner becomes his own accuser, while he does this, he discharges the cause of all his malady. Only let him carefully consider to whom he should confess his sin; what is the character of the physician; if he be one who will be weak with the weak, who will weep with the sorrowful, and who understand the discipline of condolence and fellow-feeling. So that when his skill shall be known, and his pity felt, you may follow what he shall advise. Should he think your disease to be such, that it should be declared in the assembly of the faithful, whereby others may be edified, and yourself easily reformed—this must be done with much deliberation and the skilful advice of the physician."—Homil. ii. in Psal. xxxviii. t. iii. p. 688. "They who are not holy die in their sins; the holy do penance; they feel their wounds; are sensible of their failings; look for the priest; implore health; and through him seek to be purified"—Homil. x. in Num. t. ii. p. 302. "If we discover our sins not only to God, but to those who may apply a remedy to our wounds and iniquities, our sins will be effaced by him who said: I have blotted out thy iniquities as a cloud, and thy sins as a mist"—(Isa. xlv. 22.)—*Homil. xvii. in Lucam.

We cannot find space for more quotations. But as we advance in the inquiry, the evidence thickens, so as to leave not the smallest doubt that the doctrines of antiquity on this point correspond most perfectly with the present doctrine of the Catholic Church: and that the "intolerable tyranny over the secret thoughts and consciences, as well as the outward acts and observances, of those who are subject to her authority" was in as full vigour in primitive times, in all those churches which were founded by the apostles, had derived an uninterrupted jurisdiction, and had continued an unbroken succession from them, as it is in ours. Has not this ever been the interpretation—and the only sensible and consistent interpretation it is—of that high commission given to the apostles, and through them to all their legitimate successors—"to bind and to loose,"—"whose sins ye shall forgive, they are forgiven; whose sins ye shall retain, they are retained?"

The right reverend prelate then proceeds to warn his readers against the crime of apostatizing, as he is pleased to call it, to an Idolatrous Church, i. e. the Church Catholic. Now, really this is so old and hacknied a charge, so long and pertinaciously advanced, and yet so constantly and thoroughly refuted, that to urge it now, carries us back to the history even of heathen Rome, when in their blind and furious struggle against the innovations of Christianity, as they were called, the Pagans persisted for ages in accusing the meek and virtuous Christian of the most atrocious crimes, such as sacrificing infant children in the celebration of their rites, and then feasting upon their flesh.

* Faith of Catholics, &c., compiled by Rev. Joseph Berington and John Kirk. 8vo. Edit, 1830. P. 429.

And how did the eloquent Tertullian reply to the accusation? Why, precisely as we do now to this of the Bishop of London. With him we complain, that we are condemned without a hearing,—condemned in ignorance of our doctrines and our practices. The prejudice against the very name of Catholic is still as great amongst some (happily not in all), as "it was against Christian in the days of Tertullian." "Christianity," said he, "is prohibited by the laws; therefore do you condemn it. But is this a justifiable cause? The Christians are accused of not adoring the gods, and of not offering sacrifice to the emperor,—and in this indeed we are guilty." We also are accused of a divided allegiance, because we refuse to renounce our duties as Christians, and give to Cæsar the things that are God's. In this indeed are we guilty, and we glory in it. We glory that at the command of an impetuous tyrant, following only the ungoverned impulses of an impetuous temper, a remnant at least of our afflicted ancestors heroically refused to adore before the golden statue, and to crouch before the wayward but relentless will of the usurping monarch. The Pagans, says Tertullian, reproached the Christian for adoring the head of an ass, because, taking Christianity but a consequence of Judaism, they had believed the Jews to have done so: nor was their misapprehension corrected till they had satisfied themselves with their own eyes, upon the taking of Jerusalem by Pompey, of the utter falsity of this assertion. Others, says he, accused them of adoring the cross, and more especially the sun, because they worshipped God with their faces towards the east, and sanctified in a peculiar manner the day dedicated to that luminary.

Neither has any succeeding age yet corrected all the follies and injustice of the former; and in spite of all our assertions to the contrary, in spite of the testifying voice of one hundred and fifty millions of Catholic Christians, are we still accused of the same absurdities with the same obstinate perversity. When Pompey entered the temple he found no idol; and if the Bishop of London would but enter ours, he might be more cautious how he bantered us with idolatry; for though he would behold the image of Christ crucified, of his Virgin Mother, and of his saints, and see them venerated, in virtue of that which they represent, and employed as incentives to devotion, he might very soon be satisfied, if he but questioned any of those whom he there found worshipping, whether it were the image, or that which it represented, to which they addressed their applications. He would be told, as Tertullian told the calumniators of his days, that we adored but one God, the Creator of heaven and earth, and of all things therein, the Lord, and life, and light of the world, who redeemed us by his only Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, and who will one day return amongst us in great power, majesty, and glory, to judge both the living and the dead according to their works.

If ours is to be an idolatrous Church from the presumed tendencies—and this is now become a very prevalent, and rather fashionable doctrine—of even the most legitimate use of painting and sculpture in the decoration of our Churches, then indeed is it equally manifest, that the primitive Christians, in the very earliest ages of a struggling and persecuted Church, were also idolaters upon the same principle; for the common use of such representations is attested to this day by the many very interesting remains of ancient painting still existing in the catacombs. If, on the other hand, the Right Reverend Prelate would insinuate that we were an idolatrous Church because of our doctrine and practice in the invocation of the saints; then also will we triumphantly refer him to the history of the early Church, and ascertain by that, that the doctrine of Trent upon this head was also the doctrine of the immediate successors of the apostles, and convince him herein, even by his own rule,—by "those helps to a right understanding of these matters,"—"the sense in which they (the Scriptures) were understood by the disciples and immediate successors of the apostles, and which was derived from them to the early Church at large." Not to load our pages with supernumerary quotations, we will content ourselves with this one from Origen, who flourished in the third century,—certainly far removed beyond the fatal, though mysterious period (eight hundred years and more), in which the homilies of 1562 declare us (upon what authority is not said) to have been buried in damnable idolatry,—and who must undoubtedly be taken as speaking the common language and sentiments of his day.

"Who can doubt," says Origen. "that our holy fathers aid us by their prayers, and strengthen and excite by the example of their actions, as also by the writings they have left us; herein teaching and instructing us how to fight against the adverse powers, and in what manner these contests are to be maintained? Thus they fight for us, and advance armed before us."—Homil. xxvi. in Num. t. ii. p. 373. "And of the holy men who have quitted this life, retaining their charity towards those whom they left behind, we may be allowed to say, that they are anxious for their salvation, and that they assist them by their prayers and their mediation with God. For it is written in the books of the Maccabees: "This is Jeremiah the prophet of God who always prays for the people"—Lib. iii. in Cant. Cantic. t. iii. p. 75. "The angels are everywhere present: come, then, thou angel, receive him that is changed from his former error; from the doctrine of demons; from loud-speaking iniquity; and, having received him, soothe him as a kind physician, and instruct him, for he is yet young. And call to thee the associates of thy ministry, that, together, you may train to the faith all those that have been deceived. For there is greater joy in heaven upon one sinner that doth penance, than upon ninety-nine just. Every creature exults and rejoices with those that shall be saved. "For the expectation of the creature waiteth for the revelation of the sons of God!" (Rom. viii. 19.)—Homil. i. in Ezechie, t. iii. p. 358.

CATHOLIC JUDGE AT MADRAS.—It is understood that Mr. Patrick Murphy, Q. C., assistant barrister for the county of Cavan, will be appointed to the chief justiceship at Madras, or to the first vacancy on the Indian Bench. Mr. Murphy is a Roman Catholic, and took a leading part in the struggle for Catholic Emancipation; but since the Repeal agitation he has abstained from politics, devoting himself to his profession. We believe Mr. Murphy has been also appointed one of Her Majesty's counsel in England.—Overland Mail.

CHURCH PASTORAL AID SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this society was held on Wednesday at Exeter Hall. Lord Ashley presided, and among those present were the Bishop of Chester, the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Norwich, the Bishop of Llandaff, the Rev. H. Stowell, and a large number of the clergymen of the Church of England. Lord Ashley spoke as follows:—

"It is not my intention to interpose at any length between the meeting and the business of the day, but I cannot restrain myself from saying a few words in congratulation that this society continues to flourish, and to enjoy the countenance and support of the country—(Cheers). I do not believe that at any one anniversary have we met under circumstances of so great necessity as at the present day. I do not believe the country has at any one period more required the co-operation of such an association than at the present hour, for we are beset between two assailants, and if we have to fear the progress of false doctrines with the one, we have likewise to fear what may be called the progress of no-doctrines from the other. We are between the two seas of heresy and infidelity—(Cheers, and cries of "hear.") But I do rejoice that it has pleased God to call me to the honour of presiding over such a society as this, which, both in its constitution and in its conduct, appears to me to be the only actual protesting body now existing in the Church of England. I am very glad that we rejoice in the name, and still more glad that we rejoice in such an operation; but now let me call your attention to the present state of things. You must have seen that the Government of this country have lately propounded a system of education with a view of bringing within the pale of Christianity—for such it is—thousands, nay, hundreds of thousands, and almost millions of children and young persons, who now live in a state of more than practical heathenism. Whether that system is the best in itself it is not necessary here to discuss, but the education propounded I am sure is the best that the Government, under the circumstances of the Church and nation, could propose. There are many points which may require consideration, but the system as propounded to you is worthy of your acceptance—(Cheers). Whether it will be accepted or not by the country I do not know; but this I do know, that if it be accepted it will be your duty to co-operate in forwarding the projects of the Government; and if it be not accepted, it will be your duty to double and quintuple your efforts to do that which they have been unable to effect, and to endeavour to bring within the sound of the Gospel those many millions of whom I have now spoken unto you, and who, if they are not brought within the pale of Christianity, will soon drive this country and this empire itself beyond the pale and even the name of Christianity. Late events have proved the truth of what I say. Two parties were visible in the late events of the past autumn. There was the active and the inactive party. Of whom did the active party consist? Did it not consist of all those who at no period of their lives had ever received at the lips of God's minister the truths and the precepts of the Gospel? And who were the passive party, who, be it observed, had just as much reason to complain as those who were most active? They were those men who, as my rev. friend on my left, the rector of Salford, has said, have been, by the assiduity of the ministers of the Church, brought within the sound of the Gospel—children who have been trained from their earliest years to fear the God who created them and the Saviour who redeemed them. Therefore you have before you a good prospect of success if you will but persevere. But let me tell you that your perseverance must be of no ordinary kind; it requires an amount of self-denial, a self-denial in time, a self-denial in trouble, and a self-denial in what I am sorry to see is a strong test of sincerity—a self-denial in money. Therefore, let me exhort you not to rest content with what you have done, but look on it as a mere drop of water in the bucket, and pour forth your means and even beyond your means, for the opportunity now offered may never return, and be assured that every year now is a century as compared with the times that are past—(Cheers). I do not wish to hold out any flattering prospects of the state of the country. I have seen enough in my commerce with the mighty provinces in the north to know that the country is resting on a dormant volcano. It may please God, and we all pray that it may please Him, to save the country from the danger that threatens it; but, if the country is to be saved, recollect it is not to be saved by the ordinary operations of statesmanship. It must be done by some great exercise of public and private virtue; by a large and immediate diffusion of the Gospel among all classes—(Cheers). It must rise upwards among the rich, and go downwards among the poor, and you must contribute every encouragement you can morally and physically for this great purpose; and rely on it unless you do so, you will not celebrate in this hall many more anniversaries. You may meet, but if you do, it will be to mourn over the fate of these kingdoms and of that Church which, if you had listened in time, if you had listened to the many Jonahs that now speak to you from the pulpit, you might, like Nineveh, have turned to the Lord in sackcloth and ashes, and might have sprung on in a new course of greatness and power—not the greatness of conquest, not the power of mere imperial dominion, but the greatness and power of being a mighty instrument in the hands of God for the advancement of his glory and for the temporal and eternal welfare of the whole human race. I have spoken to you what I feel. I most solemnly feel what I have said, and I do declare my firm belief that, unless some great effort is made by the nation at large to avert the mischiefs which threaten us, not many years will have elapsed before we shall have ceased to be a nation, or if we shall not have ceased to be a nation, we shall have assuredly ceased to have an independent Church and an Imperial Parliament"—(Cheers).

Several ministers and gentlemen spoke in support of the society, after which the meeting broke up.—Britannia, May 13.

MORALITY IN EDINBURGH AFTER THE OVERTHROW OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

DEAN SWIFT said truly, that a lie, uncontradicted or twenty-four hours, could obtain the belief of the world. What wonder is it, then, that the reiterated and uncontradicted falsehoods of three hundred years to the prejudice of the Catholic faith, and morality and intellect, should be so deeply impressed in the hearts and opinions of the people of Scotland, and deemed by them "proofs strong as holy writ?" Not only was the liberty of action denied to the maligned and persecuted Catholics, but the liberty also of thinking and of improving thought, while pulpit and platform orations, General Assembly acts, and Presbytery reports, drew figures of Catholicism and of Catholics, that, even if true, deserved not all the ignominy so unsparingly inflicted, and, if false, entitled the accused to the privilege, at least, of denial. But no. The printing press of Ninian Wingham, the famous Catholic schoolmaster of Linlithgow, and afterwards Abbot of Ratisbon, was destroyed by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, at the instigation of the preachers; and the General Assembly prohibited the functions even of the Presbyterian press, when speaking on any side but that of the accuser. Hence the peaceful and religious simplicity of the great bulk of the population before the overthrow of the Catholic Church in Scotland, as well in the exertions made by the Church in the cause of education and of virtue, were totally overlooked, or studiously kept out of view; and, while measuring the value of the change of religion by the noise of its promoters and the affectation of emancipation of the human mind, and so forth, the immorality and the worthlessness that accompanied and followed the proceedings of the Reformers, and which, like a leprosy, pervaded the kingdom, and Edinburgh in particular, are completely suppressed, or kept out of view.

The number of hospitals, of maisons Dieu, and private endowments for purposes of religion and of charity attest how strongly attached to works of piety the inhabitants of Edinburgh were, while the chapels and chaplainries attached to and supported by the various corporations of the city, and the nature of the institutions, bespeak religious practices of the most conducive tendency to a pure morality. Nor were the mercantile class less devout than their brethren of the trades, for one of the last acts and last structures in favour of religion, was the erection by the merchants or guild brethren, of the new aisle now incorporated with St. Giles' Cathedral in honour of the Holy Blood, with an altar and chaplain attached thereto, supported from the entry monies or fees payable by new members. And Janet Ryne, the widow of Michael McWhan, one of these same merchants, showed that the virtues of the class must have been great, in respect of the exalted devotion of the individuals composing the body:—In 1545, this pious widow, in the pure and quaint simplicity of the Scottish language then in use, endowed, to "the praise and honour of Almighty God, and of his mother, the blessed Virgin Mary, and of Mary Magdalene, and of the baille Celestial Court," Mary's Chapel, for the sustentation of one secular chaplain and seven poor men, and for a chaplain and four poor brethren. But this endowment, like many others, was perverted to different purposes, and some of the united incorporations used the fruits of it in dissipation, and in paying the expences of the corporate and political, as well as social, meetings of the Edinburgh tradesmen.

This, however, was a trifle in comparison with the general corruption introduced into the city. Bands of men from Ayrshire, under Lord Glencairn, and from Forfarshire, under the Mearns, leaders of the movement, flocked to Edinburgh, plundering and burning every religious edifice in their way, and excited by the prospect of still greater plunder in the capital. The cultivation of the soil was abandoned; the useful occupation of the handicraftsman neglected; and not only were the inmates of religious houses thrown helpless on the world, but their tradesmen and dependents were involved in a similar calamity. As regards the nobility, too, whose public crimes history has scarcely yet fully depicted, the embarrassments and absolute poverty under which many of them suffered, are so characteristically described by the English agents of Queen Elizabeth in Scotland, when urging their Royal Mistress to send down money to relieve their distresses, and by bribery secure their doubtful fidelity to English interests, that one wonders not at the flagitiousness of their conduct. In fact, not only were the bonds of religious and political government burst asunder, but morality itself, in this dislocation of society, was utterly exploded. Crimes against person and against property multiplied. The Town Council again and again issued proclamations, the terms of which, and the crimes therein mentioned, are inadmissible in our columns; and the legislature itself frequently attempted to make laws for the prevention and correction of evils itself had been the means of producing.

Thus matters went on for the first thirty years, or one generation of the infancy of Calvinism in Scotland, till in 1592 it was deemed advisable to subdivide the city into districts or parishes, in order, if possible, to correct the general corruption that prevailed. In pursuance of such intention, an announcement was made to the inhabitants, on the 6th August of that year, from the pulpits of the preachers, "That by reason of the great dishonour done to God especially in his holy Sabbath, by a great number in this city in time of divine worship, partly in alehouses, partly in profane games in back-sides, partly in the open streets, and some committing harlotry in honest men's houses, and that besides these, God's name is continually blasphemed, and many other vices abound, as daily experience teaches us: As also there are a great many houses in diverse parts here that live only in receipt of stolen gear and entertaining of harlotry, which whole vices spring of ignorance for lack of teaching, due examination, and visitations: like—as our pastors, being so few in number, cannot, in good conscience, discharge a pastoral duty in such a populous city, where vice so much aboundeth, except a means be found out how these enormities, in some measure, may be remedied, which cannot be done but by the division of the town in competent congregations. For this cause, the Kirk and Council hath thought good, for the present, that this city be divided in eight congregations, and they to have eight ministers, whose stipends must be supplied by a yearly contribution of the godly and honest men of this good town, until it please God that the good town be able of their own common good (corporation revenue) to do it themselves."

But no advantage resulted from this arrangement—the preachers were constantly engaged in contests with the crown and civil power, and in the profanity and cant of the times, by the motion of God's Holy Spirit quickening their unsettled and mischievously disposed auditors into assaults and insurrections against God's silly vassal, as they termed James the VI.; and hence, instead of improvement, matters became worse and worse, until in 1632 the erection of a house of correction became indispensable. Auricular confession, and the ancient practices of piety and of virtue, inculcated and fostered under the Catholic Church, were abolished and forgotten, and instead of the preventatives of the Ancient Church, penitentiaries and houses of correction became the unavoidable auxiliaries of Calvinism, under the influence of which the state of Edinburgh wickedness was almost incredible. In contemplating this period, the suspicious testimony of ardent antagonists is not used. The act of erection—the unsuspected and not exaggerated reasons which forced the town Council of Edinburgh to erect a house of correction are alone referred to. Their Act of Council bears, that "Forasmuch as the Provost, Bailies, and Council of this burgh, finding the town and all the bounds of their liberties to abound with beggars, and all sorts of vices and ungodly manner of living was grown to such an height, that these parts of the kingdom are become a common receptacle of all evil and lewdly disposed persons, so that all virtue is suppressed;"—and, therefore, the institution of a house of correction was resolved on.

As the influence of the preachers failed, so also did the penitentiary. The war of the Covenant—the operations of Cromwell in Scotland—the restoration of Charles the Second, and convulsed state of the country until the desertion of James the Second, tended to aggravate the disorganised state of Edinburgh society to such an extent, indeed, that, in addition to the ordinary criminal jurisdictions for the trial and punishment of crime against person and property, a Court of Immorality for the reformation of manners was instituted,—and that state of society which the proclamations of 1596 intended the preachers to remedy, and the act of Council of 1632 expected the House of Correction to accomplish, was to be restored to virtue by the civil magistrate imposing pains and penalties in the Court of Immorality. As an auxiliary, sermons were delivered by the preachers two or three times a week. Volunteer associations of citizens perambulated the streets, accompanied by a constable, and kept up a system of domiciliary visits that became ultimately very annoying; and finally, waiters or informers were stationed at the corners of streets to see who were absent from sermon, and report them to the magistrates, as well as those who blasphemed, or could be provoked to swear, or frequented taverns or otherwise. The fines imposed by his court afforded a rich harvest to the officers and witnesses, and others engaged in it, while the outprit who was unable to pay afforded to the magistrate an excellent opportunity of exhibiting his virtuous indignation,—and, as in the following case, his loyalty also:—

thereby, married, being purged (of malice), sworn, and examined, depones, that about fifteen days since or thereby, he did hear John Kerr, workman, swear by the blessed name of God, as he was standing at the head of North Gray's Close, near the Netherbow; and the deponent having reproved him therefore he took the deponent by the breast, and said that there were better days in King James' time, and that, if King James were on the throne, they would not have so many clock preachings, and afterwards desired the deponent to kiss his breech—and, this is truth as he shall answer to God." "Samuel Livingston, waiter at the Netherbow Port, being purged, sworn, and examined, depones in forma precedente in omnibus: causa scientie patet, and this is truth as he shall answer to God. And the bailies find the expressions libelled against John Kerr, above designed, proven by the witnesses' dispositions: wherefore they ordain him to be taken to the pillory at the Tron to-morrow, in the forenoon, and there to stand for the space of one hour, and ordains him to be imprisoned till that time."

Such was the state of morals in Edinburgh during the first and second centuries of Calvinism. The act of Queen Anne binding it down to order and tranquillity—the gradual withdrawal of the higher classes from it, and their adoption of Episcopacy—laterly, the increase of Catholicism, and the recurrence of its professors to the observances and the practical piety of the ancient Church, have in this third century greatly tended to the reformation of morals, and give to every friend to true religion and to virtue the hope and assurance that in the agitation which Calvinism, again let loose, is about to create, there is a countervailing power sufficient to watch over, and effectually protect, the interests of morality and virtue.—Edinburgh Courier, May 25.

BENEDICTINE MONASTERY OF SAN MARTINO
—Two miles of good road, and a gentle ascent from Monreale, took us to the foot of the mountain, whence another mile or two of a steep and rugged pass led to the Benedictine Monastery of San Martino. This is a noble pile of building. Vast, but simple in its structure, without architectural ornament, and reposing in peaceful loneliness in the heart of mountains, it seemed, from its character and situation, well suited to inspire and cherish holy and devotional feelings in the breasts of men who had renounced the world, and dedicated themselves ever after to the service of religion. The interior of the building corresponds with its outward appearance. The chapel is of considerable size; but had, with the exception of a few good pictures, less of ornament than is generally met with in places of Roman Catholic worship. The library is a finely proportioned room, and was clean, ventilated, and free from damp when we visited it; and the shelves well furnished with books and manuscripts, which were kept clear of dust and cobwebs. Although all round is wild, naked, and sterile, the little valley in which San Martino lies embosomed, teems with fertility and luxuriance. Corn, wine, and oil, and fruits of every kind that the happiest climate of Europe can supply, were there in abundance, as if an Eden had been scooped out in the mountains, and like their brethren of Paraclete, the Benedictines had "opened another paradise in the wild."—Passages in the life of a Sailor.

PROTESTANTISM ;

ITS INCONSISTENCIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

But God is Faithful, for our preaching, which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT.

2 Ep. Cor. Cap. 1.

Having proved that in what is now familiarly called the Puseyite controversy, the Church of England Protestant, however sincere, cannot, even though blessed with the advantages of superior education, decide conclusively, with a certainty placed beyond every reasonable doubt, whether he should adhere to the Puseyite or Anti-Puseyite party, we proceed, first, to deduce from the position we have established, those consequences, which are legitimately to be inferred from the premises, and next to call attention to such other observations as the subject under consideration must naturally suggest.

If then it be true, and we think that we have shown it to be so satisfactorily, that no Church of England Protestant, whatever may be the advantages he may enjoy from education, can, in or by his principles, unerringly determine to what party, Puseyite or Anti-puseyite, he is bound to adhere, it follows that, on all the several grave questions at issue between the parties already designated, the most sincere and even the educated English Protestant can, at best, form only a mere human opinion, such as educated persons may adopt on questions of natural philosophy or politics. Every scholar knows that almost in every department of natural philosophy, those opinions which were once deemed, we might say unquestionable, have been abandoned recently for others of a very opposite character, so that in chemistry, for example, a man would be now laughed at, if he ventured to propound opinions, which, less than half a century since, were every where acquiesced in by the learned.

And is this to be the condition of the religion of Jesus Christ? Of Jesus Christ, of whom the Apostle proclaims, ‘that he is yesterday, to-day, and for ever. But if he be yesterday, to-day, and for ever always the same, ever unchangeable, ought not the religion, the revelation, which emanates from him, participate in his divine permanency and immutability? Ought not the fruit to be assimilated to the tree of which it is the produce, and ought not religion, which is pre-eminently the work of the right hand of the Most High, to pourtray conspicuously those glorious characteristics of the deity, viz unity, eternity and immutability?

In one of his Epistles, St. Paul declares, that he gave unceasing thanks to God, because that the faithful, whom he then addressed, received from him the word of the hearing of God, not as the word of men but (as it is indeed) the word of God.... The word then of the hearing of God, as the apostle designates the truths he preached, in order to be profitable to salvation, must be received, not as the word of men, but, as it is indeed, the word of God. That is to say, it must be received and recognised by the faithful, when announced by the lawful ministry who have been divinely constituted its depositaries, its Heralds and Interpreters, as a body of holy doctrines, which, exempt from all the fluctuations of human learning, and of all knowledge derived from man, is essentially one and the same, admitting neither addition nor diminution, inflexible and unchangeable in every country and clime, at the consummation of time, as well as the first foundation of the Christian Church. To introduce and perpetuate a unity and an immutability of doctrine, such as we here speak of, it is obvious, that there must exist a living speaking authority or tribunal, one divinely guaranteed against error, which shall be the supreme guardian, and also the orthodox expositor of revealed truth. For it would by no means suffice for the attainment of the grand object now under consideration, that the written or other records of revelation should be preserved in their integrity, unless, moreover, unerring means were provided, to convey to mankind the right understanding or interpretation of the doctrines they were called upon to believe and practise. Thus for the well-being of civil society it is not enough that recourse may be had to authentic records of those acts of the Legislature, by which the subjects of any realm may be bound. It is further necessary that a tribunal should exist, qualified to interpret the laws, and to decide any controversies to which these enactments may give occasion. The authority and prerogatives of such a tribunal must be proportioned to the end, to attain which the tribunal has been established. If that end be one of a merely temporal and transitory nature, one which may be accomplished by the external obedience of the subject, and which does not require an internal assent and fixed assent of the mind, then an authority such as that with which the parent is invested over his family may suffice. But if the end to be attained belong to a supernatural order, if it require that the mind should yield a firm unwavering belief, a belief wholly secure, not only from actual error, but even from any apprehension of the danger of error, in assenting to the doctrines proposed to be believed, and if, moreover, these doctrines be of an abstruse, impervious nature, so complex, so difficult, so transcendently surpassing the powers of the mind, that in their investigation, human learning and genius are of no avail, then, both to secure a rational, constant, firm assent to such sublime truths, and to be enabled to fix infallibly in every controversy which may arise upon them, the limits, where truth, if we may so speak, ends, and where error begins, no other authority than that of a tribunal divinely constituted for these great purposes, of such a tribunal as Catholics recognise in the true Church, can be adequate. Hence, in consequence of the want of such an authority, we find, that the history of all the Reformed Churches, without exception, contains numberless instances of departure from several points of doctrine, which, at their origin, they respectively professed, as well as numerous examples of angry and endless controversies on the doctrines they received. Hence, again, it happened, as was indeed unavoidable, that some of their adherents, disapproving of a departure from the principles of the first Reformers, and others, entertaining on the controversies which arose a different opinion from their brethren, new sects were formed, until, at length, it has become impossible to enumerate the divisions, and subdivisions, into which the conflicting creeds of Luther and Calvin, the parents of the Reformation, have been fractioned.

When writing to the Galatians, St. Paul exhibits the very different fruits which are produced by the flesh and by the spirit. Of the former he says, "Now the works of the flesh are manifest. . . . QUARRELS, DISSENSIONS, SECTS. . . . Of the which I foretel you, as I have foretold to you, that they who do such things shall not obtain the kingdom of God." We behold in these words the terrific denunciation of exclusion from eternal life, of everlasting reprobation held forth by an inspired Apostle, in order to deter Christians from perpetrating an evil, which is the every day offspring, the fatal perennial fruit of the Reformation. If the rule be good, "Judge of the Tree by its fruits," and Divine Wisdom declares that it is, what language can be strong enough to warn mankind, not to approach the deadly plant, from which such destructive fruits to Religion have so abundantly emanated? "But yet the Son of man, saith the Saviour, when he cometh, shall he find, think you, faith on earth?" Would not one suppose, that, when the Redeemer gave utterance to this awful interrogation, he contemplated with prophetic view the dreadful shock, which, after the lapse of fifteen centuries, Christianity was to sustain from the Volcano of the Reformation?—That he beheld, in the distance of ages, the audacious and turbulent licentiousness, which originating with two or three rebellious Monks who, stained with the guilt of sacrilege and broken vows, trampled on the holiest ordinances of religion, and, like the rebel Lucifer, not content with the treason they themselves had perpetrated, would not desist from the consummation of their impiety, until they had drawn after them a third part of the Heavenly Host, an immense proportion of the unsuspecting and once faithful children of the Catholic Church.

CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE AT CHANDERNAGORE.

On last Sunday, the Archbishop V. A. B. accompanied by Doctor McClelland visited the Orphanage at Chandernagore. The state of the Institution, we are happy to add, is most satisfactory, owing chiefly to the unremitting maternal care of the Nuns, and the zealous co-operation of the Rev. Mr. Boulogne, and of the Masters acting under his care. Although there are upwards of 100 children in the Orphanage, there is one only of them, an Infant, dangerously ill, all the others generally enjoying excellent health. The bread and milk supplied for breakfast and supper are quite as good as any parent would desire to have served up to his children; in effect they are not inferior to what are supplied in the best schools of Calcutta; and what will be moreover gratifying to the public to know, both bread and milk are plentifully served up, the quantity being regulated solely by a regard to what the health of the pupils requires. The dinner consists alternately of meat currie and of rice and dhall, all well dressed and supplied in abundance, according to the judicious standard just mentioned. To the male and female Orphanages spacious compounds are annexed, where in the morning and evening the children amuse themselves. In a short time, it is intended to arrange a safe and commodious enclosed bathing place, in a spot adjoining to the river, and in such a way, as that the baths will be constantly supplied with water from the Hooghly. Owing to the liberal supply of clothing sent to the Institutions lately by one or two Converts, the children are in this respect also very well provided for at present. They were all, particularly the girls, cleanly and even neatly dressed on the occasion we now refer to. We hope that the example of the pious Individuals, whose charity we have just alluded to, will incite others to imitate their generosity to the Orphans of our Community.

PROTESTANT TRADING MISSIONARIES.

The late discussions in some of our local journals respecting the engagement of Protestant Missionaries in Mercantile speculations, induce us to publish a few extracts from a Protestant work entitled a "Hand Book for Emigrants and others, being a History of New Zealand &c. by JOHN BRIGHT M. R. C. S. 1841." noticed in one of the late numbers of the London and Dublin Orthodox Journal brought by the last Mail. The author says that:—

"Abroad the (Protestant) missionaries are accused of having endeavoured to appropriate the native commerce with the natives. If so, they have unjustly interfered, and attended so much to secular pursuits, as to prevent their effecting all the good in their power. In confirmation of this, their accusers say that the chairman and others (of the Church Missionary Society) engage in commercial speculations, having, together with Mr. Clendon, the consul for America, a ship, the Tukyan, engaged in whaling, and they point to the immense territorial possessions of the society, comprising a great part of the north end of the island, and containing an immense acreage of Kowry timber, the most valuable production. And it is also noticed that a very large annual supply of very superior articles of trade are sent out to them, with the society's mark on the packages, which merchandise is expended on their own interests, without reference to those duties they were sent to perform."

It will be perceived from the above, that the zeal in the pursuit of wealth and the comforts of this world has, in a great measure, blotted out from the minds of these Missionaries the more important concerns to which they were morally pledged by their voluntary professional engagement. By connecting this with other similar doings here, lately brought to light, we may safely presume that this love of trade among the Protestant Missionaries is not confined to any one sect or class of Protestant Missionaries or to any particular country or clime, but that it has taken a wider range than could be possibly credited. In securing the interest of the American Consul, whose influence must necessarily be great in New Zealand, the Missionaries have shown themselves to be but too wise in their generation. It is however stated that

In the first place, their accusers do not sustain, out there, the most perfect characters; in the second, the ministers say, 'We are here for life, and our children have grown here; may we not provide for them? We are in the receipt of salaries, why may we not apply them to our advantage? We have done the best we can for the native, while we have done well for ourselves, and we should have done better for him but for the force of bad example, which you are too ready to show and to sanction: We are responsible for our trust on earth to the society's committee, and we render our accounts to them.'

Granting that those who accuse the Missionaries are not the most perfect characters, yet the latter do not venture to deny what they are accused of,—on the contrary, we find them defending their trafficking propensities on the ground that they have families to provide for. But another reason is assigned, which the society, who sent them forth for the conversion of the heathens, should well look into. They assert that they are on the receipt of salaries, which they are at liberty to apply to their own advantage. The inference is, that their receipts are more than their disbursements, including of course all the expences incurred on account of their wives and children. The question naturally arises,—whether these Missionaries are justified in laying out such surplus of their salaries, in trade,—not for the benefit of those whom they have gone to convert, as asserted by others in like circumstances,—but for their own benefit?—or whether it is not rather expected of them to appropriate such savings to the founding of some institutions for the spiritual well-being of their flock:—or, if this spirit of charity be wanting,—to the more worldly and personal, yet judicious, consideration of keeping them aside for the benefit, at an after period, of their widows and orphans? To involve the surplus of his salary in the precariousness of trade, the nature of which must necessarily create anxiety to a degree, that is apt very often to induce forgetfulness of the higher and more sacred duties to which he is pledged, can never be the part of a Missionary, whatever be the reasons adduced for its adoption.

The writer of the article in the Orthodox Journal in reviewing the work says that “the reply of the Missionaries to their accusers is as amusing (in ministers of religion) as it is abortive. It amounts to this: though we do profess to follow a Divine Master, who told us to take neither scrip nor purse for our use, we have thought it wise to take care of ourselves first, and make converts next. The burthen of a family to provide for is absolutely ludicrous in a man who sets forth to ‘convert the heathen;’ as well might soldiers and sailors take their families into battle, and nullify, by their anxiety for the safety of their babes and spouses, their utility as warriors. ‘Go it, pious men! Grasp 95,000 more acres’ of the best land of New Zealand, and we shall still less wonder at hearing that, though your disciples have ‘learnt of you to read and write,’ “it is doubtful whether piety has entered their souls.”

The next extract, shows the consequences of this commercial propensity in Missionaries:

“The Wesleyans also delegated ministers to labour among the heathens, and were settled down at Wangaroa, whence the outrages of the natives obliged them to flee. Their chief station is at Hokianga, and about that neighbourhood; the members are not many, although their ministrations are perfect. Some of them have given up their labours as missionaries, and taken to trade very extensively, doubtless an error in any one who has once officiated as a minister of the gospel, one of them engaging in large contracts for timber.”

The last extract we present by way of contrast to those that precede it:

“The Catholic mission is guided by a zealous and well-informed superintendent, under the title of Vicar Apostolic of the Islands of the Western Pacific, settled at Kororarika, where he performs mass. He has been very assiduous in his duties, and is very sanguine as to the result. With those Mowrees (natives) to whom he is known he seems popular. He is a native of France, M. Pompaliero; the natives call him the Pikypo, for what reason I know not;* he also employs a schooner and makes the circuit of the island. He has converted the oldest chief in the Bay of Islands, old Tarryha, his sons, and people, although previously attendants on the church mission. His reverence proceeds on one good principle, that of guarding the natives against selling all their land. He says he has not been sent to trade, that he is no buyer of land, unless to assist natives who have been reckless of future wants. Of the actual result of his efforts no opinion can, for some time, be pronounced. When I embarked to inspect a country on the east coast, I was surprised to meet, on joining my ship, Moka, Tarryha's son, with about thirty of his people, men, women, and children. During their passage, three times a-day, their discordant voices were raised together, chaunting the mass, or some service of the Catholic faith. Moka told me he was going to the eastward, to his wife's relatives, and was commissioned to introduce to the natives the news of the vicar's intended visit to them, to build him a chapel there, and practice the people in such part of the Ritual as his own party had learned.

“When they landed on the coast, every one had a good loading of guns and trade, and Master Moka had a store of guns and gunpowder, blankets, and other trade. They reached Opotekee, where they built a chapel, and the very children were humming over some portions of masses in their play. Twice a day the chapel was crowded, chorsing together, although perhaps not twelve of all of them had ever seen the vicar or his curés. The vicar paid them a visit soon after, and many members signed their names as of his flock. Moka sent eight fat hogs to him as a present, and paid him great attention.”

Of the several machines invented by man, we find in animals several beautiful specimens. Of the pulley in the troclearis muscle of the eye; of levers in the joints; of a syringe in the heart; of a pump in Picquet's receptacle; of the pneumatic machine or bellows in the lungs; of elastic springs in the cartilaginous rings of the trachea; which together with the larynx, form a most inimitable apparatus, constituting within so small a compass, a perfect wind and string musical instrument; of prisms and various optical apparatus in the eye; of a harp or harpsichord in the organ of hearing, which, besides a drum, contains an elegant series of bony strings of different and proportionate lengths, the vibrations of which are most probably in unison with the harmony of the fundamental base in music; of strainers and funnels in the kidneys; of suction and straining in the capillary mouths of the lac-teals; in the stomach we see Papin's digester, joined with chymical solvents or menstrua in the gastric, salivary, and pancreatic juices; in the circulation of the blood, a hydraulic ma-

* Probably a corruption of Episcopus, Latin for bishop.

All those various and complicated motions are carried on simultaneously, without any effort or uneasy sensation to the animal, and with a velocity truly astonishing. Of this we have several examples, as of the action of the tongue in speaking or reading, of the voice in singing, of the fingers in writing, in playing on musical instruments, and in many other occupations of art. The heart contracts four thousand times in one hour, and in that hour three hundred and fifty pounds of blood pass through it, that is, the whole mass of blood of the human body fourteen times. In Doctor Hunter's account of dissection of a whale, he says, "ten or fifteen gallons of blood are thrown out of the heart at a stroke; and the water roaring in its passage through the main pipe of the water-works at London bridge, is inferior in impetus and velocity, to the blood gushing through the heart of this animal. The whole idea fills the mind with wonder." (Paley)

No man who has paid ever so little attention to muscular motion can, without terror and astonishment, observe the amazing velocity with which the muscles, ministering to locomotion act in the hare, the greyhound, or the race-horse could he believe, that whilst the trunk is whirled through the air with this almost incredible rapidity, the multiform functions of the interior organs could be at the same time carried on without confusion or disorder? and yet we know the fact to be so, inasmuch as the momentary interruption of any of these functions, would throw the whole into derangement, and cause the immediate death of the animal.

"The bodies of animals hold in their constitution and properties, a close and important relation to natures, altogether external to their own: to inanimate substances and to the specific qualities of these: e. g. they hold a strict relation to the ELEMENTS by which they are surrounded." (Paley.)

This relation is particularly evident in the organs of sense. The lungs would be useless without the air, which is indispensable, not only for dilating the air vesicles of that organ, but also for communicating, in the act of inspiration, a portion of vital, and for taking away in expiration another of noxious air, both necessary to the life of the animal.

The sense of hearing, and the charms of sound, eloquence, conversation, and music, would be lost, were not the vibrations of elastic bodies, conveyed by another elastic medium, the air, to the organ: so of smell, to which the same fluid is indispensable. Whatever other purposes light may answer, as a constituent principle of bodies, its principal use with respect to animals, is that of exciting the sensation of vision; this sense, of all others, is probably the most delightful. All nature, all the works of God, all the beauties of creation, would be lost to man, without this singular, this enchanting fluid: the outlines of all bodies wrapped in impenetrable night, would be perceptible only to the touch; gloom, darkness and misery, would be the portion of all sensitive beings: but when the Creator said, "let light be," the symmetry, the majesty, the splendor of the whole shone forth in all their dazzling lustre: "the tints of flowers, the plumage of birds, the bright scales of fishes, the painted wings of butterflies, the spotted lustre of insects," the rich colouring of the landscape, and all the glory of the celestial vault.

Could any other proof be required of relative plan, of design, of intelligence? The element of light is quite distinct from, and should seem to have no necessary connexion with the humours of the eye, and yet the light would have been useless to man without these humours, as the humours would be without the light: that wonderful machine, the eye, is perfectly formed, long before it is destined to see the light, and when they meet, they are as well acquainted, as if exclusively made for each other. This observation is equally true with respect to all the other senses. Why the aqueous humour, so universal in terrestrial animals, is wanting in aquatics, can any other reason be given, but that to the latter, living in a fluid of the same density, and consequently of the same power of refraction, that humour would have been superfluous?

The succession of animal life, so miraculously provided for by generation, is such a striking proof of creative power, as must for ever confound the atheist (if such a being exist without derangement of reason). In the majestic oak, the pride and ornament of the forest, the philosopher sees no more than the expansion of a small seed, in which the tree is supposed to have existed in miniature: when he sees a chicken force its way through a shell, he must wonder; but to bring his wonder to its ultimate climax, he must contemplate a sensitive and rational being, produced from a drop of transparent fluid. It surpasses his comprehension to know where the exact point of organization begins; but he must confess, from all the laws of sound reasoning, that the existence of such a wonderful creature as man, from such circumstances is a greater miracle than the creation of a thousand material worlds. This miraculous creation is ever before his eyes; let him then wonder, contemplate, and adore.

Mechanism, thus far, we have made subservient to our purpose of proving the existence of God. What remains for our further consideration, as appertaining to man, being more of a metaphysical than a mechanical character, must be compressed within a small compass.

MADRAS.—Rev. Mr. Egan at Secunderabad in the Madras Vicariate has lately baptized, after due instruction, a Brahmin distinguished for great proficiency in the Oriental languages. The Convert evinces very good dispositions and great zeal to devote his talents to the conversion of his countrymen.

HUSSEENABAD.—Rev. Mr. Freysinous states that in the Mission at Hussenabad he has lately baptized two Mussulmen, and also one Infant of the same persuasion, who was in a dying state. He adds that a Mussulman family of his Mission showed a great desire to be allowed to pay their devotions in the Catholic Church there, and that when permitted to do so, they brought to it some humble gifts in testimony of their reverence and gratitude.

THE KING AND QUEEN OF BELGIUM.

The Englishman of the 31st ult. copies from the Britannia an account of a grand Procession at Brussels, at which the King and Queen attended, in order to present a rich massive crown of Gold, designed to adorn, on certain Festivals, the statue of the Blessed Virgin, in the Cathedral of that city. The Editor of the Britannia, exulting in imaginary triumph over the follies of Popery, asks, of what services could the proceeding now mentioned be to any one, to the Holy Virgin herself, to the King or Queen, to the Archbishop who officiated, or, in fine, as we have said, to any one, either in this world or the next. It is really too bad, it is degrading to the Press of a Christian country, that an Editor should estimate by so gross a standard as that assumed in the remarks just quoted, the value or importance of any act of religious veneration or devotion. It will be consoling, no doubt to the Editor of the Britannia to learn, that in Protestant England, instances may be found, when the standard by which he would appreciate religious observances or offerings has been applied most successfully, in the estimate of the gross and carnal persons who employed it, against even the use of prayer and the frequentation of Church on Sundays. "Why do you not," (we state a fact) said an Irish Catholic to his English Protestant friend, "sometimes, at least, say a prayer, or go to some place of worship on Sundays and not live as a heathen?" "Fudge," replied the Protestant, "I eat, I drink; I sleep, I get on in the world as well as those Church going people; that these sort of bother serves to no purpose." A few months since, when the statue of Sir T. Munro was erected at Madras, the instant it was elevated and fixed in the position it was destined to occupy, a grand salute was fired from the ramparts of Fort St. George, and the Noble Governor, together with the assembled heads of Civil and Military society in that presidency, joined in the public demonstrations of honor paid to the emblem of departed worth. The London papers are frequently filled with commendations of those public spirited individuals or corporations, who display liberality and zeal, in the erection of Statues to the great men who have done honor in the field, or the senate, to their country. The anniversaries of their renowned achievements are celebrated with a pomp, and festive luxury, on which thousands of pounds are expended, and all this is deemed a just subject of admiration and praise, because the nation thus evinces its gratitude for the services rendered to the empire, and because a powerful incentive is supplied to others, to emulate the splendid career of the heroes, whose memory is honoured. If gratitude for benefits received, if zeal to incite the rising youth to deeds of fame be dictated by love of country and by reason, shall these noble feelings be paralyzed, only when there is question of the immortal concerns of religion? Shall we, at the festive board, and by the erection and decoration of statues and columns, honor the senator and the warrior, and yet show ourselves cold and indifferent, when there is question of honouring the most exalted of God's creatures, her whom an Archangel saluted as "full of grace," and in reference to whom the Holy Mother of the Baptist exclaimed with astonishment "Who am I that the Mother of my Lord should come to see me?" Alas! how true is it that the children of this world, are often wiser in their generation than the children of light!

LETTER No. IV.

MY DEAR FRIENDS.—The Catholic Church! What does not the term 'Catholic' comprise within it? every thing; it is the Christian's test, his title deed; it is a crucible in which we can easily detect the pure gold from the baser metals, Truth from error.—Unity from division—Peace from strife—Holiness from impiety, and finally the Church of Christ from what is spurious. It is under the shield of this sacred name that the Christian Missionary will enter uncivilized and heathen nations unasked and against the will of powerful Potentates, because he derives his decree from the King of Kings, "Go, and preach to all nations,"—he may suffer death, but he dies rejoicing in the glorious Christian appellation of 'Catholic.' This Palladium then of Christianity includes within it all the marks of the true Church, for the Protestant is as keenly alive to its importance as the Roman Catholic himself; he knows well that unless he can show his right, his title, his Christianity is chimerical indeed. Let us therefore, my dear friends, analyze the term 'Catholic,' and try its applicability to our respective Churches, and whichever stands this ordeal, we may rest assured it alone wears the true mantle of Christ, it alone is the true and only Catholic Church, "out of which there is (you as well as Catholics affirm) no ordinary possibility of Salvation." In its enlarged and theological sense 'Catholic' is defined to mean Universal as to time, doctrine and place, and it has also connected, with it visibility, perpetuity &c. While then I endeavour to confine the bearing of this touch-stone to your Church, I shall also apply it to ours; Let us first then take time as regards the Protestant Churches, this may be soon disposed of—it is brief. You cannot go, back for any one branch of your present Protestant religion beyond the year 1500, Luther Calvin's era, unless indeed, as I have seen and some Protestants do when hard pressed as to time, you fall back to the Albigenses of Languedoc of the 12th century, or the Lollards of England of about the same age, for your origin of religious existence: take them; you may reckon them, if you like, as the germ of your different Churches; this however must be said, that if Protestantism cannot revert back beyond that period, it can at least boast of what the Church of Christ cannot, that of its progressing forward in the framing of New Creeds, as if it were to keep pace with the times, or to fill up the places of those sects which have died the death of everything human; for instance, the age of 1500 produced Lutheranism and Calvinism; that of 1600 Quakerism and Arminianism, that of 1700 Methodism, and Swedenborgianism, that of 1800 Irwinism and Socialism, with scores of other Isms besides, and 1900 is before us. Protestantism may be said then to be indefinite as to time, being always under an unceasing process of incubation and reformation, never complete or perfect, but continually labouring to bring forth sect after sect; if, as a case, you take Quakerism, you must allow it had no existence until about the year 1650, you date therefore its birth from that period, and you call its earthly parent 'George Fox;' take again our own age, the 19th century, and you note the date of the Irwinites, Rowists, Socialists, Latter-Day Saints &c. from the year on which they were struck off the anvil of the reformation; some of the Founders are still living. Well, condemn them as fanatics, as innovators, as coming too late into the field, and they will with the same rule knock you on the head, for if you be a Lutheran, a Calvinist, a Church of England man, a Unitarian &c., they and we know well who got up each opposite creed, and in what year it was produced. Not one, then, of your present denominations can pass this line of demarcation, the year 1500; you had not then seen the dawn, and you are not yet full born, for more are in the same prolific womb. This therefore is the Catholicity or Universality of Protestantism as to time; in its oldest branches it does not exceed quite 400 years, and in its youngest shoots not 10 years; you ask me for proof, and I offer you incontrovertible History, and facts occurring before your very eyes: England is inundated with opposite religious Creeds, and Protestant Germany is sickening into infidelity and rationalism, you may remember Luthers own memorable and boastful saying, that "at one time he stood alone against all Christendom," or as your Bishop Tillotson describes it, "In the beginning of the reformation, when Popery had over-run the western world, Luther arose, and for a long time stood alone:" again in one of your Standard works, "The poor man's preservative against Popery," you may read therein that, "About three hundred years ago, the people of England were all Papists." Is not this enough, without troubling you with more authorities, to convince you that your Catholicity as to time does not yet reach 400 years,—Pause! my friends, and draw your inferences. But as to the Church of Rome, view her in one unbroken line, not standing alone as one individual, but consisting of millions of beings; trace her from the 19th century to the 1st from the year of Christ to the year 1843, and you will find her genealogical or Apostolical tree in history; like a mighty stream proceeding from one deep and exhaustless fountain, and continuing in its course age after age, without any visible change; so has the Church of Rome come down the current of time, not like those petty reservoirs of water—those partial sects of all ages—which are accidentally or artificially formed, and then break their boundaries, till they are lost in the aridness of the desert and disappear. Yes, you will find that the Missionaries, the Doctors the Bishops, and the Popes of the Church of Rome have succeeded each other in the ministry of the Gospel age after age; they come and they go like the leaves of an ever Green-Tree, the mellow leaves in due course imperceptibly fall off one by one, and young buds instantly spring up in their places, till they in their turn ripen and drop off to be followed by others; thus the succession is ever kept up, the nature of the tree is never modified, it is always fresh and green. The Bishop of London indeed in his last 'Charge' is forced to acknowledge that the Church of Rome, "in her doctrines and practices is unchanged, unmitigated, and unqualified,"—truly were she otherwise she could not rightly claim to be 'the Catholic Church,'—study again, my friends, the History of the ancient kings of Europe, of France, of Spain, of England, Ireland, and Scotland, read of the acts of a Charlemagne, of a St. Louis, of our Edwards, of our Alfred the Great, great because he was good—good because he was a true disciple of the Christian Church, so good was he and his people, that it is a nursery tale, a true story, that bracelets of gold could be hung up on the high way and they would not be touched; who converted these to Christianity, who introduced them to such strict morality, Protestant Ministers? Ah! my friends, Luther was the first parson! Now look at the mouldering ruins of the magnificent temples, Monasteries &c. around you, and which the Alfreds, the Edgars, the Albans &c. of once Catholic England founded; the ashes of the noble founders repose under the fallen walls of their own temples, but their memory lives; they left us these sacred relics—these immovable 'land marks'—these unquestionable traditions that the ancient Christian Faith of England once was Catholics; then after this, imagine, that you view some of the great Apostles of the Christian Church land in the respective countries chosen for their field of labours; contemplate as nearest to St. Xavier tracing the footsteps of St. Thomas, follow him in imagination in his progress through India, until he penetrates the confines of China. Behold at a distance St. Augustine with his 40 Monks landing in England, see St. Patrick kneeling on the shores of Ireland, mark St. Palladius walking through the wilds of Scotland, and who, think you, sent them upon the embassy of Christ? Who, but the Popes or Bishops of Rome. Where—where was then the religion of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Assembly of Scotland—of the Jumpers and Shakers of Wales? History tells us no where, but that they appeared about 1000 years after Great Britain and Ireland received the Faith of Christ.—But, advance with me, my friends, a few steps further into the preceding ages, and there you will meet with the names of such holy men, Doctors and Popes, as St. Athanasius, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose &c. and Popes Marcellus, Eusebius, Silvester &c. in the 4th century; St. Clement, St. Cyprian, St. Gregory, and Popes Calixtus, Urban, Fabian &c. of the 3d century; St. Irenæus, St. Justin &c. and Popes, Anacletus, Alexander I. Pius II. Victor II. &c. in the 2d century: and now I beg leave to introduce you through the Popes, or Bishops of Rome, St. Clement, St. Cletus, St. Linus, to the Chair of St. Peter, to the Chief of the Apostles; yes, in this short chain, you may discover the connexion, the unity, the link of one faith between St. Peter the Apostle, and our present good, holy, venerable Pope, Gregory XVI. You have only to refer to Church History for their names. This is then the Catholicity of the Church of Rome as to time. Reflect here upon the prophesy of Isaiah, "my spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever." C. LIX. 21. Tell me to whom is it most applicable, to the Protestant Churches of some 300 years growth, or to the Roman Catholic Church traceable to the age of the Apostles? I cannot help here adding the authority of one of your living Judges, Lord Cuninghame, given in his note to his Interlocutor, in the Court of Session, Edinburgh November 1842, in the case of non-intrusionism; the affirmation made on that occasion is that of a fearless, unbiassed, and upright Judge in his administration of justice, and derived from unquestionable facts recorded in history; this talented lawyer says, "It was by Act of Parliament that a change from the ancient Catholic Faith to the Protestant Creed was authorized; by the same authority the confessions of the New Faith from time to time, were sanctioned and enforced"!! I shall reserve for the subject of my next letter 'Catholicity' as to place.

PUSEYISM.

We have always had much difficulty in estimating the niceness of Puseyism as respects its approximation to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. The shadowy doctrinal differences which mark the boundary between the two are, when handled by extreme Puseyites, so very faint that they will fail to perceive in what manner the new schismatics can be taken as other than a class of modified Roman Catholics. The High Church party of England have recently disowned the Puseyite doctrine in no measured terms, and this after having, through their organ the Quarterly Review, shown a decided inclination towards its tenets. But the Catholics do not appear to admit of this retraction, and use the plainest language when speaking of the intimate relation which they alledge to exist between the new doctrine, and that of the old unreformed Church. A London paper of the 17th June informs us that "the Rev. George Talbot, formerly of Baliol College, has resigned the living of Everech-cum-Chesterdale, and joined the church Rome," he being the fifth divine of Oxford who has turned Romanist since the conversion of the Rev. H. W. Sibthorpe. In another column of same journal (Bell's Messenger), we have singular corroboration of our impression as to the directly Romanish tendency of Puseyism, in the following extract from a speech delivered by Lord Camoys at a meeting of the Catholic Institute, held on the 13th June:—

"Look at the controversy now going on in the established church, especially at Oxford. There was one Regius Professor (Dr. Pusey) just condemned and suspended for having advocated the doctrine of the real presence in the Eucharist; whilst another Regius Professor of the same university (Dr. Hampden) had been subjected to an action for damages for his maintenance of an entirely opposite doctrine. Now, if the action were to terminate against Dr. Hampden, he thought that the University of Oxford would be in what the Americans were accustomed to call a fix! He had heard at one of the meetings of that Institute a hope expressed that they (the Roman Catholics) might live to see the day when high mass would be celebrated in Westminster Abbey. He knew not how probably such an event might be, but this they knew, that the doctrine of the mass had been preached in the cathedral of the University of Oxford (loud cheering); and it had been authoritatively declared; that if Dr. Pusey's sermon had not been condemned, six or seven colleges of Oxford University were ready to have mass said directly (tremendous cheering and applause). There was indeed a very slender barrier between Puseyism and the Church of Rome; and, oh! what a field was now presented for the Roman Catholics to demolish that slender barrier at once, and to restore this great country to that Catholic union which was exceedingly desirable. (vociferous cheering)!"

Here we have professed Romanists claiming direct connection with the new doctrine of Puseyism, and declaring that there existed hardly a barrier between the one creed, and the other! But at the same meeting, still stronger language was used, the speaker being a Rev. Mr. O'Neal. He said that—"He would tell them for a fact, that one of those Oxford divines of the new school, speaking to a Roman Catholic clergyman the other day, who reproached him for his sluggishness in not at once boldly joining the church of Rome, to which he was already very favourably disposed, told him (the Catholic priest) that he already believed in the doctrines of the real presence, the absolution by priests, the invocation of saints, purgatory, and every other point of the Catholic doctrine; but that he (the Oxford divine) believed the time for joining the church of Rome was not yet arrived, but that he hoped it soon would. (tremendous cheering)"

These are most singular assertions, and, to be so boldly made, must have had some considerable ground of solid conviction on the part of the speakers before they could have been so openly ventured on. On such a view as the above, what is Puseyism?—a mere re-approximation to Romanish doctrines, and we believe it to be no other. The nice distinctions which enable its professors to declare themselves Protestants, while they adopt a ceremonial of prayer, and a careful observance of particular days peculiar to that form of Christianity which they approach without adopting, we cannot in our quality of men of common sense, presume to comprehend. The great landmarks of the two creeds are distinctly pronounced: whosoever passes either of them adheres less to that he leaves, and more to the one he approaches, although in ever so small a degree; and thus he is less a Protestant, and more a Catholic, or vice versa, according to the degree of his abandonment of the one, or of his approximation to the other. As in cases of the general unsettlement of old opinions, isolated instances have an extreme value to him who sits by, and watches dispassionately the progress of events; so does this recent conversion of five protestants (Puseyite) members of the university of Oxford to the Church of Rome confirm us strongly in our view as to the tendency of the new doctrine, for we have no evidence that on the other hand the new doctrine has been productive of conversions the other way. Now if it be, although dissident from the Protestantism of the Church of England, still essentially Protestant, then its professors should evince no leaning to the church of Rome, but if, as facts show us such be not the case, but the contrary—what then?

We do not think that more comment is required upon so plain a question. It is a public one, and of high interest to many, or else we should have gladly avoided touching upon it. As to the merits of the controversial points at issue between the new creed, and the old,—or rather we should say—between the revived spirit of an old creed, and its intermediate modification, we do not attempt to pronounce. It is a subject from which personally we stand aloof, and which we deem improper to be treated of at any length in a lay paper. But as in England Church goes with State, and as many look to the stability of the one as involved in the integrity of the other, it is right to point towards the progressional effect of an opinion, which may on the above suppositions influence changes far graver, in a worldly point of view, than those of mere doctrinal heresies, mere secessions to, or secessions from, this or that orthodox form of consistent belief.

Puseyism is said, as a doctrine, to be dying out: what is called Puseyism we believe to be extensively taking root among a large body of English professing Protestants.—Calcutta Star, August 30.

POSTSCRIPT OF A LETTER FROM THE HON. AND REV. W. CLIFFORD, TO THE RIGHT REV. DOCTOR FENNELLY.

(Madras Catholic Expositor, August, 1843.

Oh, My Lord, little did I think that one day past would make such a difference in our mission!! my letter was forgotten yesterday and we missed the post—To-day I have to add news the most afflicting which could befall our mission!! it has lost its apostle—him whom it will ever regard and revere as such, and as its founder and hitherto on earth, and now I trust in Heaven, its support and protector. A strange disease, and apparently but little known to the medical attendants, has taken from us our beloved and reverend and estimable Superior F. Garnier. The complaint of which he died was a swelling of the face and head, which had succeeded dysentery, and which caused delirium and loss of speech, and seems to have been little known to any of the faculty, Native or European. He had long been broken in health, but his spirits nothing could break—his zeal could not proportion itself to the exhausted state of his body, worn out by exertions beyond his strength during the course of the five years he has been in India. I can safely say his zeal knew no bounds but the wants of this mission, and as they are greater than what any man alone, were he a Xavier, can supply, his zeal and exertions, and the privations and hardships he submitted to, and the enterprises he undertook, were far beyond his strength; and so have hurried to, alas, but too premature a grave, and have deprived us of one whose virtues and amiable and estimable qualities had endeared him to us beyond expression. Never have I shed tears over the grave of a departed friend with more heartfelt warmth and sorrow, and few there are in this world whose loss to me can be felt so irreparably.—He was the slave of the Indians—for his dear people he toiled from morning till night, he knew no happiness but to make them happy—no sacrifice for them of his time or comfort or health or repose was too great for him to make, could he only promote their temporal and eternal happiness!! He has died a martyr to his zeal actually on his circuit to direct and advise his fellow ministers and visit their flocks, and when he left us and before, he had long felt that his bodily strength and vigour were gone, but his courage and zeal made him imagine he had still the strength he had not! I can assure your Lordship that I am slow enough to praise, and it must be signal virtue indeed that shall gain applause from me, but I confess that a more true copy of St. F. Xavier I never knew!! He was his great patron and model, and I trust is now with him in Heaven. As a friend and a man I admired and loved him and feel his loss beyond expression!! God in his mercy rest his soul, and some other apostle among us to supply his loss. Our dear Father was born at Dole, of highly respectable parents, 12th February, 1805; entered our Society in 1825, and came over with F. F. Bertrand to India, the Duranquet and Martin who died in 1839 first Jesuit Missionaries since the suppression, in 1837, he calmly breathed his last in osculo Domini at Madura at 1h. 8m. p. m. the 5th inst.

Recommending his soul and myself to your Lordship's prayers and holy S. S.

I have the honour to be,
Your Lordship's humble servant,
WALTER CLIFFORD.

FRENCH MISSIONARIES.

The French Ship Le Laborieux, which anchored in the Madras roads on the 4th ult. and remained a fortnight to dispose of a part of her cargo, sailed for Singapore on the 19th, with six missionary priests, from the seminary of the foreign missions at Paris, on board, viz., Rev. Messrs. Favre and Martin, who are appointed to conduct the Chinese College at Penang.—Rev. Messrs. Sohler and Degoust, who are destined for Cochin China,—the Rev. Mr. Journet for Siam—and the Rev. Mr. Venaunt, who will be informed at Macao on what mission he is to serve.

These zealous missionaries, while the Laborieux remained in the roads, resided at the Catholic Cathedral, and offered up the Holy Sacrifice of the mass every day. Their unaffected piety and simplicity of manners endeared them very much to our bishop and his clergy, as well as several others in Madras who came to see them. They were themselves no less edified by the examples of piety and Christian fervour, which they saw in Madras,—a crowded Church on Sundays at both masses and at vespers,—a large congregation every evening during the novena of our Lady of Mount Carmel, and nearly one hundred communicants on her festival day. They were also struck with the order and decorum of the congregation. The Bishop observed with a smile, that no one disturbs the order of the Church except a few French Huguenots. On the morning of their departure, they made presents of little pious prints to the bishop, priests and students of the seminary, to mark their gratitude for the kindness and attention shown them during their short stay. The Le Laborieux brought two other missionaries as far as Pondicherry, where she arrived on the 8th of June, and remained nearly a month before she proceeded to Madras. Six other French Missionaries are on their way to China—two of these, viz. Rev. Messrs. Titand and Forcet, are coming per French Frigate Cleopatra, which is to call at Pondicherry. We wish she may call also at Madras.—Madras Catholic Expositor.

IRELAND AND REPEAL.

We never felt less inclination than we do at the present moment to write one single line of what can reasonably be called bluster or rhodomontade about the condition of Ireland, and the popular feeling with regard to Repeal. We consider the whole subject as possessing an importance which it is not easy to overrate, and we wish to draw the attention of our English readers to a plain and unvarnished statement of facts. We are not going to use any heated declamation, for we believe that there never was a question which required to be approached and judged by a cooler and more deliberate judgment. We are willing to take the facts of the case at the very lowest; and to the facts so taken we wish our readers to give their best, their most attentive, and most impartial consideration.

We set out, then, with expressing our own personal conviction and belief, that unless some unexpected and unforeseen accident comes across the scene, to change the current of affairs, there will, within a moderate space of time, be either Repeal or Civil War. As we are naturally anxious to make our opinion worth as much as we can, we have neither formed this belief suddenly, nor do we express it without full deliberation. If, then, our opinion has any weight with any considerable section of our English readers, we beg most respectfully to offer them our fixed, deliberate, and unimpassioned opinion, that in the natural course of things there must be either Repeal or Civil War within a moderate space of time; and of the two we very much incline to the belief that Repeal is the more probable. If there is any ground for entertaining such an opinion, it is of inexpressible importance to understand well and clearly beforehand what it is we have to front. We wish, then, our English readers quietly to lay aside the notion that Repeal is a mere word made use of every Monday in Dublin, in connexion with certain periodical receipts of money; and endeavour to form some conception, that it is not a word, but a thing. We wish them not to be taken by surprise; but to bring it home to themselves as a fact—indisputable as the rising of the sun—that most certainly three years, most probably one year, very possibly three months—will witness a very marked, material, and fundamental change in the relations between England and Ireland. Repeal or Civil War. It is of no use to lament or wring our hands about it. The only point of real moment is to ascertain whether this alternative be a fact, and if so, then to deal with the fact like men. For our parts we believe the alternative to be almost inevitable:—Repeal, if the Irish people are commonly wise and prudent—Civil War, if they are rash, foolish, and intemperate. Neither of these alternatives is exactly to our taste; but of the two we need hardly say that we very much prefer Repeal.

Our opinion (such as it is) on the expediency of Repeal, if by any fair and moderate line of conduct it could be avoided, is on record. That opinion we have not changed in the slightest degree. Speaking of this country as we always feel, as of an immense Empire, or aggregate of Kingdoms, States, and Colonies, in the well-being of every part of which we take equal interest, in proportion to its importance, and to the firm cohesion of which we attach almost measureless value—we regard the Repeal of the Union as a great blow, not to England merely, but to the Empire—second only to that which it received in the achievement of American Independence. Entertaining this feeling, we wish the blow to be made as little dangerous as calm forethought can render it. Against enforcing the Union upon an unwilling nation by the means of civil war, we, with Lord Althorp, are set firmly and unhesitatingly. Of all conceivable political measures, that of a civil war to subject Ireland to our unjust legislation would be the most certain to ensure the dissolution of the Empire. The other alternative—Repeal—may be brought about in two ways—well or ill; with forethought or without forethought; with securities and statesmanlike providence, or in a wild, bungling, and insane manner. Of these two we again need hardly say that we prefer the former; that we prefer taking time by the forelock, and, by seasonable arrangements of circumstances, adapting ourselves to the Inevitable.

We have no great fancy for tracing out in our own imaginations a supposed current of events predetermined by destiny, and then settling down into the belief that with destiny it is useless to struggle. This is ordinarily the resource—or no-resource rather—of fools, sluggards, and cowards. Wise men, brave men, and energetic men set themselves against what the former class style the decrees of destiny, and make a destiny for themselves by turning the course of events into new and unexpected channels. On the other hand, it is quite lawful for those who are rather spectators of events than actors in them, who have no conceivable influence on the adoption of the public measures in question, and who are doomed to witness the entire rejection of the counsels they would have advised, to mark down—not for the purpose of discouragement, but of preparation—the turnings and windings of the stream, and to proclaim aloud, for the information of all concerned, the bearing and direction of the current. In this question of Repeal, if we had any influence on the public councils, we would, most assuredly, not speak the language we are now using.

On the contrary, desiring as we do to avert Repeal, we would with all our heart and soul apply ourselves to this object, and strive to ward off a public calamity by doing inflexible and unsparing justice, by using every power of the Crown and every function of the Legislature to crush and render impotent the misdoers, and in this way we would seek to change the current, not ignominiously to swim with it. We believe it is yet time to do this. We believe the Imperial Legislature, by an honest government of Ireland, might abate Repeal for ever. We feel certain, however, that no such effort will be made, and we therefore take leave to point out what we reverently conceive to be the finger of God manifested in the recent extraordinary concurrence of events. Never surely in so short a time did so mighty a movement as the present Repeal movement spring up, grow, and wax great.

It was at the beginning of this year that Mr. O'Connell, hoping against hope, amidst universal laughter or smiles of derision, announced that this was to be "the Repeal year." The cause seemed then to be languid enough. From January 1 to May 1 are just four months. Where is this languishing cause now? It is hardly too much to say that it is almost triumphant. Four months have elapsed since Mr O'Connell was jeered at as a quack who was cheating the people with a nostrum, the practicability of which he did not himself believe. Who dares to say so now? He has made it practicable. He has removed the grand impediments to its triumph—inertness and unbelief. He has been helped on by a few very favourable incidents:—and where have all these brought us?

We will a second time take a test which all Englishmen understand—we mean the money paid for Repeal. Three weeks ago we showed how the repeal rent had risen within a few months, from 24*l.* a week, 84*l.*, 142*l.*, to 473*l.* Since then it has taken another start. Last Monday we find the rent *nearly seven hundred pounds—683*l.* 9*s.* 2½*d.—or at the rate of between thirty and forty thousand pounds a year. But we are not looking at this sum in the gross. What we are concerned with, is not the gross sum of £35,000, but the difference between £35,000 and £5,000, which was the amount of last year's rent. Taking a very moderate estimate we may say that, within the last four months, the enthusiasm, zeal, energy, and determination of the Irish people to carry Repeal have been multiplied seven-fold—that the active Repealers of Ireland have been multiplied seven fold. Now, we tell our English readers that the latent and inactive Repealers of Ireland are a most important body in every sense of the word. Speaking of them in the lump, we may say that they include the main bulk of those Irishmen who are not active Repealers. For the truth is, that while individual Englishmen are loved and welcomed in Ireland, England is hated and abhorred; and the bulk of Irishmen have been deterred from being Repealers by the belief that Repeal will not succeed. This vis inertiae—this despair of the future—this strongest prop of the Union—is now abolished. There are few men now, who, judging by the mighty stride that has been made in so short a time, are not in a capacity to see that perseverance in the same efforts will bring on a still more signal success. The inert and desponding millions are roused. They are flocking everywhere in Leinster, Munster, ay, and even in Ulster, at Mr. O'Connell's heels, in thousands and hundreds of thousands. If Almighty God gives Mr. O'Connell health and strength, he will see a Parliament in College-green.

But let us take a hasty glance at some other points in this great case. There are two matters connected with the Orangemen of Ireland which have been helping this agitation forward not a little. The one is the discontent of a large section of them openly expressed against the Government, who by their organ, the Mail, are clamouring for a national Irish party. The other is the rabid malignity of the rabble of that party—through which one murder of a Repealer has already been committed in Ulster, at Clones—and which, speaking through the Evening Packet, the organ of the Government section of the Orangemen, already threatens Mr. O'Connell with assassination; and in the columns of the Cork Constitution expresses its pious regrets that the Catholic clergy are not massacred. We put both these passages on record for the peculiar edification of our readers. These are the words of the Evening Packet:

"We tell Mr. Daniel O'Connell, in a pathetic spirit, that if he shall live much longer by Repeal, he will die by Repeal. The shoemaker's blood has been the first sacrifice on the altar of Repeal, but who shall say it will be the last. If Daniel O'Connell shall fall in the inglorious agitation, his survivors will have the satisfaction of reading on his tomb, 'He died a Repealer.' To this complexion it must come at last!'

These of the Cork Constitution:—

"There has been blood in the north; the pity is that it has not been taken from less vulgar veins. It is the incendiary instigators—the reverend Repealers that ought to suffer."

These expressions, and the general tone of swaggering Orange ferocity which the Repeal agitation has roused up into fresh vigour, are having the effect—now that the Repeal spirit is fairly roused—of stimulating still more, if possible, the energy and resolution of the Repealers.

Another topic which is co-operating most extensively with Repeal is the Poor Law. The old law was bad; and, though not yet old in years, it has become decrepit and palsied in every limb. Every-where resistance to it is spreading, is becoming more and more successful, and the enforcement of it is becoming less vigorous and hearty. It is hated, and most justly hated, as one of the vilest, basest, and most unchristian laws—in fact if not in intention—that ever was enacted. It was enacted we believe—and it is one of the few laws that has been enacted—with a sincere wish to do justice to Ireland. And this solerism in English legislation is pointed at by its victims and those who loathe it, and they say one to another—"See here how England legislates for us when she wishes to do us good. We hardly know which we should most curse her for, 'her benefits or her injuries.'" The nature of the existing law has brought about—among Orangemen almost as much as among Liberals—this state of feeling; and just when this feeling is at its height, out comes the amended law—the Poor Law Amendment Bill—the fruit of all the deep meditation of the Tory councils. Of this we may surely conceive some good hope? We take it up, and we find that, while the principle of workhouse relief remains unaltered, the management of the law is to be rendered still more unpopular than ever. The Boards of Guardians are, at the present time, composed of one-third official and two-thirds elective guardians. Lord Eliot—or those who rule Lord Eliot—have thought to sweeten the unpopularity of the measure by increasing the number of official guardians to one-half. Is it possible for madness to go further than this? The poor-law is the right-hand of the Repeal agitation, and this new bill is a two-edged sword in Mr. O'Connell's not wholly powerless fingers. "The new poor-law" says Mr. O'Connell, "is too verbose. It might have been made much shorter by comprising it in two sentences—thus—'Be it enacted, that the poor-law commissioners 'shall have unbounded dominion over the rich 'and poor of the land,' and to this sentence 'there should have been appended a second clause, 'containing the requisite proviso to the following 'purport—' Provided always, and be it enacted, 'that they shall invariably exercise that dominion 'in the most insulting manner.' If this bill," said Mr. O'Connell, "becomes the law of the land, 'I will let my property be distrained, but never again will I voluntarily pay one penny of the 'poor-rate.' Of a truth, this amended law is doomed before its birth."

Another circumstance is the foolish notice by Mr. Lane Fox, for the suppression of the Repeal Agitation, and for the call of the House of Commons on the 11th of May. This, like most of the other things that Mr. O'Connell has recently had to contend with, is rather to be looked on as a means of keeping up the excitement of a contest, and drilling his troops for the more serious battle that lies before them. We need no ghost to tell us—we hardly need Mr. O'Connell's assurance—that he will not obey the call on the 11th of May. Mr. Lane Fox is just one of that class of persons whom Providence sends into a party to damage it irrevocably. His motion, which the Government will not sanction, while they will and must condemn the agitation, will teach the Repealers that their enemies would put them down if they dare; but that they dare not, and that they cannot. The public refusal to obey the call of the House will be the first public step towards practically setting aside of the Imperial Legislature when it clashes with the wishes of Ireland, and trampling on the English Parliament, in a manner that will be infinitely gratifying to the pride of Irishmen.

The discussions on Repeal in the various Irish corporations, and the immense accession of moral influence to the Repeal cause thence arising, together with many other subordinate topics, we pass by for want of space; and we close our imperfect catalogue by mentioning Mr. O'Connell's plan for an Association of 300 quasi delegates, from the various constituencies of Ireland, to prepare a Bill for the Repeal of the Union. The man who is followed wherever he goes by hundreds of thousands of Repealers, who levies tribute like a monarch, who has roused into activity this wide-spread national feeling, and filled his countrymen with these resolute expectations, in the space of four months, who dares to defy the House of Commons to a personal encounter, and who, with all these pledges for the reality of the struggle in which he is engaged, commences his operations with a quasi-Parliament to enact Repeal beforehand, must be admitted to be a very dangerous antagonist, and to be very confident of his own success.

Now, we beseech those who may have followed us through this imperfect sketch of what has recently happened, and is now happening in Ireland, to bear in mind that this is no fanciful agitation,—empty, barren, begotten of the east wind. It is a stern substantial reality. Whatever may be thought of the prudence of the remedy, there can be no doubt that the agitation of the question is based on the most essential principles of justice—that it is an agitation against the worst, the most loathsome, the most besotted system of injustice that ever cursed a land with its abominable sway. Let the persons who doubt our prediction bear in mind that this successful agitation, though it seems sudden, is in truth the fruit of years of hard toilsome labour and indefatigable wrappings with doubt, timidity, and by-gone disappointments; that this is an old agitation, deliberately planned, consistently carried out, and which is just ripening and coming to a head. Let them bear in mind that so deep a root has the love of Repeal taken in the public mind of Ireland, that while it allowed itself, at the bidding of Mr. O'Connell, to be buried for a time when seemingly approaching towards success; and though overwhelmed with the disappointment of that sepulture, it has yet consented slowly, deliberately, but completely to be evoked again, to be raised up to its present height, and to be once more carried on with increasing activity, vigour, and the most confident expectations of success.—Tablet, May 6.

In his book on the Lamentations, he says: "I will fall down on my knees, and not presuming, on account of my crimes, to present my prayer to God, I will invoke all the saints to my assistance. O ye saints of heaven, I beseech you with a sorrow full of sighs and tears; fall at the feet of the Lord of mercies for me, a miserable sinner." Addressing himself to holy Job, he says, "Pray for us unfortunate creatures, that the mercies of the terrible God may deign to protect us in all our tribulations, and in the midst of the snares spread by our enemy."—*Lib. ii. de Job.

* Faith of Catholics, &c. p. 426.

We hope we may also venture to introduce, as evidence of the ancient and orthodox doctrines of the Church on images, two highly interesting letters on the subject, the one from Gregory the Great, and the other from Gregory the 2nd; and we would fain express a hope that, though some centuries later, yet the former being 1000 years, and the latter 900 before the publication of the homilies, they also may be adjudged to be beyond that unhappy, but unsettled boundary of 800 years and more.

"We have been informed," says Gregory the Great, writing to Serenus, bishop of Marseilles, "that, inflamed by an inconsiderate zeal, you have broken certain holy images, under the plea that such were not to be adored. And, indeed, that you should have forbidden their adoration would have deserved our eulogy, as you now deserve our censure for having broken them; for tell me, brother, when did you ever hear of any other priest or bishop doing as you have done? And should not this consideration alone have withheld you from a procedure from which it would seem that you alone are wise and holy, while all others are impious and in error. Know you not that it is one thing to adore a picture, another to learn by a picture what is to be adored. For pictures are to the illiterate what books are to the learned. For in them they see what examples they are to imitate, and thus they are enabled to read, without knowing their letters. Wherefore you had no right to break or destroy that which was placed in the Church, not for the adoration of the people, but for their instruction. And as it was not without reason that antiquity (this was written before the year 600) had the acts or histories of the saints depicted in the sanctuary, no doubt you would have found means to edify, instead of scandalizing and scattering the flock confided to your care, had not your learning been surpassed by your indiscretion.

"How can you expect to bring the strayed sheep into our Lord's fold, when you know not how to keep even those that were given to you in charge? Wherefore, we exhort, that even now you bear yourself and be vigilant, instead of giving way to such presumption; endeavouring, for the future, to reunite to your congregation those, whom your recent conduct has alienated and driven from it."—See the Life of St. Gregory the Great, by John the Deacon, lib. III. cap. 27.

The letter of his successor, Gregory the 2nd, is to Leo the Isaurian, and is to be found in Baronius.

"Thou hast written," says he, "that 'things made with hands' are not to be adored; as God hath forbidden it, in Exodus. But tell me, who amongst our predecessors hath ever handed down the doctrine that 'things made by hands' of men are to be adored? But why, like an emperor and head of Christendom, hast thou not consulted the sage and well-instructed in sacred learning, as to the nature of those 'things made with hands' which are referred to by the divine commandment, before spreading disorder and confusion through the empire? Wherefore, since the sacred ordinances of the Church and of antiquity have no avail, we beseech thee, setting aside all

That, however, we may not be stealing a march upon the right reverend prelate, and carrying his admissions beyond their fair and legitimate limits, we must needs state the exceptions which he makes,—contradictory and enigmatical as they appear to us,—against the Catholic use of tradition.

arrogance and pride of heart, to listen with humble docility to an explanation which nothing but gross ignorance could render necessary. And may the Almighty bend thy mind to the truth by the efficacy of his words.

"Know, then, that it was on account of the idolators who occupied the land of promise that God issued this command; for they worshipped idols of gold, of silver, of brass, and of wood; adoring all sorts of animals, saying 'These are our gods, and other god there is not.' Dedicated to the devil, execrable and to be detested, these were the 'works of men's hands,' prohibited by the divine law; because we find, in the ordination of the worship appointed for his chosen people, by God himself, many things dedicated to the divine glory and service, that were made with hands. But the prevalence of idolatry in the land to which they were on their way, where the very air and soil were infected with it, rendered this warning indispensably necessary to guard the Israelites from being corrupted and seduced by bad example. It was the Lord himself who selected from the people Bezeleel and Eliab, of the tribe of Dan, (Exodus xxxi.) two men whom he blessed and sanctified for the express purpose of enabling them to produce 'handy-work' worthy to be used in his service and contribute to his glory. Again he said to Moses, (Exodus xxxiv.) 'Cut two tables of stone and bring them to me;' and when he had cut them he carried them to the Lord, who with his own finger wrote on them the ten vivifying and immortal words. Again (Exodus xxv.) he orders the cherubim and seraphim to be made, and the table covered with gold on both sides, and the ark of incorruptible wood, in which the tables of the law, the rod, and, the manna were to be placed. Are not these images and symbols made with hands? Yes, but it is to the glory and for the service of God they were made. Whenever we enter the temple of the holy Prince of the Apostles, and there look upon his picture; my beloved Saviour is our judge if tears do not shower from our eyes. Christ required sight to the blind; but those who saw well thou hast blinded. Thou hast, as it were, drawn a film over the eyes of the poor, and by robbing them of the only books they can peruse, hast doomed them to sloth and indevotion in the churches. Thou sayest that stones, and canvases, and painted walls are adored by us. Emperor, it is not as thou sayest; but that our memories may be assisted, that minds stolid, illiterate, and stupid, may be elevated and carried on high towards those whom these images represent: on these accounts it is we use them, and not as if we regarded them as deities—God forbid! for it is not in such things we hope.

"If it happen to be before our Lord's image we are praying, we say, 'Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, assist and save us;' but if it be before the image of his holy mother, we say, 'Holy Mother of God our Lord intercede with thy Son, our only God and Saviour, that he bring us to everlasting life.' If it be a martyr,—St. Stephen, who hast shed thy blood for Christ; O, thou, who as protomartyr, must stand high in favour with Him, pray for us.' And thus we offer our supplications through the martyrs, but we do not, as thou sayest, emperor, appeal to them as gods.

"But thou hast written,—'How comes it to pass that in the six great councils nothing is said about images? For the same reason, O, emperor! that they have not said one word as to whether daily sustenance is to be taken or not; surrounded, as I doubt, that tradition was sufficient on that subject. In the same manner, the Church hath made use of images as the authority of tradition, as the example of the lives proved, who attended these councils as on their persons; and no one with the true religion and the burning love of Christ, ever journeyed but with some sacred memorial of this

MISCELLANEA.

BRISTOL—On Wednesday the Irvingite chapel, under the Bank, Bristol, was sold to the Roman Catholics of that city for 5,000*l*.

The Rev. Mr Hayden, a Protestant clergyman, recently obtained in the Court of Exchequer, Dublin, a verdict for 600*l*. damages against Dr. Harty, the owner of a private lunatic asylum, in which the rev. gentleman had been confined.

CATHOLIC TRADESMEN.—The following suggestion from a correspondent (a tradesman and a convert) will be found worthy of perusal:—"Catholics do not support each other as they ought to do, and I am not the only Catholic tradesman who has reason to speak thus. I have for years heard the same complaint from others. Surely it does not require an article in the TABLET, and probably a dozen consecutive letters on the subject, to point out to the Catholics of this kingdom the stern necessity which exists of their helping and supporting each other! If we observe the conduct of the sects around us, and of the Low Church herself, we shall see that with them this practice of mutually supporting each other, by trading one with another, is recognised as a second duty; and this may reasonably account for the seeming prosperity visible amongst many of them. Do we ever see a Quaker begging in the public streets? Never; and why? It is because they habitually trade one with another, and, like children of one father, help each other. Let Catholics do this. Let the titled and the great amongst them ever seek out the Catholic tradesman, and favourably smile upon their brethren of the Faith; and not—as is too often the case—drive up in carriage and four, for years together, to the door of a Protestant shop-keeper, whilst the humble despised tradesman of their own religion, on the opposite side of the street, is passed by and neglected.

"Oh! shame, where is thy blush?"

It may be said that I advocate exclusiveness: so I do, and such exclusiveness is extremely praiseworthy, and infinitely to be preferred to the undue fastidiousness of milk and water Catholics. Sectarians rejoice in supporting each other: it is their highest boast. In this respect, we may well submit to be taught of them; and if it was ever the duty of Catholics to aid each other, it is doubly so now, when bigotry walks openly forth, and impudently menaces us.—Tablet. June 10.

LEEK.—Six adults made a public profession of faith at the Catholic chapel here on Sunday last. An impressive and eloquent discourse was delivered by the pastor, the Rev. James O'Farrell. Several children and female converts were dressed in white, and admitted to the holy sacrament. Their conduct, which was most edifying, appeared to make a lasting impression on the beholders, several of whom were Protestants.—Tablet.

PROTESTANTISM;

ITS INCONSISTENCIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

But God is Faithful, for our preaching, which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT.

2 Ep. Cor. Cap. 1. v. 18.

The reader's attention was directed in the three or four preceding numbers of the Herald to the very singular position particularly of English and Scottish Protestantism throughout the British Empire. So far as regards Puseyism, and the difficulties into which it has plunged the established Church, we have, perhaps, dwelt already at sufficient length on these important topics. In what relates to the Kirk of Scotland, the remarks that we shall offer on its present extraordinary and critical situation, although modified by the somewhat different complexion of the controversies which agitate respectively the English and Scottish Protestant Churches, yet they will be found to be similar in substance, because originating and deduced from similar principles.

Abstracting wholly, for a moment, from the merits of either side of the controversy, which is carried on between the Intrusionists and Non-intrusionists, the two parties into which the Scottish Church is now divided, one most important truth is so evident, that he who runs may read, namely, that in, if we may so speak, the constitution of that Church, there is neither recognised, nor contained any principle or tribunal, invested with the efficiency or authority requisite to decide satisfactorily and finally the question, which has given occasion to the present schism.

That question can be viewed under a three fold relation; accordingly as the person who may contemplate it, may deem it to appertain to faith, to morality, or to those changeable disciplinary regulations which may be salutary in some and injurious in other circumstances. If the question referred to belong to the deposit of faith and Christian morality, then it is, undoubtedly, one of most serious consequence, as an erroneous decision on any one great or general principle of faith or morals must inevitably render the Church which sanctions such decision, not a pillar of truth but of error, not the House of God, between whom and falsehood there can be no communion or participation, but the abode of him who is the father of lies.

Again, if, in the supposition we now make, an erroneous decision of such a nature as we have described, be sanctioned by a Church in any one instance, it obviously follows, that it must be uncertain, whether in other cases, of equal, or, if possible, of greater importance, the same Church may not have also judged erroneously, and pronounced that doctrine to be true, which was really not so, or, on the contrary, that tenet to be untrue, which was really orthodox. Thus, the whole superstructure of the doctrine proposed by such a Church totters, the very instant that it falls into error, on any point of the sacred deposit of Revelation. For, of herself, she cannot afford more security than her doctrine is orthodox on one point than on another, and as, from the supposition, she fell into error on one doctrinal question, her authority on every other such subject must be deemed precarious.

In effect, not only the actual lapse of a Church into error on any single point of doctrine renders her other tenets, so far as these depend on her authority, uncertain and problematical, but even the admission that a Church, hitherto orthodox, may possibly, now, or at a future period, fall into error, depriver her of that teaching, guiding authority, which is indispensable, for the fixedness, security and constancy of the assent, which divine faith requires. The very apprehension, that the Church one adheres to may err, begets anxiety, anxiety, when there is no certain principle that can be applied to remove it, is soon followed by a wavering and unsteady state of mind, and this, we know from St. James, is fatal to the existence of Divine Faith.

All the observations we have offered on the question, which has occasioned the present schism in the Kirk of Scotland, and which apply to that question, if considered as one in which faith is involved, are equally applicable, if the question referred to be deemed one which appertains to Christian morality. For the revealed principles of Christian morality are truths, with respect to which we have to exercise the virtue of faith, as well as when there is question of speculative dogmas, such as the Trinity or Incarnation. For the chief distinction between faith as applied to dogmas, and faith as applied to morality, appears to consist in this, that God, in order to consult for man's moral infirmity, has revealed precepts, which even human reason approves of; whilst on the other hand, when there is question of speculative dogmas, which do not immediately or directly interfere or clash with the passions, then, reason, the only faculty to which such truths are addressed, is obliged to be silent, and forbidden to explore their depth, lest "the searcher of majesty may be oppressed by glory."

The third point of view, in which the question which has occasioned the dismemberment of the Scottish Kirk, may be considered, is that, according to which it should be treated as one of those disciplinary arrangements, which, at one period, may be salutary, although at another it may cease to be so, a change of circumstances may require an arrangement grounded on principles, apparently very contradictory to those, on which the prior arrangement was established.

If the want of a competent authority to decide finally controversies on faith and morality demonstrate, as we have shown that it does, the inadequacy of a Church for the maintenance of religious unity, the want of a tribunal qualified to adjust a difference of opinion on a subject of mutual and merely prudential or economical nature, establishes still more clearly, the conclusion that a Church destitute even of an such as is recognised in every well community, must be wholly unfitted for the attainment of those ends for which, in a great measure, a Church must have been established by Almighty God. That no recognised authority invested even with this inferior and, as it were, merely external species of power, exists in the Kirk of Scotland, the present incurably distracted state of that Church sufficiently evinces.

It would be easy to exhibit still more evidently the spiritually destitute and helpless condition of each of the reformed Churches, and their utter inability, to endure the test of time without undergoing various mutations, unless these be, at least externally, arrested by the interposition of the Supreme Civil authority. To be assured of the justness of this observation, one need only glance at the history past and present of the English Protestant Church. To preserve that Church from the evils of inconstancy and changes in her doctrines and rites, every precaution has been taken which human ingenuity and the strong arm of temporal authority could resort to, yet it is notorious that the English Clergy are so divided in religious belief from one another, that were it possible to assemble them together, as, at the last day, mankind shall be assembled in the valley of Josaphat, it would be found, that almost every alternate member of the assemblage differed in faith from the clergyman who stood near him. It might be expected, that, by means of legislative enactments, at least an external uniformity would be maintained in the public service of a Church, so completely the creature of parliament as the English Church is. But even this, all the authority of the legislature has not been able to secure. For the English periodicals teem with accounts, of the substitution in several Protestant Churches of a service, almost wholly similar to that of the Catholic Ritual, in the room of the cold and jejune formulary, hitherto universally practised in them. It is easy from what we have stated, to conjecture what, if we may so speak, would be the amount of internal and external discord in the English Protestant Church; if she were once abandoned to her own resources by the legislature, and deprived of those dignities and emoluments, to attain which, the aspirants for such preferments must, for a time at least, assume the garb of English Orthodoxy, and show a certain external deference to the prejudices and peculiar views of their patrons. But, once that the dignity sought for is attained, the ladder will be cast off by which the candidate ascended to his present elevation, and, when the proper time arrives, like the Rev. Mr. Whewell, he will perhaps proclaim to the world, that he solicited, and solicited in vain, the high priests of the establishment, to relieve his doubts, by affording him a clear, consistent, and uniform exposition of the articles, one which would reconcile them with one other and with the authorized standards of English Protestantism, and thus he will try to justify himself before the public, for the religious opinions he may have adopted.

BOMBAY.—We perceive by the Bombay Times that the Very Rev. Fré Miguel Antonio de Sao Louis Gonzaga, Vicar General of Bombay, has taken his departure for Suez on board the Victoria Steamer which left that presidency on the 26th ultimo.

GRATITUDE OF NATIVE CHRISTIANS.

Having been favoured with a perusal of the following interesting and edifying letter, we publish it, by permission, in order to show that the Catholic Native Christians of India are capable of conceiving and expressing all the exalted feelings of gratitude and piety, which at once refine and do honor to human nature. The writer is one of the head men, as they are called, of the very numerous and edifying congregation at Royapooram, Madras, which consists chiefly of Boatmen and Fishermen. They are in number, we have been told, about ten thousand, and, happily for themselves, they enjoy the unspeakable blessing of a truly Apostolic and Venerable Pastor, the Rev. Father Michael. To this good man they have recourse in all their little troubles, and as a tender Father, he soothes and consoles them. The blessed result is, that they are firm in faith and edifying in their observance of the feasts, fasts and morality, which the Church inculcates. For the space of nearly three years during which our Venerated Archbishop presided over them, in common with the other faithful of Madras, only one instance of Apostacy to heresy and that occasioned by poverty occurred, and in a few days after the unhappy event, the guilty party, deeply sensible of the enormity of his crime, did public penance in the Church of Royapooram for the sin he had committed and the scandal he had given.

To His Grace the Archbishop and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY LORD,—In penning these humble lines to your Lordship, I do it with confident hope that they will meet you in that perfect enjoyment of health, as they leave me and my family (thank God) for the same.

It has been intimated to me by Father Michael, that your Lordship in your letter to him, was kind enough to make particular enquiries about myself and family, accompanied at the same time, with your blessing, a kindness which will ever be remembered by us with utmost gratitude, and with our bended knees we implore your Lordship, to accept our truly sincere thanks.

By the same source it has come to my knowledge that the dignity of Archbishop is conferred on your Lordship, which I must say afforded a pleasing joy to me, and I wish your Lordship will accept my congratulations on so happy an occasion, as also my prayer that kind Providence will not only raise you to higher Dignity, but also bestow continual health and protection through your career in life. I beg now to acquaint your Lordship that I deemed it prudent in time, to settle my son Poonusawmy in life, as also one of my daughters; and it has been agreed upon, that the solemnization of their marriage should take place on the 30th instant; and although situated as we are, so remotely distant, yet I beg to solicit that your Lordship will confer your blessing on them.

Eager as I am once more to see your Lordship I made up my mind to visit Calcutta for that purpose, and personally return my thanks for the great many favours I had already derived from your kindness. Father Michael is always kind towards me and the rest, but I sincerely regret indeed to say that he is continually sick. Nannapraacausen, the Sexton of the Cathedral, begs of me to remember him to your Lordship. He is also laid up sick and he placed his younger brother to do duties in the Church.

Before concluding, allow me to crave your Lordship's blessing both for me and my family, and with the assurance of our daily prayers for your Lordship's health.

I beg leave to remain

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obdt.

and humble servant,

AMATHA APPASAMI MOODELLY.

CONVERSION OF DR. CHARLTON—BELLARY.

On the authority of a letter received by the Archbishop from a Catholic Officer, we have to announce that Dr. Charlton of H. M. 63d Regt. Bellary, has become a Catholic, and showed the deepest fervor and sincerity on the occasion of his being received into the Church. Dr. Charlton, was first of the Church of England, next a Baptist, and so zealous that he devoted all that he could spare of his pay to the Baptist cause.

ON THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.

It being conducive to wise purposes in the animal economy, that the motions of several interior parts of the body, most immediately essential to life, should not be under the controul of the will, it was necessary to divide motion into voluntary and involuntary.—Amongst many ingenious reasons assigned, why all motion was not subjected to the will, one will fully answer our purpose—the will being quiescent during sleep, could have no effect on the motion of those organs, whose constant action was essential to life, it was therefore necessary to provide against the danger, by employing some more secure agency: this agency, of whatever nature or character it may be, is conveyed to the moving parts by the nerves, which have their origin in the brain and spinal marrow. This influence alone is sufficient for involuntary motion: whereas it is put under the controul of the will in those instances, where the action was to depend on the occasional convenience or pleasure of the animal.

Here ends mechanical inquiry. Perception, sensation, volition, other animal properties belong to metaphysical research. For information on this intricate but certainly important subject, we refer to Locke, Reid, Stewart, &c. &c.

Thus far man stands only on a footing with the brute: perception, sensation, volition, the same in both. The same organs minister to the same purposes: pleasure, pain, life, death, common to both.

Is there then no distinction? Can no accurate line be drawn, contradistinctive of the brute and human species, without having recourse to metaphysics, or the dreams and errors of philosophy? Let us see whether the question can be brought to bear on the principles of common sense. Common sense, and the opinion of all mankind, concur in the belief that the brute knows nothing beyond sensual enjoyment, either in his individual capacity, or as connected with the propagation or preservation of his species. In these two points his sense is acute, and his penetration unerring, but to this he is strictly limited. No man ever believed, that a dog, however sagacious in the pursuit of his game, could ever be made to conceive the relative construction of the most simple machine, nay the very materials of which such machine may be formed, unless they may minister in some respect to his repose, his ease, or his food. From the general characters of the brute, there can be no hesitation in saying, that his final destination is the earth, and that he can have no claims beyond it, his faculties being exclusively confined to the terrestrial objects: not so of man, "The Lord God formed man of the slime of the earth, and breathed into his face the breath of life, and man became a living soul." (Genesis, chap. 2, v. vii.)

Man not only comprehends and forms machines; but discovers that he himself is a machine: that this machine is constructed on principles superior to human skill; that he is pre-eminently gifted with a faculty superior to sense, and which renders his state paramount to that of all other creatures on the surface of the earth; a faculty which controuls, represses, and commands his will—this faculty is REASON.

By the operation of this reason, he feels that, though a free agent, he has within him a rigid monitor, who, in the capacity of judge, superintends and regulates all his actions, by a certain standard, as a moral agent. This morality connects him with the source of all morality; it is written in indelible characters on his heart. His deviation from virtue, he knows, is a violation of that law prescribed by his conscience; and in the violation or observance of that law, or in the good or bad use he makes of his free-will, he discovers to an infallibility, the source of moral good and evil.

This same reason points out to him, that the attributes of judgment and reason, which have been granted him, cannot depend on organization or mechanism; that reason is an emanation of the Deity; and that hence it is immaterial and immortal. It is a contradiction in terms, to say that such a gift could have been conferred on a finite being. The capability of knowing God, however indistinctly, necessarily includes the idea of immortality. For a more full elucidation of this point, we refer to Mr. Addison's celebrated number in the Spectator, "On the Immortality of the Soul."

The change from a finite to an infinite existence, from earth to heaven, is awful, but at the same time glorious to man: the weakness of human nature may shrink from it, but the more powerful voice of reason interposes, and intimates that this change "unites man to his Creator, and resigns him, for all eternity, to his merciful disposal."

In conclusion: that the works of nature proceed from the design and contrivance of an intelligent and omnipotent agent, is evident; that the intimate connexion of cause and effect, is uniform and constant; that the order and regularity of all human things, preclude every idea of chance; and that every thing is regulated by system and design—"design must have had a designer, that designer must have been a person, and that person is God." This is enough for man to know: it answers all the ends of his destination, and leads him to that humility and reliance on Providence, which is the most essential point of his duty here below. It is not in the knowledge of the laws of nature; it is not in the cultivation of science, that the characteristic, the true excellence of man consists. It consists in an humble resignation to the will of Providence—in a firm reliance on his justice, goodness, and mercy, and in a constant reference of his actions and existence, to that stupendous Being, “who in his power ruleth for ever,” and in whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the spirit of all flesh of man.

CEYLON.

APPOINTMENT OF A CATHOLIC BISHOP.

We have been permitted to publish the following letter just received by our venerated Archbishop:

MY DEAR LORD,—I beg to inform you that the last Overland Express, which arrived here on the 21st ultimo, put me in possession of an Epistle from His Eminence the Cardinal Prefect of the Sacred Congregation De Propaganda Fide, giving cover to an Apostolical Brief, and announcing that His Holiness has been graciously pleased to create me Bishop of Usula and Vicar Apostolic of Ceylon—The Brief will be proclaimed to-morrow in the Church after high mass. I own my Lord, I am unworthy of so high a calling, and inefficient to acquit myself of the arduous duties attached thereto; but the present deplorable state of this Mission, and the consequent solicitude of my fellow labourers here, compel me to accept the function. May I, therefore, most earnestly pray that your Lordship will kindly impart every admonition which your Lordship may deem necessary for the efficient discharge of my pastoral duties in this part of the Vineyard.

In the interim, recommending myself and Mission to your Lordship's and fellow labourer's prayers,

I have the honour to remain,

My dear Lord, Your Lordship's Faithful Brother in Christ,

CAJETANUS ANTONIUS.

Ep. Elect, Usula ac. Vic. Apos. Ceylon.

We borrow the following from the Ceylon Observer of the 14th ultimo, relative to the elevation of the Vicar General Rev. Cajetan Antonius as Bishop of Usula and Vicar Apostolic of Ceylon.

“Yesterday at half past ten A. M. after High Mass and Benediction at the Church of St. Lucia the Vicar General, Rev. Cajetan Anthoni, and ten priests took their seats in front of the great altar, the Rev. Cajetan Romayto ascended the pulpit and opened two Bulls from His Holiness Pope Gregory the Sixteenth. The first Bull contained a charge to the clergy and the laity soliciting submission to the Ruling powers and to the Church, and invoking the grace of God for increased piety, peace towards each other, and eternal happiness. It ended in the appointment of the above Vicar General as BISHOP OF USULA. By the second Bull the said Bishop of Usula is appointed VICAR APOSTOLIC OF CEYLON. This sudden announcement gave great satisfaction and pleasure to the whole congregation, and all the Bells being rung the priests chanted the Te Deum and other hymns of thanksgiving, approached the new Bishop, and saluted him, who then ascended the pulpit, and addressed the clergy and the congregation in the most affectionate terms, soliciting their assistance and advice in the discharge of the sacred duties just imposed on him, and dwelt for some time in observations on the lives and conduct of St. Paul and Charles of Borromeo. The Bishop promised to attend strictly to the extent in his power, to instructions for the improvement of the minds of his flock and their moral and religious duties. A more worthy person could not have been selected for that sacred office—he possesses many excellent qualities and very liberal principles—this appointment will reconcile all amongst that body, from the late misunderstanding which existed between some of them and one or two of their Clergy. The greater part of the congregation most eagerly rushed to their Bishop to offer their congratulations and kiss his hand.”

We now have arrived, Mr. Editor, at what we may call the terminus of our patriotic disquisition regarding the tenet of Holy Church under present discussion. We stand on the threshold of the fourth century of Christendom, which is not only the range of historical space to which, at the commencement of these enquiries, I have confined myself, but which is also the utmost limit to which those among Protestants, who entertain any regard for ecclesiastical antiquity, will allow the purity of Christ's Holy Religion to have extended. The triumph achieved by the lowliness of the crucified Jesus, and the glory of the cross which began openly to cheer the most civilized nations from above their prostrated idols, and their now hallowed temples, the unusual number of Catholic writers, distinguished not merely for zeal and piety, but for universally admired proficiency in sacred and profane learning, throw a hallow of splendor about this century, which must needs endear it to the heart of every true Christian, and render it of almost unequalled importance in the annals of Church history. In fact it seems a trait of God's particular providence, that at a time when her temporal exaltation provoked the rabid invectives of the well-skilled advocates of sinking paganism; when her maternal joy was embittered by the specious sophistries of daring heretics; that at such a time, I say, men should be raised up, capable not only of coping successfully with her subtle enemies, but of throwing a never-fading lustre around the great cause they advocated. The names of a St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Athanasius, of a St. Cyril Jesus, St. Chrysostom, St. Jerome, of a St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Ephrem, and many others, will remain at once objects of everlasting respect to the children of the Church of Christ, and never-fading beacons of religious truth to future divines. The Church became free, with that freedom wherewith Christ had made her free against all human probability, and nobly she fulfilled the injunction of her divine Master, to preach on the house-top what she had heard in secret. The sacred tenets of truth, whispered till then only within the secret recesses of barred mansions, were proclaimed in the market-places; and the mystery of the saving cross till then only learned within the hidden charnel-houses or the catacombs, was now publicly displayed on the top of the houses of God, with which Christianity studded the world. The Church spoke now her saving faith without fear or disguise, no longer shrouding her sacred mysteries to the uninitiated under the thick veil of utter silence or emblematical expressions; no longer were her tenets or internal constitution under violence and pressures; she spoke it by the mouth of men, who uncorrupted, because unacquainted with the sophistries attendant on high rank and riches, imbibed yet her doctrines in the simple, severe, and chastening school of persecution and adversity. Hence, Mr. Editor, it is my opinion, that we have hardly an age of the Church, in which ecclesiastical writers deserve such an implicit reliance on the hand of a sincere enquirer after truth as the fourth, in which they could, without the slightest restraint, tell aloud what they believed, and profess what they practised; and over whose heads the purifying waters of oppression had flown too lately to make us suspicious of their integrity. Protestants could never have made a more unfortunate hit than this, viz. to let their innovating heresies be tested by the writings of as much as even the four first centuries. For, excepting the Fathers of the Council of Trent, they meet with no more determined enemies, than those of the fourth age. It would indeed be easy enough, to shew that this is true with respect to the whole circle of their new-fangled doctrines; but as all other questions except the one of Transubstantiation is foreign to my present disquisition, I must and will confine myself to it alone. I will adduce and elucidate

Mr. Editor, the testimonies of several Fathers of this period; although there is not wanting what is called a negative argument in our favor, proceeding from the confession of conspicuous Protestant writers. Among these let me quote the Centuriatores Magdeburgenses, who in their remarks upon the fourth century, declare, with more candor than generally distinguishes the fraternity, that (if I am not mistaken as I only trust to memory), in regard to Transubstantiation, the writers of the IVth century are quite in favor of the Pope. At least they do so in their notes upon the 8th century where they state: De transubstantiation multa habet Damascenus; viz. "St. John Damascenise's writings contain much about Transubstantiation." Another Protestant writer, to whom also, honesty seems not to have become a dead letter, whilst writing about controverted points, is forced to confess, that: "The present author would be misunderstood, where he conceived of as believing that the question is to be brought to the test of what was held by the many eminent men who flourished in the fourth century. Further he knows, that they spoke commonly of a change made in the elements, but not destroying their substantial properties. That they expressed the former sentiment in language which led to TRANSUBSTANTIATION, shall not be here denied." [Lectures on the Catechism of the Protestant English Church, and Dissertations, by William White D. D. Bishop, &c. of Philadelphia, 1813, pag. 484] —So much for a candid adversary; I wish, Mr. Editor, those Protestant theologians (?) who talk with great confidence about Transubstantiation having never been heard of until the 9th or the 12th century, were masters of as much learning, or honest dealing as this Dr. White. Among others, I could wish the pious (?) Dr. Cosin, had not come before the world in the garb either of a fool or a knave, by trying to persuade us, in his history of Popish Transubstantiation, that the Church of Christ knew nothing of this tenet until the 12th century!!! The assertion is no less gratuitous than the arguments he has used for establishing it are fallacious. It would have been more honorable for the zealot Bishop of Durham to say: "we won't believe that Popish tenet; and do not care what the Fathers of all centuries say either for or against it." This would have been less ridiculous than his professing to esteem ecclesiastical antiquity, and then go about squeezing its testimony "volens volens" through a sieve of Protestant notions. This is not unlike the barbarous way common to ancient judicial proceedings, wherein the humane examiners had their victim hoisted on the rack and, by dint of torments and dislodging of bones, forced him to confess not what crime he had committed but whatever they had a mind for hearing.

But now, Mr. Editor, let us return from these revilers of the ancient Church to the Fathers themselves. Yet before I do so, I must observe, that it is by no means my intention to gather and discuss all the arguments in favor of our holy tenet, which abound in the venerable writers of this century. This would bring me beyond the limits of a simple dissertation, and may not be agreeable to at least the generality of your readers. My intention is merely to select a few from among their glorious number, and again only some few from among their most conclusive passages, which confirm the truth of the Catholic dogma under discussion.

THE ORPHANAGES, FREE SCHOOLS, AND THE CATHOLIC INSTITUTE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I perceive lists of contributions to the different charitable institutions, established by our worthy Archbishop, published weekly in your valuable journal, and as it is natural to suppose that the Donors who have so generously contributed to the support of these institutions would be anxious to know in what manner their subscriptions have been appropriated, I beg to propose that a statement shewing the whole amount received and expended on account of each charity, be published for general information. If my memory does not fail me, I think it was promised at the onset, that yearly and monthly accounts, especially respecting that excellent institute the Orphanage, would be inserted in the Catholic Herald. A statement exhibiting in a concise manner the receipts and disbursements of the Free Schools would be very acceptable also. By supplying these desiderata, I am sure you will be the means of obtaining further support not only from those who have already subscribed, but from others who may have kept back their contributions in order to ascertain in what manner the sums already collected would be appropriated.

You have also omitted to notice the Calcutta Auxiliary Catholic Institute and the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, established about two years ago, when both those associations were warmly advocated by you. As the organ of the Catholics, your paper ought not to evince a lukewarmness in such matters and suffer our best institutions to dwindle away without at least making some slight attempts, with the powerful engine in your hands, to arouse the dormant sympathies of those Catholics, who had cordially joined in establishing them, and who I have no doubt, if called upon, will be as willing now as they were then, to assist in the good cause.

A SUBSCRIBER.

August 31st, 1843.

The subscriptions for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH are regularly announced, and for them the Vicar Apostolic is responsible to the Lyon's Society and eventually to the Holy See. In a similar way, the subscriptions for the Orphanage are announced, and as it has been repeatedly stated, that of the sums collected, recently Rs. 4,000 were applied to the purchase of one of the Houses required for the children, and that on an average 6 or 700 Rs. were expended monthly for the support of about 100 children, the number usually residing in the institution and for the rent of the two houses now added to the Orphanage (the rent of the two is 57 Rs. per month) it seems to us that enough was done to satisfy every useful purpose, and particularly to elicit the support of any person disposed to encourage that useful institution. Rent, servants wages, the support of two masters and two matrons amount to nearly 200 Rs. per month, thus leaving for the diet, washing, &c. &c. of each child a sum of about 4 Rs. To these obviously some other expenses must be added for clothes, for medicine, for furniture, and other matters which will occur readily to A SUBSCRIBER. From what has been stated now it will be seen at once that there is no superfluous outlay, and we think that the data supplied by the Herald showed fully and clearly to every one who reflected on the matter the state of the Orphanage and its funds.

With respect to the Free Schools—we doubt not but we shall be furnished immediately after the ensuing annual examination with a report of the Funds &c. As regards the Catholic Institute we are sorry we are unable to give any information at present.—Ed.

USE OF CANDLES AT CATHOLIC FUNERALS.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—You will oblige a great portion of your readers, if you will be so good as to explain the reason why lighted candles are carried at Catholic Funeral processions in Bengal, and whether that is required by the Church, or is it a mere custom introduced by the Portuguese Priests? I am given to understand that candles are not used at Funerals in many of the Catholic countries in Europe, and never in Ireland.

I am, your's truly,

A SUBSCRIBER.

We believe in every Catholic country tapers are used at Funerals, as emblems of the light of that consoling faith which teaches that there is a life immortal beyond the grave, in which the souls of the just repose free from the darkness and horrors to which the wicked are condemned.—Ed.

CATHEDRAL AND BOW-BAZAR MALE SCHOOLS.

The Examination of the Pupils of the Cathedral and Bow-Bazar Male Schools will be held on the 20th instant. As the Examinations will have closed on the preceding day at St. Xavier's College, four of the Rev. Gentlemen of that Institution have kindly promised to attend.

LORD BACON'S CHARACTER OF THE EVANGELICAL OR DISSENTERS.

"Although they have not cut themselves off from the body and communion of the Church, yet do they affect certain cognizances and differences wherein they seek to correspond among themselves and to be separate from others. First, they have appropriated to themselves the names of zealous, sincere, and reformed, as if all others were cold minglers of holy things, and profane, and friends of abuses—yea, be a man endued with great virtues, and faithful in good works, yet, if he concur not with them, they term him, in derogation, a civil and moral man, and compare him to Socrates, or some other heathen philosopher.... Then they preach conceits apt to breed in men rather weak opinions and perplexed despairs, than filial and true repentance. Another point of inconvenience is to entitle the people to hear controversies and all kinds of doctrine. They say no part of the counsel of God is to be suppressed or defrauded, so that difference which the apostle maketh between milk and strong meat is confounded, and his precept that the weak be not admitted into questions and controversies findeth no place.

But most of all is to be suspected, as a seed of further inconvenience, their manner of handling the Scriptures, for—while they seek express Scripture for everything, and that they have in a manner deprived themselves and the Church of a special help, by embarrassing the authority of the Fathers—they resort to naked examples, conceited inferences, and forced allusions, such as do mine into all certainty of religion. Another extremity is the excessive magnifying of that which, though it be a principal and most holy institution, yet hath its limits, as all things else have. We see, wherever in a manner they find in the Scriptures the Word spoken of, they expound it as of preaching."—Quarterly Review, May 1843.

PUSEYISM.

But there can be no doubt that it is making fearful progress among the clergy. We hear of no clerical dissenters from its ranks; on the contrary, the increase of its adherents throughout the country is matter of painful notoriety. Almost every paper gives fresh evidence of the spread of this pestilence among the clerical members of the Church. The instances which are continually turning up of the adoption of these sentiments and practices by one Clergyman after another, in various parts of the country, would almost lead to the supposition that the majority of the body was tainted with them. The University of Cambridge appears to have adopted them almost to the same extent as the University of Oxford. The Camden Society of Cambridge is the hot-bed of Puseyism. At its last anniversary meeting, a strenuous effort was made by some members of the University to obtain a disapproval of some of the most objectionable passages which have appeared in the Society's publications. Their evil tendency was faithfully exhibited, but every fresh allusion to them was received with rapturous applause. In the course of the proceedings, the President spoke of Dr. Pusey in the most flattering terms; and the room rung with acclamations. From the statements given in the papers, it would appear as though Cambridge has gone almost as far as Oxford in the adoption of Puseyism.

The suspension of the head of the party from preaching in the University of Oxford, so far from damping the ardour of his partizans, appears rather to have inspired them with fresh zeal. He has now the credit of being a persecuted man; he is encircled with the glory of a martyr; and the cause of Puseyism is considered to have acquired a fresh claim on the mind, from the very opposition which it has experienced. Thus is the Church of England torn with internal discord, at a time when the elements of change, of religious change, are powerfully at work in the two other divisions of the empire. Had Puseyism been vigorously discountenanced at the very outset by the Hierarchy, as an anti-protestant movement, it might probably have died a natural death in its cradle. But the Puseyites flattered the Bishops with the offer of a profound submission to episcopal authority, and thus lulled too many of them into fatal security. That submission is now reserved only for the Bishops who look favourably on the Sect. It has struck its roots deep, and extended its branches widely, and more than half the clergy are said to be reposing under its shade. We question whether it be any longer in the power of the Episcopal bench, by any effort they can make, to arrest its progress. It appears to gain additional strength from opposition; and even the contempt of society is deemed a badge, of honour. It must, we apprehend, run its mischievous course through the establishment, till it perishes in the convulsion which it creates.

This article has extended to such length that we can afford only two quotations, both of which however will serve to shew the spirit of the Tractarian movement and its inevitable tendency, if not design, to root out Protestantism. At the last anniversary meeting of the Catholic Institute, the President thus alluded to recent transactions at Oxford.

"Look at the controversy now going on in the established church, especially at Oxford. There was one Regius Professor (Dr. Pusey) just condemned and suspended for having advocated the doctrine of the real presence in the Eucharist; whilst another Regius Professor of the same university (Dr. Hampden) had been subjected to an action for damages for his maintenance of an entirely opposite doctrine. Now, if the action were to terminate against Dr. Hampden, he thought that the University of Oxford would be in what the Americans were accustomed to call a "fix"! He had heard at one of the meetings of that Institute a hope expressed that they (the Roman Catholics) might live to see the day when high mass would be celebrated in Westminster Abbey. He knew not how probable such an event might be, but this they knew, that the doctrine of the mass had been preached in the cathedral of the University of Oxford (loud cheering); and it had been authoritatively declared, that if Dr. Pusey's sermon had not been condemned, six or seven colleges of Oxford University were ready to have mass said directly (tremendous cheering and applause). There was indeed a very slender barrier between Puseyism and the Church of Rome; and, oh! what a field was now presented for the Roman Catholics to demolish that slender barrier at once, and to restore this great country to that Catholic union which was so exceedingly desirable." (Vociferous cheering)!

Some letters from Oxford appeared about two years ago in the L'Univers, the organ of French Catholicism, which were evidently written by one who was no friend to Protestantism. They have now been traced up to Mr. Delgairus, the disciple and friend of Mr. Newman, with whom he frequently resides at Littlemore. The following extract from them will serve to show the character of Tractarianism more than a hundred sermons and tracts, written under a feeling of reserve, and with a conviction that it is lawful to practise deceit for the benefit of a spiritual patient.

"Mr. Newman, one of our theologians, published, a few days since, the ninetieth number of the Tracts for the Times, in which he designs to demonstrate that the Church of Rome has fallen into no formal error in the Council of Trent, that the invocations of the saints (the Ora pro nobis for example), purgatory, and the supremacy of the Holy See of Rome, are in no way contrary to the Catholic traditions, or even to our authorized formularies; in fine, that the dogma of transubstantiation should be no obstacle to the union of the Churches, as in this Article there is only a verbal difference between them. At the same time he is but little satisfied with our Thirty-nine Articles, although he maintains throughout that the providence of God hindered the Reformers from openly inserting in them the Protestant dogmas to which they were but too much attached. You will perceive, Sir, all the importance of those opinions, and the more so, as they are not the opinions of an isolated theologian. I can assure you, that at the same time that an opposition was raised by the elder members of the University, "as might be expected, seeing that they lived under the system of the eighteenth century," that very opposition gave me an opportunity of observing that even the most moderate of the Catholic party at Oxford were ready to sustain the author of the tract."

Again this gentleman writes:—

"In the second place, we have a sacred duty to discharge towards the members of our Church. We cannot yet bring ourselves to believe that our dear England is in the same position as the heretics who boast in the names of Luther and Calvin. Of a truth, Sir, is not the Episcopal order still worth something? A sacrilegious king may, indeed, have stolen from the altars of Canterbury the sacred bones of St. Thomas, but, think you he had the power to drive away the great soul, who, from his throne in the skies, ever watches over the See which he has illustrated by his life, and consecrated by his blood? God forbid that the august line of Lanfranc and of Anselm should ever cease. If we have not preserved it, it is no more; for of a truth you will not say that its succession has been kept up by you. There is no Archbishop in partibus of Canterbury or of York, as there is of Cambrsopolis or of Siga. But perhaps you may say, that the moment an Archbishop ceases to be in communion with Rome, he also ceases to exist. But permit me here to become a little scholastic, and to borrow the terms with which the schools supply me, in order to give more precision to my ideas.

"There are at this moment in the Anglican Church a crowd of persons who balance between Protestantism and Catholicism, and who, nevertheless, would reject with horror the very idea of a union with Rome. The Protestant prejudices, which, for three hundred years, have infected our Church, are unhappily too deeply rooted there to be extirpated without a great deal of address. We must, then, offer in sacrifice to God this ardent desire which devours us of seeing once more the perfect unity of the Church of Christ. We must still bear the terrible void which the isolation of our Church creates in our hearts, and remain still till it pleases God to convert the hearts of our Anglican confreres, especially of our holy fathers, the bishops. We are destined, I am persuaded, to bring back many wandering sheep to the knowledge of the truth. In fact, the progress of Catholic opinions in England, for the last seven years, is so inconceivable, that no hope should appear extravagant. Let us, then, remain quiet for some years, till, by God's blessing, the ears of Englishmen are become accustomed to hear the name of Rome pronounced with reverence. At the end of this term you will soon see the fruits of our patience."—Friend of India, August 31.

HONG-KONG.

CONSECRATION OF THE CHURCH.

On Trinity Sunday last, the first (A Roman Catholic) Church, in Anglo-China, was consecrated for Divine Worship, by Fra-Antonio Feliciani, the Apostolic Prefect of Hong-Kong.

This Chapel, called the "Church of the Conception," is built upon a small eminence, about the middle of Hong-Kong, with a front towards the Bay. It was commenced in the month of June 1842 and has a college attached for the purpose of educating Natives for the Ministry.

The Chapel is built in the form of an oblong square, and inside the walls, measures, from the threshold to the altar, 112 feet, and in breadth, from wall to wall, 48 feet; of the length, twelve feet is occupied by the porch, and 38 by the altar, leaving for the body of the Church, a space of 62 feet by 48. The roof is about 140 feet in length, supported on 8 pillars of 30 inches in diameter, placed upon square pedestals, at the distance of six and a half feet from the wall, leaving a clear space in the centre of the Chapel, of 25 feet by 62. The walls are built of granite and brick, the roof of wood, also the floor, excepting a granite walk from the door to the altar. The walls are painted white, and hung round with pictures, while the roof, being of a light blue colour, gives a cheerful appearance to the interior.

The chapel is calculated to contain nearly a thousand persons, and cost in erection, about 9000 dollars, 6000 dollars of which were donations from the British, Portuguese, and other residents, the remainder from the Mission Funds.

Although the attendance at the consecration did not much exceed one hundred persons in the Church, and about fifty in the Orchestra, yet the grouping was of a very varied and interesting character. At the end of the Chapel, nearest to the altar, and on both sides between the pillars, were two small knots of British who, with their fair complexions, high cheek bones, blue eyes, and light hair formed a strong contrast, as they stood erect, taking no part in the service, to the Asiatic group at the other end of the Church, busy with their devotions, making as striking and interesting a scene as ever Wilkie caused to start from his canvas. Here were mostly every colour, the jet black Negro, the deep-brown Bengalee, light-brown Madrasse, the tawny Chinese, &c. &c. robed in every variety of oriental costume, while more on the centre of the floor, and round about the pillars, stood or knelt groups of soldiers of the 55th regiment, from the wilds of Connemara and mountains of Scotland; Sepoys and Native Artillery men from India, mixed among Portuguese, Italians, and other foreign seamen; nor must the ladies be forgotten, for, in European costume, there were seven or eight present.

The whole scene was one of the most interesting we have seen for a long time, and as the mind wandered back to the days of St. Francis Xavier, and Loyola, it was with feelings of no ordinary kind, that the hardships of these extraordinary men passed in review before us, mingled with the then Colonial insignificance of England, and her present greatness. Here was no paltry Dutch monopoly, no cruel Portuguese oppression, no sneaking Chinese exclusion, but the broad mantle of British power, and British commerce, extending her protection to other nations and to every religion, on ground from which, until lately, all Europeans were carefully excluded.

The service began at nine in the morning, and consisted of a benediction and high mass, followed by the baptism of a convert, a native of Madras. No organ boomed on the ear, but a good band of musical instruments joined in the chaunting, while the devotional propriety of the various worshippers was as great as one ever saw in any Cathedral or Chapel in Europe. It was the same Church, the same service, the same symbols, as we had seen in England, in Ireland, in Italy, and Malta. The audience alone was of a different kind; for, in addition to every variety of European costume, there were brown and swarthy forms, naked all, except a shawl round their middle downwards, shewing a dark and breathing bust, rising out of a white pedestal as if the old sculptor had cut a black marble Apollo with drapery in flowing robes of purest white.—Hong Kong Gazette, June 15.

"LOOK AT THAT PICTURE AND ON THIS."

Edinburgh, 21st June, 1561.

The Town Council ordains Mr. George Strachan, priest, to depart forth of this town and bounds thereof, within twelve days next hereafter, and that he be not found therein until they be fully certified of his public repentance against his papistrie.

Edinburgh, 14th July, 1616.

William Sinclair, advocate, Robert Wilkie, embroiderer, and Robert Cruickshanks, stabler, all in Edinburgh, were tried before the Court of Justiciary, and condemned to be executed, for assisting at masses said in Wilkie's house, and for sheltering John Ogilvie, and Masters Moffat and Campbell, Jesuits. Master Moffat was harboured a day or two in Sinclair's house—Master Ogilvie's horse was kept in the stables of Cruickshanks—and Master Campbell and his horse were also taken in by Cruickshanks.

Edinburgh, Easter Sunday, 1843.

This day a Pontifical High Mass was celebrated by the Right Reverend Dr. Gillis, in St. Mary's Catholic Church, Broughton Street, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Malcolm, Rigg, Macdonald, and others. The eloquence of this young and very popular bishop, and the splendid and impressive manner in which he is wont to dignify the high festivals of the Church, attracted an immense crowd to St. Mary's; but hundreds went away without being able to find even standing room. Morning masses had, however, been said not only in St. Mary's, but also in St. Patrick's Chapel, in the beautiful chapel of St. Margaret's Convent, and at the Sisters of Charity's Establishment in Milton House, so that of the sixteen thousand Catholic inhabitants of Edinburgh, it is believed few above infancy were absent from assisting at one or other of these services.

Shortly after eleven o'clock the great doors of the church were thrown open, and the Bishop and his assistants, preceded by the office-bearers and members of the Holy Guild of St. Joseph in their robes and collar, and with batons tastefully surmounted by a St. Andrew's cross, advanced slowly from the cloistered chapel adjoining the church, and took their places within the magnificent screen with which the altar is inclosed, and within which has also been recently placed an organ for the second choir, in beautiful keeping with the screen and altar piece. The Brethren of St. Joseph's Guild filed off to the right and left, and took up their position in the side aisles round the entire church. About 200 of the 66th Regiment of Foot were also present, but as every seat in the church was occupied long before they reached St. Mary's, they could only obtain standing room in the large central aisle, forming by this accidental circumstance an interesting portion of the great assemblage, as the mitred and crosiered Prelate proceeded slowly along their open ranks.

With clouds of incense filling the church, and the swelling note of praise resounding along its fretted roof, the service equalled the magnificence of a national cathedral; while the eloquence of the Bishop, persuasive as an apostle, and zealous as a missionary, tended to heighten the effect. Beyond all doubt, and by the admission even of Protestants, the address of Dr. Gillis on this occasion was singularly beautiful and impressive. In alluding to the sealing up of the sepulchre, he was admirable. "Vain effort," he exclaimed "the infatuated Jews might as easily have shut up the portals of the East, and prevented the bursting forth of that great orb whose flood of tinted light is now streaming upon us!" The rush of appropriate and magnificent thought, which now crowded for utterance, would not admit of more than a passing glance, at the wonderful power of God in the altered circumstances of Edinburgh Catholics—but we are sure Dr. Gillis felt all this and more, when with uplifted hand he dispensed his benediction over the kneeling multitude, many of whom, amid the silence of the temple and the solemnity of the scene, refused not the blessing of a good man, though of a different household of faith. The tremulous voice of the Bishop, and the filling eye, told how deeply he was affected at the unequivocal evidence before him of the success with which his great Master's work was being performed.

Providence has been more kind to Dr Gillis than to the exiled and hunted priests of 1561 and 1615; but had it been otherwise and had he, in the discharge of his duties, like the martyred Ogilvie, been obliged to come at midnight from some hiding place in the country to say Mass, and administer the sacrament in the apartment of a solitary Catholic tradesman, the same laborious and untiring zeal, indomitable energy and spirit of self-sacrifice with which Ogilvie nurtured the crushed spirit of Catholicity, would have been exhibited by the Bishop of Limyra. The field of his exertion is greatly extended; but in addition to those gifts with which Ogilvie watched over the whispering accents of faith, even greater are required towards their successful development—and when the future historian of Edinburgh shall contrast the situation and prospects of the Catholic religion in the fifteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth centuries, and desire his readers to look on this picture and on that, the name and the services of Dr Gillis will occupy a conspicuous place on the extended canvas.—Edinburgh Courier, May 19.

UNBRIDLED CALVINISM.

Unbridled Calvinism in Scotland is engaged in a third revolution. Beginning with the assassination of Cardinal Beaton, and ending with the death of Queen Mary, it, in the 16th century, by the aid of Queen Elizabeth and the English government, overturned the Scottish throne, and destroyed the ancient Catholic hierarchy, expelling and persecuting, with impartial ruthlessness, priest, layman, and loyalist. In the 17th century, beginning with the assassination of Archbishop Sharpe, and ending with the murder of Charles the First, whom it delivered to the block, Calvinism, with the assistance of the English sectaries, not only destroyed the Episcopacy that had been established on the ruins of the Catholic Church, but also overturned the throne on which Elizabeth sat. And now, in the 19th century, it is turning its virulence against the Presbyterianism that had been constructed on the foundations of the Catholic and Episcopal Churches,—is resolved to repudiate its connection with the State, and to relinquish the stipends, and advantages, and the bounty, that have attached it to order, and tranquillity, and obedience.

There is something exceedingly grand in the spectacle of a Church disestablishing itself for conscience sake, and recurring to the simplicity of apostolic action for its maintenance and efficiency. But Calvinism in Scotland possesses none of the elements of such grandeur. Coarse, democratic, and intolerant in principle—and, in practice, administered by preachers less highly educated than the clergy of any other Church and to the middle or democratic class alone and in a liturgy of barbarous construction, Calvinism is apt to inspire an inquirer with indifference or dislike. Harsh and dissonant in its details, it never, as a system, gains on the affections. And no sooner do those who belong to it wax rich, and educated, and estated men, than they generally separate from its profession. And yet the disruption of this Establishment from the State is a matter of general concern, inasmuch as it will be the forerunner of general danger. Urged on by the spirit of the times, and secretly encouraged by the late whig government, it has been hotly engaged in a contest with the civil power and the laws of the land—with the Court of Session and the House of Peers. It has attempted also to concuss the present government. It has also made attempts on the legislature—to obtain emancipation and exemption from the burdens and obligations imposed on it by the State—but all in vain; and, therefore, finding the connection irksome, and a restraint upon the supremacy they are aiming at, a majority of the Church of Scotland have resolved to withdraw from a union under which they now assert it is sinful to continue, although most of them have, for a half or quarter of a century, been preachers and incumbents, or recipients of its endowments.

It is difficult to make a stranger understand the question at issue. Indeed many even on this side of the Tweed have but a vague idea of the matter. But stripped of cant phraseology, and expressed in the language of common sense, the new constitution demanded by the Church is to comprise, 1st, Exemption from patronage, or the right of the Crown or lay patrons to present to vacant parishes, patronage being denounced by them as a grievance; 2d, The operation of the non-intrusion principle, that no preacher shall be intruded into a parish against the will of the parishioners; and, 3dly, Complete independence of the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts. In a word, the Church of Scotland claims the fulfilment of that part of the law which contains provisions in her favour, and the repeal of every stipulation in favour of the State or its subjects—that is, the right of the preachers to pocket the public money, and the privilege of saying and doing just as they choose. The State very naturally demurs to this arrangement, and the majority are in consequence about to withdraw, and to form themselves into an association, to be called "The Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland." To secure its efficiency, and the support of the preachers who are to form its staff, collections are being made throughout the length and breadth of the land, and subscriptions of money and money's worth are pouring in on all sides. Such a secession will thus arise that, taking into view the existing body of Scottish Dissenters, the majority of the Scotch Presbyterians will be unchurched, leaving the Establishment in a minority, both as regards numbers, violence, and popular declaiming power, but with about an equality of temporal wealth.

In the revolution of the 16th century, the acquisition of the Church lands secured the willing aid of the aristocracy in overthrowing the Catholic Church; and in that of the 17th century, the resumption by Charles the First of part of the ancient Church possessions for the benefit of his new Episcopacy, and for that purpose the institution of actions at law in the Court of Session against the rapacious nobles, impelled the aristocracy to secure, by another revolution, what they had seized in the first, and, therefore, they fomented and supported the convulsions of 1638, by which Episcopacy was abolished. In the present movement, however, there will be no aid from the aristocracy. Most of them are Episcopalians or Catholics, and such as are not will scarcely remain long in either Free or Established Church; and, therefore, as the aristocracy have nothing to gain, but, on the contrary, must be deprived of their patronages and right of presenting to vacant parishes, if the present movement be successful, the entire aristocracy will be opposed to the principles and the operations of the Free Presbyterian Association.

But let not the public—and especially let not the Catholic and Episcopalian think—that, because thus shorn of a great element of strength, the Calvinism of this Society will be either innocuous or undeserving of notice. Quite the reverse. A new and most dangerous power of modern creation, and easily wrought up into fanaticism, will more than supply the place of the aristocracy; the ten-pound elector who, since the passing of the Reform Bill, and the separation of political power from property, and the transference of that power to the middle and humble classes, will be the readiest and most formidable instruments of a Calvinistic crusade.

The leaders in this perilous movement proclaim, that they must have the independence which the Church of Scotland enjoyed from the revolution of 1688 to 1711,—a period in which the storms of the preceding century had scarcely subsided, when the Church had, in fact, merely a provisional character, and when, as has but lately been known to the public, the Calvinists would have soon quarrelled with King William, whom they had been mainly instrumental in placing on the throne of the Stuarts. But death soon relieved the Dutchman from the dangers of another covenant; and it was left to Queen Anne to reduce to order the refractory spirit of the Kirk. By the treaty and act of union of England and Scotland, the Presbyterian form of Church government was provided for and secured. But then, as now, it was found how dangerous to liberty, both civil and sacred, unbridled Calvinism was, and, therefore, in 1712, the ancient right of patrons to present to vacant parishes was restored to the Crown and to the aristocracy.

There was much of intolerance and of acrid discussion and action since this famous act of Queen Anne,—but with that we have no concern at present. The golden age of Calvinism and its spirit, press chiefly on the attention of the enquirer. The Calvinists had destroyed the Catholic Church, and hunted priest and layman out of the country. They had destroyed Episcopacy, and were active in the pursuit and punishment of ministers and followers of Episcopacy. The Bible, and their vaunted right of private judgment, were fully vindicated through years of suffering and crime; and, though claiming the principle of freedom to themselves, they not only denied it practically, but, by the solemn acts of their General Assembly, refused it to others. As regards the Catholics, neither priests nor laymen dare show face; and their poor spite was left to exhaust itself on such remnants of altar ornaments or utensils as fell in their way.

Thus Maitland tells us, that on 15th March, 1704, in obedience to an act of the Scots Privy Council, there were found at the market cross of Edinburgh, divers popish trinkets, consisted of Sacerdotal Habi-liments, Communion Table Linen, Retractories, Chalice, Crucifixes, Strings of Beads, Consecrated Stones, Relics, Remissions, and Indulgences, among which was the following:—"The Archbishop of Mechlin has granted indulgence of forty days to those who shall bow the knee before this image, once a year, considering devoutly the infinite charity of Jesus Christ, who has suffered for us the bitter death of the Cross; and if any will perform this devotion oftener, he shall have a new indulgence for five days more." It is to be hoped that many availed themselves of the archbishop's indulgence, not to commit sin, but granting the Church's relief from the temporal casualties of repeated sin. But however this may be, the Calvinism of 1704 breathes towards Catholics none of that charity, the infinite extent of which produced the tragedy of Calvary, recommended for meditation by the good archbishop.

As regards the Episcopalian, we find the Calvinism of 1703 as ruthless as towards Catholics. On the 1st of June of that year, the Duke of Queensberry, as the Royal Commissioner, opened the Scottish Parliament, when the Commission of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland presented this address to his Grace:—"We do, therefore, beseech you,—yea, we are bold in the Lord, and in the name of the Church of God in this land, earnestly to obtest your Grace, and the most honourable estates, that no such motion of any legal toleration to those of the Prelatical principles, be entertained by the Parliament, being persuaded, that in the present case and circumstances of this church and nation, to enact a toleration of these in that way (which God of his infinite mercy avert), would be to establish iniquity by a law, and would bring upon the promoters thereof, and upon their families, the dreadful guilt of all these sins and pernicious effects, both to the Church and State, that may ensue thereupon."

Such was the Calvinism of 1703 and 1704, and such it is at the present hour. In 1834 the General assembly, by its own veto act, virtually repealed the statute of Queen Anne, but the courts of law declared their proceedings illegal. In 1838 they held a bicentenary commemoration of the 1638 covenant, and the attainment of independence under that revolution. At the commemoration in Glasgow, with the Moderator or President of the Assembly at its head, the proceedings consisted chiefly of denunciations against the Catholic religion, and the members of that body; while on the Edinburgh platform, Prelacy or its Erastianism, and those who sit in high places, nay, the Queen herself—were held up to detestation, to scorn, or to censure. And now, with rancour in their hearts against those whom they have injured—from whom they are separating—against the mild and good-natured and forbearing moderates who wisely intend to remain in the Establishment,—the leaders of the Free Presbyterian Association are meditating fresh injustice, are taking measures not only to assault the friends they are leaving, but to pull down about their ears the fabric under which they themselves have nestled so long, and have been so well and so comfortably sheltered.

The issue of this contest no man can predicate with certainty. The Churches of Rome and of England—the shattered Church Establishment of Scotland—the law and constituted authorities—and the wealth and intelligence of the country—are all against the movement. But the spirit of fanaticism and of revolution is strong and with it. So are also the Dissenters of England and Scotland. It is also hailed as a good element of agitation by the discontented politician, and openly countenanced by a great portion of the whigs. The Free Presbyterian Association will therefore go on; it will attack all—injure all—risk all—and in the convulsions attending its progression—will lose all.—Edinburgh Courier, May 18.

SCOTLAND.

THE OPENING OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S CHURCH—Swift and striking as has been the advance of the Catholic religion in Scotland during the last twenty or thirty years, and interesting as is, at all times, the record of an addition to its churches, there have been few occasions when such an event has been fraught with so deep an interest to the Catholics of Scotland, and which has been surrounded by so many encouraging, so many impressive circumstances, as the opening of St. Francis Xavier's church, at Falkirk, on Sunday last. Since the day when the preventive weight of persecution was removed, the rapidity with which, and the extent to which Catholic churches have sprung up, and congregations multiplied in this country, is perfectly wonderful: averaging, during the period before-mentioned, nearly two churches per annum. Some passing attention these have excited, it is true. From time to time their increase is pointed out with alarm, or their numbers dwelt upon in rebuke, according as the pious weak are roused by inward distrust, or the factious fanatic by foreboding. This lasts not long—but it has been reserved to St. Francis Xavier's, at Falkirk, the privilege of creating a sensation beyond the mere ordinary notice of its institution. Quietly amid the fermenting elements which were preparing to explode, and scatter the foundations of the established kirk of this land, has this beautiful model of a Christian church, been raised under the especial care and direction of Bishop Gillis; and the day which memorialises the distinction of the one, saw the completion of the other. On the day, that very day, destined to be so memorable in the ecclesiastical annals of Scotland, when 400 of her pastors surrendered their churches; and even at the hour they went forth to preach to those of their flocks (bewildered between two masters) who followed them, some in reading-rooms, some in concert-rooms, some in the fields: and when the edifices which they had left were, half deserted, taken possession of by a denounced stranger, the doors of St. Francis Xavier's were opened, and there for the first time in nearly 300 years, the posterity of those who had learned their faith from the lips of St. Modan (the patron Saint of Falkirk) saw, as an old inhabitant exclaimed, "The old church come back again," its holy services reinstated, and its sacred mysteries celebrated in all their grave, but splendid dignity as of old. Gothic in its structure, with its stained glass windows and elegant screen of carved oak flanking a handsome altar, this church is certainly one of the most beautiful in Scotland. The services were conducted with the same taste, propriety, and splendour, which invariably accompanies those presided over by the Right Rev. Dr. Gillis. Thirty members of the Holy Guild, in the robes of their order, headed the pontifical procession, and the choir, strengthened by a portion of that from Edinburgh, and aided by the fine-toned new organ, gave their due effect to the grandeur of the occasion. The church was crowded, in great measure, with Protestants, both at mass and vespers. In the morning, one of the most eloquent sermons ever heard (on charity) was delivered by that singularly gifted preacher, the Rev. S. Keenan, of Dundee; and in the afternoon, the Bishop addressed an appropriate lecture to his congregation, which in force and beauty his lordship has on no occasion surpassed. We may now safely augur a fair promise that the planting of St. Xavier's church at Falkirk, placed as it is under the charge of so esteemed and excellent a clergyman as the Rev. Paul M'Lachlan, of Stirling, will, by the fruitful results of its mission, still more gloriously signalise the epoch and coincidences which accompanied its institution.—Tablet, June 3.

FALKIRK.—The innovating bell with which the Right Rev. Dr. Gillis had distinguished the new Catholic Church of St. Francis Xavier, has been the accidental cause of events of some interest, not only on account of the evidence which it affords of a growing confidence and good feeling, but as distinctly marking the mighty change which is taking place among old prejudices in favour of our impressions. This bell had of course excited some little surprise; the good people of Falkirk could scarce believe their eyes when they saw not only "the old Church come back again," but come prepared to sound from its tower a public "call to the unconverted," amidst all the changes which were being run around her. Eventually the bishop, having been misled by the representations of an individual, directed that the bell should be sounded at the consecration and elevation only, under an idea that its introduction as a call to service would displease the inhabitants. It is with the greatest satisfaction, however, we learn that the Provost and Town Council of Falkirk have since collectively considered this subject, and come to an unanimous decision that the right rev. bishop should be invited to direct this church bell to be made use of for the public purpose for which it was erected; an instance of frankness, liberality and good feeling, which does them the highest honour.—Tablet.

CANADA.

Up to the present time the reports which have been drawn up respecting the concourse of penitents during the paschal solemnities have been of the most edifying kind. The piety and zeal which, during some years, have been conspicuous throughout the whole diocese, have been everywhere sustained, and more particularly manifested in the fulfilment of all the duties of a Christian. What a happy reformation has been worked amongst us! How many splendid demonstrations of faith and generosity have caused Christians to rejoice! How many admirable conversions have consoled the Church for the disorders and deviations of some of her other children! At this moment Montreal in particular presents to view a picture admirably tending to inspire confidence in the future by displaying to us the fortunate changes which have been effected within it; and this renovation is not motionless and stationary, but is progressing with more rapidity than ever. By the census which was made last winter, during the bishop's parochial visitation, it was calculated that there were 23,000 Catholic Canadians in Montreal, its suburbs, and adjacent heights. They are divided into 4,200 families, amongst whom are 14,500 communicants. The Canadian domestics who are out at service in Protestant or Irish houses, and who cannot be visited, are not included in that number. In Kingston the Catholic faith is making wonderful progress. Last year the number of conversions amounted to 192.

On Easter Sunday seven others received communion in the cathedral. One large is spoken of in which the Protestant portion of the population appears universally disposed to embrace Catholicity. If Catholic Priests could constantly reside there, the work of God would be perfected. On all sides anti-Catholic prejudices are fast disappearing in proportion as we become better known, and as our holy religion is more studied.

The Arch-Confraternity is also wonderfully extending in the above-named diocese. There, as in every other place, it is pre-eminently a popular devotion; and the miracles of grace, which are both the glory and the reward thereof, are daily multiplied. Oh, blessed be the pious idea which originated this admirable association, and thereby opened a new path to the sacred heart of Mary. With extraordinary rapidity the benign influence of the Arch-Confraternity has penetrated into places, into houses, and into hearts, from which religion had been long excluded. * * * From almost daily accounts of the beneficent protection afforded by the Virgin of Mercy, we learn that many poor sinners have been brought back from their far wanderings in crime, and that the goodness of her maternal heart has sought them out even in the very depth of their abyss, and in the midst of their most culpable irregularities. To desist from those sins was the least of their thoughts, and it was whilst meditating new crimes that they were taken by the hand, led on unwittingly, and conducted as they imagined by chance, into the Holy Temple—the path to which they had long forgotten—and into the chapel, which resounded with her venerated name. At other times the poor sinner was a prey to anxiety, and to an undefinable species of restlessness which allowed him no peace, and against which he struggled in vain. Soon, however, an interior voice pronounced for him the name of Mary, and, notwithstanding his resistance and the revolt of his passions, he found no repose until after he had invoked that holy name, and asked for a protecting asylum in the heart of Mary. Every Sunday the crowd which attends the offices of the Arch-Confraternity bears testimony more and more to the faith and the piety of the Catholics, and to the popularity which this affecting devotion enjoys amongst us.—Abridged from the Montreal Mèlanges Religieux, of the 28th of April.

The exaggerated discontent which was excited on the borders of Lake Champlain, by the destruction of the spurious bibles, is now displayed only at remote intervals. Several Protestants even, who had arrived in order to investigate the affair, have declared that the bibles were very properly burned, because they had been distributed amongst the Canadians without their consent. Tolerance is on the advance in the above quarter, and the Canadians speak enthusiastically of the Priest who came to preach it to them. Many conversions to Catholicity will shortly take place, and several Protestant parents have expressed a wish that their children should be baptized as Catholics.—Mèlanges Religieux.

On the 30th of April the canoes of the North West Company set off on their voyage, which was to have begun on the 25th, but which was adjourned in consequence of the ice. The Honourable Company were kind enough to give places in their canoes to seven Canadian travellers, five men and two women, who are destined for the Catholic mission of Columbia. Those emigrants are Pierre Papin (known as Lachance) a blacksmith, Felix Bargevin, and wife, Sifroy Jobin, and wife, Augustin Garaud, and Olivier Lupien. Four of the above-named men have already resided in Columbia, whence they departed last year with the intention of returning, in order to settle there definitively. All have courageously and generously abandoned their country, trusting to Providence and to the protection of Mary for their safety during their long and perilous voyage, and for the success of their future establishment.—Ibid.

The Protestant portion of the population of Lower Canada is the English party, which adds to its other national and religious prejudices, its claims to domination and superiority. Difference in language, like a wall of separation, restrains the free communication of this party with the Catholics, and keeps all its prejudices in statu quo. Nevertheless, in spite of all those obstacles, conversions to Catholicity are frequent enough in Lower Canada. In order to be convinced of that fact, it is only necessary to look at the conversions which have taken place at Quebec during a certain number of years, particularly during the last twelve months. It has been ascertained that in the city of Quebec alone, during the ravages of the cholera in 1832, not less than eighty Protestants asked for the spiritual aid of the priests, and embraced the Catholic faith on their death beds. We have been told, also, that an equal number of Protestants in Montreal, had, during the same calamity, expressed a wish to die Catholics. But when we state that conversions to Catholicism are frequent amongst us, we do not refer to those which have been made under those extraordinary circumstances, and at the last hour of life, when the fear of God is uppermost, and when the interests of salvation are alone attended to; but we allude to conversions which daily occur, and which are verified in the parochial registries. Those registries attest that 418 Protestants in the single diocese of Quebec have abjured their errors since 1826. Many of those converts were heads of families, and their change naturally induced that of their children, but the latter are not comprised in the above number. There have been, therefore, on an average, twenty-four conversions annually, since 1826, in the parish of Quebec. Last year there were forty-one, and since the 1st of January, 1843, there have been already twenty registered. One may judge by that of the number of conversions which are made every year in the other parts of the province, and it is easy to see that the religious movement which is re-conducting the Protestants to the Catholic Church is scarcely less felt in Canada than in other countries.—Ibid.

PROTESTANTISM ;

ITS INCONSISTENCIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

But God is Faithful, for our preaching, which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT.

2 Ep. Cor. Cap. 1. v. 18.

In the moral order we are often disposed to wonder that Providence should permit man to abuse his liberty by the commission of sin. To relieve the surprise, it is useful to advert to that admirable economy of the Most High, by which the present order is so disposed, as that the evils which occur in it are made subservient, and, as it were, instrumental to the production of good. In the Christian dispensation, it is observable, that even in what relates not only to morality, but also to faith, it has pleased its divine founder to adopt a like economy. “For,” says St. Paul, speaking of the dissensions which disturbed the Church of Corinth, “there must be also heresies; that they also, who are approved, may be made manifest among you.” Thus is it arranged, that whilst our virtue is tried by bad example, our faith is proved by the temptations, which heresy suggests against the mysterious truths of the Gospel. But in these, as in the moral trials we experience, God is faithful, and will not suffer us to be tempted beyond our strength, but on the contrary, will make issue with the temptation, and even turn to our advantage the danger which menaced our salvation.

For it is true, that in the history of the several heresies which have assailed the Catholic Church, much may be found, which may serve at the present day to confirm and elucidate several, if not all, the grand mysteries of christianity, and to convince the reflecting inquirer that no power but that of God, could have originally caused these impervious truths to be made known and received throughout the universe. The Gospel tells us, that it was whilst the husbandmen slept, that the enemy succeeded in sowing cockle among the good corn, which had been committed to the soil. At every period of the Church, God has made use of the dissensions and heresies, originated by turbulent and innovating characters, to arouse to vigilance the labourers of his vineyard, and warn them to be prepared, to repel the wild boar, which threatened to break down its hedges, and convert its beauty and fruitfulness into disorder and sterility.

Thus, to illustrate by one instance the truth of these remarks, let us recall to mind the great leading events, connected with the outbreak of the Arian Heresy, which impugned the divinity of Jesus Christ. Arius, a refractory Priest, despite the authority of his Bishop, promulgates that impiety, and is, in consequence, excommunicated by his Ordinary. Unwilling to obey his superior, he labours, by appealing to scripture in favor of his doctrine, by resorting to various artifices to enlist others in the same cause with him, and by indulging in bitter invectives against his Bishop, to weaken the public faith in the dogma he opposed, and to introduce a belief, in reality the very contrary to that, which the Church everywhere professed. For a time, God permitted this heresiarch to prosper in his career of iniquity and rebellion. Some powerful personages, as well among the clergy as the laity, patronized his innovation, and if those who continued Orthodox did not give way to despondency, it was because faith assured them, that, though heaven and earth should pass away, yet would the divine promise, that the gates of hell should not prevail over the Church, remain inviolate, and be fulfilled to the very iota.

It was in these trying circumstances of the infant and hitherto persecuted Catholic Church, that Providence raised up the first christian Emperor, Constantine, and disposed him to co-operate with Pope Sylvester in convening a general council of the chief Pastors of the Church, in order that the progress of error might be crushed, by the sentence of that tribunal, which Christ commanded to be obeyed, under the awful threat that he should be reputed as the Heathen and the Publican, who should evince contumacy or proudly offer resistance to its supreme authority. In the council of Nice, accordingly, three hundred and eighteen Bishops assembled together, from every part of christendom. Of these venerable personages, many had conversed with, and had grown up under Pastors, who had themselves received from the immediate disciples of the Apostles, the sacred deposit of faith and morals, in the same integrity, in which that had been commended by Paul to Timothy in these memorable words. "O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust avoiding the profane novelties of words, and the things which thou hast heard of me by many witnesses, the same commend to faithful men, who shall be fit to teach others also."

Among the Fathers who had assembled at Nice from the various provinces of Europe, Africa, and Asia, Eusebius affirms, that some were eminent for wisdom, some for their Apostolic labors and venerable gravity of deportment, some for gentleness and affability, and finally, some who were still young, were conspicuous for the vigor and energy of their mind and body. "If," remarks the Protestant Bishop Bull, "the supposition be made, that on the awful question of the divinity of Christ, all the Prelates of the Church both fell on this occasion into grievous error, and persuaded their respective flocks to adopt the same mistaken belief, how shall the words of Christ stand firm, in which he promised to remain until the consummation of the world with his Apostles, and therefore with their successors. For, as the promise of Christ extends to the end of time, and as the Apostles were not to live so long, it must be held, that in the person of the Apostles, Christ addressed his words to the successors of the Apostles also."

The Church then, observes the illustrious Bossuet, was, according to the learned Protestant just quoted, infallible in her doctrinal decisions, delivered by the Council of Nice, and this inferrancy she derived from the promises of Christ. "Will Bishop Bull permit me to ask," continues Bossuet, "if the divine promises of Christ to the Church were to hold good, only until the fourth century; or, are we to suppose, that, in that century, the Apostolical succession of chief Pastors failed and became extinct."

To apply all that has been advanced on the Nicene Council to the subject, which by this example, we undertook to illustrate, a very few words will abundantly suffice. If the Providence of God permitted his Church to suffer, for a time, all the evils of persecution, and the still greater affliction of beholding so many of her children seduced from her Communion by the heresy of Arius, yet was the evil mitigated, and even made subservient to the well-being of Christianity, because, by means of it, a blaze of refulgent evidence was collected around one of the principal mysteries of religion, the splendor of which endures to the present day, and instead of decaying, will acquire fresh lustre, according as ages roll away.

It is impossible to read over the history of each of the almost countless heresies, which from the time of Arius to the present have been introduced, and not distinctly notice the silent but sure Providence, which so guides and controls their progress as to render them, as it were, tributary to the cause of Catholicity, by their unceasing fluctuations in doctrine, and by the eternal incurable dissensions which are ever attendant on them. Who, for example, could have thought a few years since, that, whilst in Ireland, Calvinism would openly, in great part, degenerate into Unitarianism or Arianism, it would, in Scotland, the second land of its nativity, accomplish, of itself, the destruction of the national Church, and hold up as mercenaries and renegades the Pastors who continued to adhere to that Church,—those Pastors, whom, hitherto, Presbyterians revered as their lawful Shepherds, and who had never, by misconduct or disobedience to any recognised tribunal, forfeited the claim they previously might have had to the Pastoral office. For we cannot suppose that the Pastors of whom we speak are regarded by their present adversaries, as having been intruders and unlawful from the very moment, when they were first nominated by their respective Patrons to the benefices they enjoy. For, if that supposition were admitted, it would thence necessarily follow, that, up to the late revolution, the whole Church of Scotland was placed under an unlawful Ministry, and therefore a false Church. On the other hand, if the Clergy of the national or endowed Church were a lawful Ministry, whilst the Church was connected with Government, they must retain still all their Pastoral authority, as they have not been deprived of it by any competent authority.

LIGHTS USED AT FUNERALS.

We have been favored with a second letter from A SUBSCRIBER regarding the usage of Lights at Catholic Funerals, and we have thought it prudent not to insert the letter, because we are of opinion that it belongs to the Archbishop only to interfere with and modify the Religious Usages which prevail here. So long as His Grace permits them, it is sufficient for every good Catholic to attend to them, as there must be some prudent reasons for their continuance. As to the charity to be dispensed to the poor by savings effected by the suppression of lights at funerals, the remark is like that made in regard to the precious Ointment expended by the woman in anointing our Saviour. The probability is, that instead of the saving going to benefit the poor, it would be employed in some dissipation. If A SUBSCRIBER could prescribe some economy in the very extravagant and sinful feasting too often prevailing here at Marriages, he would be the means of doing great good, for which gratitude would be due to him.

The following selection from Rock's Hierurgia on the usage of Lights at Funerals will, we trust, set the question at rest.

An observance which was practised at the initiation of the faithful into the mysteries of religion, was sedulously employed when their mortal remains were consigned to the sepulchre.

Eusebius the historian, has noticed in a particular manner, the unusual number of lights placed upon golden candlesticks which produced such a powerful effect upon the crowd of spectators who came to view the funeral obsequies of Constantine the Great*. St. Gregory Nazianzen†, in the description which he gives of the funeral honours rendered to his brother Cæsarius, in the oration which he pronounced upon him, mentions that their mother accompanied the corpse to the place of sepulture, and bore a lighted taper in her hand. Another St. Gregory, the highly gifted bishop of Nyssa, and younger brother to the great St. Basil, referring to the obsequies of his sister Macrina, mentions that a great concourse of people encircled the bier, and that a numerous body from amongst the clergy, drawn up in long array and holding lights in their hands, preceded it. St. Jerom informs us‡ that the body of St. Paula was carried by bishops to its place of interment. Some portion of the prelates supported the bier upon their shoulders, and the others went before with lighted tapers in their hands. Theodoret§, recording the translation of the eloquent St. Chrysostom's body from Comana to Constantinople, remarks that

* Euseb. in vita Const.

† Naz. in Orat. x. in Cæsarium, tom. i. p. 169.

‡ In his 27th Epistle which is directed to Eustachius.

§ He was bishop of Cyprus, and continuator of the history of the Church from the epoch at which that of Eusebius leaves off, which was at the year 22, and brings his narration down to 428.

such a multitude of people proceeded in ships and every kind of vessel to meet the precious relics, in their passage across the Bosphorus, that the very sea was radiant and twinkling with the lamps*.

The meaning of this custom is assigned to us by St. Chrysostom himself, who informs us that it was usual to carry lights before the dead, to signify that they were champions or conquerors, and as such, were borne in triumph to their graves†. This ancient custom is still kept up in Catholic countries. Every one who has travelled in any part of Italy, must have oftentimes observed, that not even the very poorest individual there, is ever conveyed to the grave without some few attendants, who walk by the bier, with lighted torches in their hands, reciting a prayer for the soul of the departed. Lamps and torches were lighted in the day, to signify Christian joy, and to exhibit respect and honour to the departed, as to a victorious combatant, who had vanquished this world here below; and was now proceeding to take possession of a brighter and a better world above‡.

CONVERSION OF DR. CHARLTON.

We learn on good authority that the considerations which greatly influenced Dr. Charlton to renounce the Baptist and embrace the Catholic Faith are the following:—

About eight months ago he was much prejudiced against our Holy Religion. He had been taught to believe that we held the most abominable doctrines and that the Pope, Cardinals, Bishops and Priests were all ministers of iniquity and all going straight to hell. But when he saw from our professions of Faith, our books of controversy and devotion, that we abhorred the doctrines that were imputed to us; when he compared the zeal and disinterestedness of the Catholic Missionaries in Madras, China, Cochin China and all over the world, and their success in making converts, with that of their calumniators, the weakness of a cause which required calumny to prop it up became evident to him. Again, the divisions among Protestants, taking their rise from their fundamental principle of private judgment, and the obstinacy with which they pretend to prove their contradictory systems from Scriptures, strongly contrasted with the unity of Doctrine among Catholics of all ages and nations—the antiquity of the Catholic Church—the holiness of its founders, Christ and his Apostles—the constancy with which it has opposed errors in all ages, showed clearly its superiority over Protestantism, whose origin is so recent, whose founders Henry the Eighth, Cranmer, Luther, and Calvin were men of the most abandoned characters. Whilst a Protestant, like Spencer, Sibthorp, &c. &c., he was tossed about by every wind of doctrine, but he has now learned not to trust too much to his private judgment in the interpretation of the Scripture which he would be exposed to wrest to his own perdition, but to receive with humility the interpretation put on it by the Church of Christ, the pillar and ground of truth, against which the gates of hell will never prevail.

* By the 59th of the Justinian novels, a prohibition was issued to the acolytes of Constantinople, by which they were forbidden to exact a fee for their torches, since from the public fund which had been established in the imperial city for the interment of the dead, a certain stipend had been assigned to these ecclesiastics for their attendance at funerals.

CHINA.

The following are extracts of a letter dated Chusan, China, 20th May, 1843, written by a Private in H. M.'s 55th Regt. to our Venerated Archbishop:

I took the liberty of addressing your Lordship a letter about 12 months ago. Since that time we have compelled the Emperor of China to come to our terms. On the breaking up of the force, the 55th Regiment was left to do duty in China one wing here and the other at Hong-Kong, notwithstanding that it should have been the first Corps in India to go home; being on foreign service upwards of 21 years, but it is well understood that this arose an account of our Senior Lieut. Colonel. (Schoedde) who is also an India Major General being so well adapted to the Command, and he but a short time ago, rejoined from a three years leave of absence. We praise and give thanks to God for his great kindness to us in sending three Missionaries who arrived in May, 1842. One remained in the city of Tinghae, and the other two proceeded to join the brethren at Nankin and arrived there just at the time our fleet and Army entered the great Yang Tse Kaing. There are a great number of Christians in Nankin with a Bishop and several Priests, but it is to be lamented that they are so much exposed to persecution by the Officials and Mandarins of the country. Were it not for that, China would in a short time be the greatest Christian country in the world. A Bishop arrived here about a month ago—at the time of his arrival, the Major General Commanding was formally dressed upwards of two hours waiting for him. His Lordship wore the dress of a Chinaman with a long beard and the plaiting of hair down the back. The Sunday following he came to Chapel and celebrated Mass, and appeared highly pleased at seeing the number of Communicants of Europeans, Sepoys, and Chinamen, a considerable number of the 2d Madras N. I. here stationed being Roman Catholics. After prayers, the Priest requested the Soldiery not to pay any compliment to the Bishop during his stay in or about the city, as it might be the means of bringing His Lordship to the notice of the Mandarins, when in the interior of the country, where he was then about to repair.

We have had the melancholy intelligence communicated to us at Chapel on Sunday last, that one Bishop 2 Priests and upwards of 250 Catholics were put to death sometime in the latter part of 1842, by a Chinese Prince whose dominion is situated between this and Pekin. I think the name of the place is "Corea"—the circumstances attending or rather that led to this deplorable event areas follows (as well as I could understand the Priest.) The son of this Prince was up to the city of Pekin to transact some business at the Imperial Court and having, by some means got acquainted with the Bishop then residing there, and having imbibed so much of the Christian principles that his father discovered it on his return, the father came to the brutal resolution of putting the whole of the Christians to death.

P. S. Lieut. Maquin, whom your Lordship will no doubt have remembered at Madras, is here, and is a very respectable Officer and much thought of by the Officers of the Regt. and is likely to be an ornament to the service. Mr. Warren is also well, they attend Chapel every Sunday. We have a comfortable Chapel, and a respectable congregation.

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.—The annual Examination and distribution of prizes of St. Xavier's College will take place on Tuesday next the 19th instant, at nine A. M. We refer the reader to the advertisement in the last page.

LETTER No. V.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Let us first take a cursory view of Protestant Catholicism under the head of 'Numbers,' and compare it with that of the Church of Rome; say, we reckon Protestants in a round number at 60 millions or so, this of course includes all 'Separatists'—all sects in one grand Total; it takes in from the lowest to the highest—from the youngest to the oldest—from Socialism to Church of Englandism—from Latter-day-Saints to Lutheranism. But Protestantism, even thus put together, falls far short of the Church of Rome in Catholicity or Universality, as to numbers; but let us sift all sects as it were in a sieve; indeed I can hardly think the Church of England for one, would stop in the same circle with Socialists, Jumpers, Ranters &c. let the smaller then fall through, and let us suppose there only remain, Lutheranism, Calvinism and Englandism, how insignificant they would now appear as to numbers; let again the Church of England be further winnowed, that she may even for a moment stand purely alone—let these two head sects be cast like chaff to the winds with Methodism, Unitarianism, Anabaptism, Socianism, Quakerism and fifty more at least such sects, and how perfectly ridiculous—how extremely puny—how like an infant clothed in the garb of a giant would she look under the mantle of Catholicity: why, my friends, she would shrink from the sight of her own nakedness—she would tremble at the smallness of her numbers; her numbers then would be but as an unit to the thousands of the Church of Rome; collectively then Protestantism is but a shadow; individually almost a nonentity; the Protestant Churches, and the Church of Rome may be said to stand respectively to each other, as little hillocks do to a mighty mountain, the one is lost sight of in the very shadow of the other; this then is the Catholicity of Protestantism as to numbers; if you attempt to draw a comparison between them, it is like making a dwarf stand up against a giant, to see which is the taller of the two.

We next come to Catholicity as to place,—it is true, some few members of Protestantism are spread so far as European power has extended; wherever Britain's flag waves, there some Protestants as well as Catholics are to be found, but as to place, in reference to numbers, the Protestant to the Catholic hardly holds a rood to the mile, or a province to a kingdom; take India as an instance, here the authority of Protestant England has been paramount for some ages, but can you distinguish one solitary Protestant among five hundred Catholics, for this may be about their relative numbers; beyond however the influence of European power—beyond the protection of the bayonet, the precincts of the camp, or the sway of the sword of state, Protestantism it may be said has not advanced; do you ever hear, for example, of Protestants being in the interior of China? "Oh! yes," I think, I hear, some of the old ladies exclaim, "Does not the greater part of the British Army now in China consist of Protestants?"— granted, for a moment, though the assumption is not true, but does the Protestant Missionary quit the British Camp and sacrifice his pay; does he show the virtue and strength of his faith by facing with only the Cross, I beg pardon, the Bible in his hand, the blazing fagots, and the bloody scaffolds of Japan and Ton-King? Does he wander alone through deep marshes and over arid deserts in search there of the lost heathen? does he for ever debar himself the society of a female companion, the tender and earthly ties of children? Does he, in fact, renounce home, relations, and all who are dear to him on earth, for all that are dear to him in heaven? Does he, I say, thus immolate himself wholly and entirely for the salvation of the poor pagan, like the Roman Catholic Missionary? No, no, this is not Protestantism; and the fruit of this is, that there are thousands upon thousands of Catholics at present in the interior of China, and not perhaps one single Protestant! Such then is our respective title to "Catholic," as to time, numbers and place, I shall in some future letter endeavour to show you something of our rights to "Catholicity" as to universal doctrine, when I hope to convince you that the Church of Rome is in this as universally above Protestantism, as she is in the other three points, viz. Time, Numbers, and Place,—facts, reason, and common sense then must give to the Church of Rome and her followers the name of "Catholic;" So I shall in future designate her "Catholic Church," and yours by its own appropriate term, "Protestant Church." There is much it is said in a name, and certainly the words "Catholic," and "Protestant" convey senses such deep and opposite import, that there is enough in them to form the subject of another letter.

I am, your's faithfully,

C. A. C.

SOCIETY OF JESUS.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—Your article in the Herald of the 19th instant must be my apology for this communication which might otherwise never have been written and which you will insert or not, as you think it likely to be of service. It has often struck me as a desideratum that some cheap work of readable dimensions should be published subversive of the numerous calumnies so industriously repeated against the venerable persecuted "Society of Jesus."

Such a work I feel to be needed not alone for the undeceiving of well disposed Protestants who imbibe these false impressions with their mother's milk; but also for the instruction of but too many otherwise well informed Catholics, who, born in a Protestant country, educated in all probability in Protestant schools, and having had access to few of any but Protestant Histories, are as biased against the order as their "separated brethren." Nor are these unworthy opinions of the most admirable, illustrious, and best deserving of religious communities confined to Protestants. I speak from experience, not from hearsay or fancy; and painful was the discovery of the fact: for having become a Catholic after most mature deliberations and study, during which the "ingenious devices" against the Jesuits were necessarily examined, and found to be as untrue and interested as the aspersions on the Faith they have so successfully propagated and defended. I could not have anticipated that on joining the Church I should find so many of her children tainted with the very prejudices that I had learnt to discard.

I suggest the work as a hint to such of your readers as may happily possess the time and means to make the compilation; or perhaps (these failing) one of the good Jesuits themselves may steal an occasional half hour from his day and night labors for the charitable purpose of making his Society better known, and so gaining many who might otherwise in their turn become revilers from inherited ignorance.

There is another work that I am sure would be of incalculable value in these days of sincere enquiry, and which, with the necessary command of books, would merely require patience and a little judgment to compile. I mean a "History mis-stated and stated," to consist of a selection of the most popular perversions of History respecting Catholics and the Church as regards particularly our own country, having the true accounts stated in juxtaposition, after the manner of the "Papist misrepresented and represented." There are many who still believe, for instance, that St. Thomas of Canterbury was a Traitor; and that the Massacre in Paris on St. Bartholomew's day, the famous Spanish Armada, the Gunpowder Plot, &c., were dictated by the principles of our religion; because perhaps they never in their lives read an account of their true political origins.

This latter work would in the first place form an interesting series of Articles in your useful Herald, each embracing a particular Historical point; and might afterwards be published in the shape of a Pamphlet for cheap or gratuitous distribution. The cost of publishing either of these little manuals could not, I presume, be very great, and might be defrayed by subscription. I should be thankful to have such little Truth-Tellers on my Book-shelf, as well to refresh my own memory as to lend to my enquiring acquaintances; and if you see any probability of the plan being adopted, I shall be glad to be called on for my contribution.

Your's faithfully,

UNUS.

P. S. In acknowledging my sketch of the Landour Chapel you expressed a hope that I would furnish you also with an account of its Opening Ceremony, but on enquiry I could only learn that it had been already blessed by Dr. Borghi under the tutelage of "JESUS AND MARY." Its first fruit however, (as if in reward to me for Superintending the building) was the conversion of my friend, the Officer mentioned in a recent number of your paper.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

DR. PUSEY'S SERMON.

The following is the preface to this much canvassed subject of controversy. The sermon itself would occupy nearly half our impression:—

"The true understanding of this fruition and union which is betwixt the body and the head, betwixt the true believers and Christ, the ancient Catholic fathers both perceiving themselves and commending to their people, were not afraid to call this supper, some of them, the salve of immortality and sovereign preservative against death; other, a deifical communion; other, the sweet dainties of our Saviour, the pledge of eternal health, the defence of faith, the hope of the resurrection; other, the food of immortality, the healthful grace, and the conservatory to everlasting life. All which sayings, both of holy Scripture and godly men, truly attributed to this celestial banquet and feast, if we would often call to mind. O, how would they inflame our hearts to desire the participation of these mysteries, and often times to covet after this bread, continually to thirst for this food!"—Homilies, 1st Part of the Sermon on the Sacrament.

PREFACE.

It is with pain that the following sermon is published; for it is impossible for any one not to foresee one portion of its effects; what floods, namely, of blasphemy against holy truth will be poured forth by the infidel, or heretical, or secular and anti-religious papers with which our church and country are at this time afflicted. It is like casting with one's own hands, that which is most sacred to be outraged and profaned. Still there seem to be higher duties, which require even this. The Gospel must be a savour unto life or a savour unto death; from the first it has been blasphemed wherever it has been preached. It has been blasphemed by Jews, Pagans, and each class of heretics as they arose; the Arians used blasphemous jests, taught the people blasphemous ballads, and profaned the holy eucharist; increase of scoffers and blasphemers are among the tokens of the last days; and yet the two witnesses are to bear testimony, though in sack-cloth. The more the truth prevails, the madder must the word become; the blasphemies with which holy truth is now assailed are but a token of its victories.

The first duty of a minister of Christ is to his little ones; for their sakes, lest any be perplexed in consequence of all which has been lately said, this sermon is published, and for them the following explanation is intended.

Nothing throughout the whole sermon was further from my thoughts than controversy. I had, on such occasions as my office afforded, commenced a course of sermons on the comforts provided by the gospel for the penitent amid the consciousness of sin, with the view to meet the charge of sternness involved by the exhibition of one side of Catholic truth; in this course, the sacred subject of the holy eucharist, of necessity, came in its order; and it was my wish (however I may have been hindered by sudden indisposition from developing my meaning as I wished) to point out its comforting character to the penitent in two ways:—1st, indirectly, because it is the body and blood of his Lord, and is the channel of His blessed presence to the soul; 2ndly, because in holy Scripture the mention of remission of sins is connected with it.

In essaying to teach this, I could not but forget controversy; having, in the commencement, warned against irreverent disputings, I lived for the time in holy Scripture and its deepest expositors, the Fathers, and was careful to use rather their language than my own, lest, on so high a subject, I should seem to speak over-boldly. Conscious of my own entire adherence to the formularies of my church, and having already repeatedly expressed myself on this subject, and in the very outset of this sermon conveyed at once that I believed the elements to "remain in their natural substances," and that I did not attempt to define the mode of the mystery, that they were also the body and blood of Christ, I had no fear of being misunderstood.

Once more to repeat my meaning, in order to relieve any difficulties which might (if so be) be entertained by pious minds, trained in an opposed and defective system of teaching before whom the sermon may now be brought. My own views were cast (so to speak) in the mould of the minds of Bishop Andrews and Archbishop Bramhall, which I regarded as the type of the teaching of our church. From them originally, and with them, I learned to receive in their literal sense, our blessed Lord's solemn words, "This is my body," and from them, while I believe the consecrated elements to become, by virtue of his consecrated words, truly and really, yet spiritually and in an effable way, His body and blood, I learned also to withhold my thoughts, as to the mode of this great mystery, but, "as a mystery" to "adore it." With the Fathers, then, and our own great divines (explaining, as I believe, the true meaning of our church*), I could not but speak of the consecrated elements as being what, since he has so called them, I believe them to become His body and blood; and I feared not, that, using their language, I should, when speaking of Divine and "spiritual" things, be thought to mean otherwise than "spiritually," or having disclaimed all thoughts as to the mode of their being, that any should suppose I meant a mode which our church disallows.

It remains only to say, that the notes (with a few exceptions) are such as, amid hurry and severe indisposition, I could, when my sermon was demanded, put together, with the view at once of showing those who were to pronounce upon it, that I had not used high language of my own mind, and that they might not unconsciously blame the Fathers, while they thought they were blaming myself only. They spread over the wider space, because, wholly unconscious what could be objected to, I was reduced to conjecture what it might be.

* As shown by the use of the ancient words, "The Body of our Lord Jesus Christ," (rejected in Edward VI., 2d book,) the Rubric "drinking" of the consecrated article, which declaring that the Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper, only after a spiritual and heavenly manner," by the use of the words "given and taken," shows that it calls that "the Body of Christ" which is "given" by the minister, "takes" by the people. (See Knox's Remains ii. p. 170.) In like way, the Catechism teaches that "The Body and Blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received of the faithful, in the Lord's Supper." The very strength of the words of the Rubric denying "the corporal Presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood" in itself implies (as we know of those who inserted that Rubric) that they believed everything short of this.

The appendix is now drawn up by a friend (the writer being disabled) with the same view, that some might be saved from objecting to what, though often taught, may be new to them, when they see that the same, or things much stronger, have been taught by a series of Divines in our church. It is not meant that some of these writers (e. g. Mede) are always consistent with themselves; it is meant only to show what has been taught, partly without rebuke, partly with authority, in our later English church. Nor has it been the object in the stronger passages of our writers; on the contrary, some stronger than any here quoted have been purposely passed by, out of a writer so universally received as G. Herbert*. The general tone of the doctrine has been the object chiefly had in view in the selection. Some of the materials of the Catena have been already used in previous explanations on the doctrine†.

Passages or phrases, here and there, in the sermon, were on account of the length of the whole, omitted in the delivery; they were inserted in the copy called for in brackets, as making the whole more authentic; these distinctions are now omitted, as needlessly distracting such as may read for edification, since in one instance only did the passages so omitted contain doctrine—viz., the words from the Fathers from “and by commingling” to “Divine nature.”

And now, may God have mercy on this His church! It is impossible not to see that a controversy has been awakened, which, from the very sacredness of the subject and the vagueness of the views of many, and the irreverence of the age, one should, of all others, most have deprecated. Yet things are in His hands, not in man's; and He who has so mercifully overruled every trial and every strife hitherto, to the greater good of this His church, will, we doubt not, if we obtain from Him patient hearts, so overrule this also; and if, since I can now speak in no other manner, I may, in this way, utter one word to the young, to whom I have heretofore spoken from a more solemn place, I would remind them how, almost prophetically, 16 years ago, in the volume which was the unknown dawn and harbinger of the re-awaking of deeper truth, this was given as the watch-word to those who should love the truth. “† In quietness and confidence shall be your strength.” There have been manifold tokens, that patience is one great grace which God is now calling forth in our church. “The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.” Sore then though it be to see, as we must see, the truth of God cast out, and spoken against, and trodden under foot of many, they who love it may well be patient, when He whose truth it is bears so patiently with us all; sure, that even when it seems to be trampled upon, it will thereby but sink the deeper into the “good ground” of the “honest and good heart,” thence to spring up multiplied, in His good time, “thirty, sixty, and a hundred fold.”

A VINDICATION OF CATHOLICS IN COMMUNION WITH THE SEE OF ROME;

As also a Declaration, Affirmation, and Confirmation, shewing their abhorrence of the following Tenets, commonly laid to their door; and they here bind themselves, that, if the ensuing Curses be added to those appointed to be read on the first Day of Lent, they will seriously and heartily answer Amen to them all.

To the Hon W. H. G.

DEAR SIR,

I. Cursed is he who commits idolatry, that prays to images or relics, or worships them for God.

R. Amen.

II. Cursed is every goddess worshipper, who believes the Virgin Mary to be any more than a creature, that honours her, worships her, or puts his trust in her more than in God; that believes her to be above her Son, or that she can in anything command him.

R. Amen.

III. Cursed is he who believes that the saints in heaven are his redeemer, or who prays to them as such, or that gives God's honour to them, or to any creature whatsoever.

R. Amen.

IV. Cursed is he that worships any broaden God, or who makes gods of empty elements of bread and wine.

R. Amen.

V. Cursed is he that believes priests can forgive sins, whether the sinner repents or not; or that there is any power on earth or in heaven that can forgive sins, without a sincere repentance, and a determined purpose of amendment.

R. Amen.

VI. Cursed is he who believes that there is any authority in the pope, or in any other person to give leave to commit sin, or to forgive him his sins for a sum of money.

R. Amen.

VII. Cursed is he who believes that, independent of the passion and merits of Christ, he can merit salvation by his own good works, or make condign satisfaction for the guilt of his sins, or the pains eternal due on account of them.

R. Amen.

VIII. Cursed is he who contemns the word of God, or who hides it from the people with the horrible idea of keeping them from their duty, and to hold them fast in ignorance and in error.

R. Amen.

IX. Cursed is he who undervalues the word of God; or that, forsaking the scriptures, prefers rather to follow human traditions than them.

R. Amen.

X. Cursed is he that leaves the commandments of God to observe the constitutions of men.

R. Amen.

XI. Cursed is he who omits any of the commandments, or who keeps the people from the knowledge of them, to the end that they may not have occasion to discover the truth.

* Both in his Poems and in his “Country Person,” which forms part of the Clergyman's Instructor, a work printed by the University, and recommended by Bishops to candidates for ordination.

R. Amen.

XII. Cursed is he who preaches to the people in an unknown tongue, such as they understand not, or makes use of any other means to keep them in ignorance.

R. Amen.

N. B.—The sacred councils command all the ministers of the universal church to preach to the people in their native tongues. The public service is performed in the western church in the Latin language, and in the eastern in the Greek language.

XIII. Cursed is he who believes that the pope can give a dispensation on any account whatsoever to swear falsely, or that it be lawful for any one, at the last hour, to declare himself innocent, in case he be guilty.

R. Amen.

XIV. Cursed is he who encourages sin, or who defers the amendment of his life on the presumption of a death-bed repentance.

R. Amen.

XV. Cursed is he who teaches that it is lawful to get drunk on a Friday or any fasting day though they must not taste the least morsel of flesh.

R. Amen.

XVI. Cursed is he who places religion in nothing but in a pompous display of ceremonies, and who teach not the people to serve God in spirit and in truth.

R. Amen.

XVII. Cursed is he who loves or promotes cruelty, who teaches people to be bloody-minded, to lay aside the meekness of Jesus Christ.

R. Amen.

XVIII. Cursed is he who teaches it to be lawful to do any wicked thing, though it be for the interest and good of our holy mother the Catholic church; or that any evil action may be done, that good may come from it.

R. Amen.

XIX. Cursed are we if amongst all those wicked principles and damnable doctrines commonly laid at our doors, any one of them be the faith of our church; and cursed are we if we do not as heartily detest all these hellish practices as they who so vehemently urge them against us.

R. Amen.

XX. Cursed are we if, in answering Amen to any of these curses, we use any equivocation, mental reservation, or do not assent to them in the common and obvious sense of the words.

R. Amen.

I may here be asked, can Catholics with a safe conscience answer Amen to all these curses? I reply, yes they can, and are ready to do it whenever and as often as it shall be required of them. Now permit me here to ask an enlightened public what opinion can they entertain of certain bigotted parsons who dare to charge these abominable doctrines on the faith of the church of Rome? "Is a lying spirit in the mouths of all the prophets? Are they all gone aside? do they backbite with their tongues, do evil to their neighbour, and take up reproach against their neighbour?" I will say no such thing, but will leave an enlightened public to judge. One thing I can safely assert: that Catholics are shamefully misrepresented; but our great consolation is that Christ has said to his followers, "You shall be hated by all men" (Matt. x. 22); and St. Paul, "We are made a spectacle unto the world." We do not doubt that he who bears this with patience shall, for every loss, and for every contempt which he suffers here below, receive an hundred fold in heaven. "And the base things of the world, and the things that are contemptible hath God chosen, and things that are not, that he might bring to nought things that are."—1 Cor. i. 28.

I am delighted to find by your last letter that you are going to follow my advice, and to place yourself under the guidance of a very learned and pious Catholic divine. This is as it should be; and in conclusion I beg to assure you that I am always at your command, and believe me, in haste,

Your's most sincerely,

VERAX,

A CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

P. S.—I could not help smiling when you informed me in your last letter that your parson told you that everything necessary for salvation was contained in the bible. Your answer was excellent, and which you extracted as you informed me from the remark of a Catholic theologian which I had the pleasure of presenting to you, viz, "That three creeds are not there, nor the four first councils; that there is nothing expressly prohibiting polygamy or rebaptization in it, nor expressly assuming three distinct persons in one divine nature, nor the Son's consubstantiality to the Father, nor the procession of the Holy Ghost from both, or that the Holy Ghost be God, nor for the necessity of infant baptism, nor for the changing of the Saturday into Sunday, &c. &c. all of which, notwithstanding, are necessary to be believed by the whole church. Nor is it sufficient that we believe all that the bible contains, unless we also believe it in the true sense, and be able to refute all heresies out of it (I speak of the whole church) which she can never do without the rule of apostolical tradition in any of the points mentioned."

PERSECUTION IS NOT A CATHOLIC TENET.

It has been sufficiently demonstrated that the Inquisition is a political institution, and that, although it did sometimes inflict the penalty of death upon heretics, yet it was not the spiritual members of this tribunal who passed this sentence, or who even so much as concurred in it. They had, indeed, as the nature of their office compelled them to do, examined in the case of the accused, the allegations which were brought against him; and where the evidences of his heretical or infidel opinions were manifest and incontestable, they but simply declared them such. With the subsequent punishments inflicted upon the criminal they had nothing at all to do. These were the business of the civil power alone.

However, as the tribunal was composed of a certain number of ecclesiastical and religious members, it has for this reason pleased the injustice and the prejudices of our English writers, not only to impute to these all the odium of its alleged cruelties, but even to contend that the persecution of heretics is one of the tenets of our religion. This accusation may be found in almost every work that has been composed against our religion. It has been of late—and it is so still—with mischievous effect, bawled into the ears of the public, in different halls, taverns, &c., by a set of holy, and for the most part well paid fanatics. Nay, it is even re-echoed constantly through those walls were nothing but the language of charity and the voice of justice should be heard.

Now, the real fact is, that persecution, so far from being a tenet of the Catholic Church, is a direct violation both of its maxims and its professions. For so far from claiming any right to punish heretics with death, she positively disclaims any such prerogative or power. The principle which she adopts and maintains is that of Tertullian, "It belongs not to religion to force religion." According to the dictates of its canon law, so averse is the church to the spilling of human blood, that no one can be promoted to any holy orders, nor exercise the duties of holy orders, who has even concurred to the death or mutilation of any human being, although such acts had taken place either on the occasion of a just war, or under the circumstances of a judicial proceeding. Thus, whenever any ecclesiastical judge, or spiritual tribunal, pronounced or pronounces any individual guilty of obstinate heresy, or impiety, such judge, or tribunal, declared or declares at the same time that their authority extends no farther than such decision. It was so even in the case of John Huss. The Council of Constance, after having convicted him of heresy declared that beyond this its power was void and of no effect.

We may trace the true spirit of the church during those periods—the middle ages, for example—when its authority was raised to the highest pitch. During those ages, although it condemned heresies and schisms, and excommunicated the authors and promoters of them, yet it never inflicted upon these men either the penalty of death, nor yet any corporal punishment at all. It was so in the cases of Felix D'Urgel, Gotescalc, Berengarius, Abelard, Marsilius of Padua, Wycliff, &c. The church never visited these heresiarchs by any bodily inflictions.

It is remarked by O'Driscoll, in his History of Ireland, that during the periods when the Catholics were predominant in that country, in the time of Mary, Charles the First, and James the Second, "there never existed in that country a penal code against Protestantism. They made no law excluding their Protestant countrymen—a singular instance of moderation in Catholicity, while the whole history of Protestantism in Ireland is, in theory, liberty; in practice, intolerance." "It is," he adds, "much to the credit of the Irish Catholics, that, satisfied with a quiet and peaceable restoration of their faith, they in no instance persecuted or disturbed those who still thought proper to profess the religion of the Reformation." The learned and eloquent Sir H. Parnell, speaking of the reign of Mary, says: "Such was the general toleration of this reign in Ireland, that many English Protestants, took refuge in it, and there enjoyed their opinions and worship without molestation." "The Irish Roman Catholics," he adds, "are the only sect that ever resumed power without exercising vengeance." * * * And the reign of Mary closed unstained by the crimes of any holy persecution in Ireland."

But is it then meant to assert or insinuate that Mary was not a persecutor? In Ireland she was not. In England, unhappily, she was. And the Catholic condemns and reprobates her cruelties and her whole conduct in this regard, as much as does the most humane or bigoted Protestant. She persecuted, but then—for this is what alone I am now maintaining—she did so, not in consequence nor in virtue of any tenet of her religion. In the instruction sent to her by the Pope for the regulation of her government, there is no exhortation to adopt any kind of severity or persecution. Burnet himself remarks that in the Synod which was held in London by the Pope's legate, Cardinal Pole, and the Catholic Bishops, there was not any recommendation whatever to employ any kind of severity against the Protestants. Collier indeed remarks, that the Bishops, "to do them justice," as he says, "openly declared against these sanguinary methods, as did also Alphonsus, King Philip's confessor." In the case even of Bonner and Gardener—the alleged authors and promoters of the cruelties which were exercised during this reign—it is no where so much as insinuated by either of them that they inflicted those severities in virtue of any doctrine of the Catholic Church. The sole reasons and the only motives which those prelates, and the other advocates for the measures of persecution, ever cited in vindication of their conduct, were exclusively founded upon the maxims of policy and the pretences of necessity.

I would not seem to excuse, much less to justify, any part of the cruelties of the above persecutors. I consider their conduct as detestable, and, in fact, alike impolitic as detestable. However, it still cannot be denied that there were many circumstances and provocations which tend in some measure to extenuate their conduct. Mary, and her religion, were constantly and very grossly insulted. It was even at the risk of their lives that her clergy, in many places, ventured to exercise their functions. The whole conduct of the Protestant faction was violent and rebellious. This faction was composed of many of the leading nobility, gentry, and clergy, who had conspired to dethrone the Queen, in the first instance, by setting up Jane Gray; and subsequently, by rising up in arms under the Duke of Suffolk and the rebel Wyatt. Mary's life was attempted, and her death was publicly prayed for, while books and pamphlets of the most seditious character were published, and prodigally circulated, against her, composed particularly by the refugees in Germany and Geneva, and by Knox, Goodman, &c., in Scotland. Such, and many such as these, were the provocations, which during the whole short career of her reign, the Protestants gave to Mary, to awaken her anger and displeasure. They were far from justifying persecution; but they would have justified measures—even strong measures—of prudence and precaution. In regard of the horrible burning of Cranmer and his fellow prelates, it may not be amiss to remark, that they were condemned and executed by those very laws which themselves had enacted and put in force against the Anabaptists.

The argument, however, by which the Protestant writers most triumphantly affect to prove that the persecution of heretics is a tenet of the Catholic religion, is the third canon of the fourth council of Lateran. This is the argument, which may be found repeated in all the above writers on the subject of persecution, and which is still loudly re-echoed from half the pulpits of the nation. Now, in the first place in a merely critical point of view, it might be denied—as in fact it is denied by many Catholics—that the above canon, relating to the persecution of heretics, is really the act or decree of the council itself. "Il est certain," says Dupin, a favourite writer with the Protestants, "il est certain, que ces chapitres," containing the canon—" ne sont pas l'Ouvrage du Concile, mais celui D'Innocent III." In the next place it might be maintained, as also it is maintained by several, that this third canon is not genuine. This is even the opinion of Collier (vol. ii., p. 424). However, be all this as it may—for the aforesaid points are not essential to the question—the fact still is, that the alleged canon is neither defined, nor decreed, nor proposed, as a tenet, or as any article of Catholic faith. It is decreed, and proposed, simply as a matter of external discipline, enacted for a particular occasion, and adapted to a particular case or cause. Thus it is with many of the canons of the council of Trent relating to points of discipline. These are neither considered by the Catholics as articles of faith, nor were they ever, or at present, admitted in various kingdoms. So also with regard to the aforesaid canon of Lateran, it neither is now, nor was it ever, looked upon by the Catholics as any tenet of our religion; as in fact—the cause of its formation having long since ceased—it is now completely a dead letter.

It is also an observation which should be made in relation to the fourth council of Lateran, that it was not a merely ecclesiastical or spiritual council. It was a council or congress of the Christian world—a temporal alike as a clerical convocation. It was called together and assembled for the welfare and peace of states as well as for the protection and tranquility of the Church. For this reason, besides the prelates and members of the Church, there were present in it, either personally or by their ambassadors, the Kings of France, England, Hungary, Arragon, Sicily, the Emperor of Greece and Italy, the Princes of Jerusalem, Cyprus, &c. The aim and subject of their deliberations were, how to arrest the progress and suppress the mischiefs of a heresy, whose principles were as destructive of morality as they were ruinous of Christian piety. For, as Moheim and many other Protestant historians admit, never did there exist a more impious, detestable, and seditious sect than the Albigenses. The cause of the council, in fact, was the cause of human nature, not less than Christianity. At the same time, the decrees of the council relating to these heretics extended only through the limits where they prevailed. Beyond these, or elsewhere, they were neither executed nor yet molested—The Rev. J. Fletcher D. D.

ORIENTAL MISSIONS.

A letter from Mesopotamia states that the rivalry between the Protestant and Catholic missions continues with much ardour on both sides. Two American Methodist missionaries, assisted by a Nestorian bishop, are erecting a large house and schools among the Chaldean mountaineers. They perfidiously assured the Nestorian patriarch, that they did not come with the intention of preaching a new religion, for his religion was good, and their sole purpose was to civilize his people. To conceal more effectually their real intentions, they publicly observed the fasts, abstinences and other practices of the Nestorian church. They even went so far as to receive the communion from the hands of the priests—they who neither believe in the real presence nor in the divine institution of the priesthood. But it appears that any means that will but further their schemes seems to them both just and laudable. It is thus that they interpret the admirable lesson of Saint Paul, that we must be all in all with one another. The missionaries caused to be published in the English and United States journals that they had, in a great measure, converted the entire Jacobite population. A reinforcement of three other missionaries was immediately sent off to their aid; but what was the surprise of the Jacobites when they heard the strange missionaries lay claim to the direction of their own church. "We do not know you," replied the Nestorians, "we will belong to neither the American church nor the English church." A negro bishop, whom the American missionaries had brought at a great expence from India, and whom they hoped to impose on the Jacobites, drew upon himself, on this occasion, the animadversions of the whole country, and was obliged to fly. It was discovered that he was sold to the Protestant missionaries, and he was chased from the country. But another incident, not less curious, has fixed our attention. It appears that the English missionaries are real Puseyites, and the Methodists find that they are too favourable to Catholicism; consequently divisions have sprung up among them, and there seems little probability of their coming to a reconciliation. In this dilemma they have divided the mission into two parts; the Americans will take the mountains of Kurdistan, and the English will reserve to themselves the town of Massoul and its environs. It is not thus with the Catholic missionaries. Although they belong to different nations and are members of different religious orders, yet their symbol and their object are the same, and they are united in one common bond of indissoluble charity. The Italian Dominicans, and the Spanish Capuchians, and the French Lazarists, all labour with the same zeal in the destruction of the common enemy, and in spreading abroad the conquests of unity.—L'Univers et l'Union Catholique.

"The question," says the right rev. prelate, "which concerns the right interpretation of the Articles, is intimately connected with that which relates to the foundation upon which they rest. If we desire to prove whether the doctrine set forth in any Article be true, our single ultimate reference is to the written Word of God, which we believe to contain all truths, a knowledge whereof is necessary to salvation; and so to contain them, that by the diligent use of the ordinary means of instruction in the Church, and with prayer for God's enlightening grace, they may be certainly discovered therein. This absolute completeness of the Holy Scriptures, as the source and proof of our faith, I hold to be a vital doctrine of our Reformed Church. It is our duty, in searching those inspired records, to avail ourselves of all the helps to a right understanding of them placed within our reach; to ascertain, when it is possible, the sense in which they were understood by the disciples and immediate successors of the apostles, and which was derived from them to the early Church at large: to take the creeds received by the Church for our guides: but not to look to them, nor to traditions of any kind, as being so necessary, that Holy Scripture, without them, would not have been sufficient to teach all things requisite to salvation.

"I think it a mistaken and dangerous position to maintain, that without the creeds we could not have discovered for ourselves some of the great doctrines of our faith, that, for instance, of the Holy and Undivided Trinity. To suppose that the Spirit of God dictated the materials only of saving truth to be written by his inspired servants, while he communicated the right interpretation of them, not to be committed to writing till after a considerable period of time, is surely an hypothesis of the most unreasonable and improbable kind: yet this is the position which must ultimately be taken by those, who maintain that the Bible could not have been fully understood without the creeds. The creeds have indeed, a priori, a claim to our attention, as having been delivered to us by the Church: but they are entitled to our assent no further than as they are contained in Holy Scripture, or may be proved thereby. This is the ground upon which our own Church requires us to receive and believe the creeds, 'that they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture.' (Art. viii.) I set a very high value upon these ancient formularies of Catholic belief: but I am firmly persuaded, that if no such formularies had ever been drawn out, all the essential doctrines of Christianity would have been discoverable in the Bible. The implement with which the secrets of God are to be dug out of the mine of his written Word is not tradition; but a plain, and rightly-informed understanding, guided by an honest and good heart, and aided by the Holy Spirit.

"At the same time tradition is of excellent use in establishing historical facts, as, for example, the appointment of bishops to govern all the Churches, and of the Lord's day, as the day of public worship; the general prevalence of infant baptism, and some other points; in teaching us the practical inferences, drawn by the primitive Church from the truths declared in Holy Scripture, and so guiding us to its interpretation of Holy Scripture itself, such as the right of our Saviour to divine worship, and the implied assertion of a Trinity of Persons in the form of Baptism: and in making us historically acquainted with the belief of that Church in general; with which belief if, our own be found to coincide, we have not an absolute proof, but a very strong presumptive evidence, of its being indeed that faith which was once delivered unto the saints." (Jude iii. —pp. 20-2)

We will not here stop to inquire how we are to reconcile the many irreconcilable propositions contained in this singular passage. Rule upon rule, one overlaying or contradicting the other,—the more especially when brought into juxtaposition with those which have preceded them. Their opposition is so pointedly manifest, that it were a waste of words to expose it. It would be "holding a farthing candle to the sun;" for it is as clear as noon-day. How are we to interpret for ourselves, and yet yield submission to the sense and will of the Church? If our investigation led us to the sense of the Church in some points, it would, after all, be mere hazard: for there are thousands who have discovered a different, perhaps the very opposite, meaning, in the same text; nay, do we not daily hear of antagonist interpretations of the very same article of her own "ancient formularies," even amongst her own acknowledged children? While, to the sense of other points, the most laborious research could never conduct us; for the bishop himself avers, that for them there is no most certain warrant of holy Scripture. If, for example, he searches the Scriptures, to establish the validity of infant baptism, he is at fault at once, and must either remain outside the Church, or violate this his favourite principle to enable him to enter it. Finding himself in this dilemma, it becomes necessary that he should extricate himself from it; and how does he accomplish it? By adopting two rules,—one diametrically opposed to the other! One, to bring him within the pale of Christianity, and to enable him to believe certain high and fundamental points which have been incorporated with the formularies of his Church, in spite of her own rule which should exclude them,—giving colouring and authority to those articles which they have defined in a sense which, by the other rule (the single ultimate reference to, and the personal interpretation of, the written word) they never could have had. So far the right reverend prelate is consistent in his inconsistency: he but follows the doctrine of his Church;—"Whatsoever is not read therein (in Holy Scripture), nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." "Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in such wise, as they be generally set forth to us in holy Scripture; and, in our doings, that will of God is to be followed, which we have expressly declared unto us in the word of God;" and "although the Church be a witness and a keeper of holy writ, yet, as it ought not to decree anything against the same, so, besides the same, ought it not to enforce anything to be believed for necessity of salvation." And yet, with all this, it is decreed, that "the Church hath authority in controversies of faith!" In what controversies? Why, in this very controversy on infant baptism. This it decides, not only without any express declaration in Scripture, but even in apparent contradiction to Scripture! "He who believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." How can an infant believe? Is not the belief to precede, or at least to accompany, the baptism?

While, therefore, they have this advantage in their double rule, that it extricates them from numerous dilemmas, it has likewise its countervailing inconvenience of throwing them into endless difficulties; and one is, that they who reflect and reason cannot by any possibility adopt them both. And this is peculiarly our case; seeing them in absolute contradiction one to the other, we must needs choose between them, and selecting one, we must take leave to show why we must abandon the other.

But, not to enter at large upon the wide and luxuriant field into which we are carried by the above quotation, which, as we have already observed, is too evidently calculated for a double purpose—as a protest against the Catholic uses of tradition, and yet as an ingenious means of turning it to the account of Protestant interests, where and when it might seem to suit—we will content ourselves by putting a few more pertinent questions, as we consider them, in the hope of inducing the right reverend prelate to come forth from the labyrinth in which he seems so wilfully to have entangled himself, and in which—like the bird which hides its head beneath its wing, and then fancies itself concealed, though the whole body be exposed to view—he would fain imagine that he was happily hidden from the penetrating rays of the inquiring minds of others, who may perchance have studied these questions as deeply as himself.

In the first place, we would take leave to ask the right reverend prelate, how he proves his rule by his rule? How does he prove, by a reference to the written Word of God, that even “the creeds delivered to us by the Church are entitled to our assent no further than as they are contained in Holy Scripture, or may be proved thereby?” “This is the ground,” says he, “upon which our own Church requires us to receive and believe the creeds, that they may be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture.” Now, between the requirements of the Church on the one hand, and THE MOST CERTAIN warrants of holy Scripture on the other, we still venture to ask,—and we do so for our information,—upon what ground is it that the great saving truths of Christianity are received? If upon the authority of the Church, then the Church, and not the Scripture, is the supreme judge. If upon the authority of Scripture, we yet presume to demand upon what authority are the Scriptures themselves received? If upon the authority of the Church, then has the Church surely as good a right to interpret their true sense, as to determine their true wording, to substantiate their respective authenticity amidst the multitude of claims to similar honour, and to decide upon the nature and extent of their inspiration! For not one of these things, it is obvious and manifest to any reader of the Bible or of ecclesiastical history, is to be discovered and determined by any most certain warrant of Holy Scripture itself. Is it anywhere asserted in the Scripture, that the Scriptures are an independent rule of faith? Anywhere, that they are an incorruptible and unadulterated text, consisting of so much and no more? Anywhere, that they are written under the peculiar inspiration of God, as a most certain warrant to guide us upon all controverted points? These simple questions, which occur to us at the first flush, must be answered satisfactorily, before we can either defer to the doctrine of the right reverend prelate, or understand the ground upon which he intends to take up his position, as the champion of orthodoxy.

VIRGINIA-STREET AUXILIARY CATHOLIC INSTITUTE.—A numerous meeting of this Auxiliary was held, on last Tuesday evening, at the Hall in Cable-street, at which much business was done, and in one resolution, spoken to by the Rev. Mr. Moore, Mr. Smith general secretary, Mr. Johnstone, and others, the meeting pledged itself to do all in its power to redeem the pledge which the Rev. Mr. Moore had given on the part of that Auxiliary, viz. to enrol 3,000 Associates by the next annual meeting of the parent Institute. During the evening, amidst great laughter and applause, the following Proclamation was read to the meeting, and which we have been requested to insert in our columns:—

“Issued from the High Court of Pandemonium, in the Regions of Tartarus, the supreme Throne of his Infernal Majesty, Apollyon, alias Beelzebub.

“To all our true and loving subjects in the upper regions of Terra Firma, greeting.

“Knowing the great pleasure you have in all anarchy, discord and wickedness, and your constant opposition to those laws and institutions which issue from the Court of Heaven, the supreme seat of our mighty and implacable enemy, we feel sure that nothing is wanted on our part to secure your continued co-operation but the mere suggestion of our wishes, and those inspirations with which we have faithfully engaged always to assist our devoted servants. You are fully aware of the great aversion and most indignant hatred we have towards the Roman Catholic Church, that hot-bed of sanctity; you know that in our inmost souls we abhor and detest her doctrines, because, being true, they are most prejudicial to our interests and destructive to our kingdom; you know full well that, at her first establishment, we did all we could by our trusty agents, the Roman emperors, to destroy her by shedding the blood of her children, and that, when we found that device to fail, and were moreover forsaken by that renegade, we sowed the seeds of schism and heresy in her fields by our trusty and well beloved Arius, and other our devoted children, whom we are now well rewarding for their fidelity. But, to pass over many ages, we cannot forget the services rendered to our cause by old Harry and young Bess in that terrific overthrow of all her splendid establishments in our dear England, that there is scarcely left a stone upon a stone of her ancient edifices; yet we feel somewhat displeased with our children that they should allow even those to remain so many ages as they have, and we desire that they may be all speedily swept away, that the curious may not ask any questions concerning them.

“But to hasten to the more immediate object of this our communication to you, we desire you to know that we have felt much alarm and dismay at the great and rapid progress made by that society of scoundrels calling themselves the Catholic Institute of Great Britain. Be it known to you, therefore, that it is our wish and command that you exert yourselves to the utmost of your power in thwarting their efforts and counteracting their influence, and we trust you will have a goodly meeting of humbugs at Exeter Hall at your very earliest convenience, and let our devoted friends, Cummings, Slocumb, Stowell, McNeil, and others, do their duty manfully.

“We understand, moreover, that this Catholic Institute, as it is called, intends a great gathering in the coming month of May—a month which has always been hallowed by our dear No-Popery children for the goodly purpose of raising a hue and cry, and kicking up a dust about indulgences, priestly absolutions, and purgatory, to the great dismay of all the old ladies who visit Exeter Hall, and rendering them most vindictive and bitter towards all Catholics.

“We have heard moreover, more and more, that a Rev. Father Moore, as he is called, of Virginia-street chapel, has already done more than any other priest in extending the Institute, and that he has got more members and more money than any other Moore in the world; and, by the bye, we are determined to do more for him if he does any more: so let Father Moore look to it more and more. We are informed more over that this Rev. Moore has designed to do still more, and that he has pledged himself to enrol three thousand associates in this society by the next month, and to lay down three thousand shillings on the table at their great meeting.

“Be it known unto you, therefore, our trusty and well beloved servants, Malice, Sloth, and Inquiference, that we command you to do all in your power to impede his progress and to disappoint him in his expectations; meanwhile your worthy brethren of the Protestant Operative Association will be at work in the business about which we have set them.

"Given under our hand and seal in the Court of Pandemonium, this 25th day of April, 1843.

SCOTLAND.

PENTECOST IN EDINBURGH.—The Edinburgh Courier, speaking of the emptiness and desertion of the Established Churches in the Scotch metropolis on this great feast, thus describes the Catholic Churches on the same occasion:—"On turning to the Catholic Church—to St. Margaret's—St. Patrick's—and St. Mary's—there he would have found the spirit of truth, unity, and devotion. There was some difficulty in getting through the crowd at the door of St. Mary's: but, on entering, the sight was magnificent. The entire body of the church was completely filled, the three aisles being lined with military. Advancing up the centre aisle, through their open ranks, the richness of the altar decorations exceeded anything ever witnessed in Edinburgh, perhaps even in Catholic times. Its stiles and framing, enriched by beautiful carved mouldings, and finished in lapis lazuli; its exquisitely carved Gothic tracery panels, and carved columns, finished in the finest gilding, relieved by the crimson back ground, and the richly-formed grating of the Saxon letters I. H. S., opening, as it were, to the venerated relics that are preserved within;—all tended to exalt our impressions of the Supreme Being, when contemplating the beauty of the works even of his creatures. The tabernacle can scarcely be adequately described. It is formed of the richest Gothic, with four circular corners, and over them canopies, carved in tracery of the same character, with pinnacles and flying buttresses. Above it rises a delicately-shaped canopy, or niche, supported by flying buttresses, finished with numerous pinnacles, in the front and two sides of which are three finely-executed figures, and the whole is surmounted by a crucifix, beautifully executed, and having the emblems of the four Evangelists on the corners. But the door of the tabernacle, as it was the first object to attract attention on entering the church, so the eye scarcely ever overlooks it. Formed of fine brass, richly gilded and burnished, its effect is admirable from every part of the Church. On it and on the plinth are engraved, in beautiful antique style, illuminated in red and blue, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Credo, and other prayers. And at the Gospel and Epistle ends of the step on which the tabernacle stands there is a Gothic frame, supported by carved foliage, containing the last Gospel of St. John, and the prayers at the Offertory, in letters of red and blue, after the antique. In addition to "The Dead Saviour," by Vandyke, there are two pictures by Carlo Maratti—the "Visitation," on the Epistle, and "Assumption," on the Gospel side. They are tastefully fitted up in Gothic frames, harmonising with the general design, finished at the top in Gothic circle, with the interwoven letters A.M. (Ave Maria) beautifully introduced above, and beneath scrolls, with the words respectively in old English—Gaudet angeli assumptione est—Exurgens abiit in montana. Preceded by the brethren of the Holy Guild of St. Joseph, with their tasteful banner—processional cross, thurrier, acolyte, deacon, and sub-deacon, the Bishop of Limyra slowly advanced along the open lines of the bending soldiers, and, after a short prayer, ascending the altar steps, he addressed the vast assemblage in his accustomed style. He illustrated the power and the wisdom of God in the miraculous continuity of the Church. He dwelt on the influence of the senses as the great obstacles to Christian perfection, and then, in glowing terms, pointed to the magnificent system of the Church in mastering these very senses, and, by means of her sublime service, making them the instruments for advancing truth, and demonstrating to man the influence and efficacy of religion; and, finally, adverting briefly to the fate of kingdoms and of churches, and to that of Scotland, now crumbling to nought, preserving in its service memorial, neither of the birth nor passion, nor death of the Redeemer, and whose only anniversaries are those of violence or crime, or change—he pointed to the magnificent and truthful manifestation of St. Mary's church as demonstrating the spirit and vigour of the Catholic religion—youth, and fair, and elevating, as on the first Pentecost, eighteen centuries ago, when the gospel was publicly preached by her founders to the world. A solemn pontifical high mass was then celebrated with the usual accompaniments of two choirs of vocal and instrumental music—(Haydn, No. 2.) In the evening the church was again filled for vespers and benediction, and a discourse on the mystery of the day—the Church—by Dr. Gillis. The military were, of course, not in attendance; but the brethren of the Guild, with their tasteful cap, and robe and collar and the gilded St. Andrew's cross that surmounted their batons, gleaming round the brilliantly lighted up church, added greatly to the magnificence of the scene."

ABROATH.—We have lately had lecturers in this place, and among others the Rev. Mr. Dawson, of the Roman Catholic congregation, a gentleman who, added to the great knowledge of the subject of which he treats, possesses an agreeable and prepossessing mode of delivery. We understand that Mr. Dawson intends delivering a lecture in the Guild-hall, on the divine origin of Christianity, and we doubt not, from the manner in which his former efforts were appreciated, that a full attendance may be looked for.—Abroath Guide, June 10.

ST. LOUIS.—The Hon. Judge Lucas, of St. Louis, has given to the Sisters of Charity a lot of land in Olive-street, valued at 10,000 dollars, for the benefit of the institution for orphans under their religious and charitable care.

BISHOP HEBER'S WIDOW.—We are requested to contradict the assertion which appeared, copied, from the London Mail, that "the widow of the late Bishop Heber had again married a French Roman Catholic Gentleman." That lady has now been thirteen years married to a Greek Nobleman with whom she is at present residing in the Ionian Islands.—Delhi Gazette.

BARNESLEY.—On Sunday, within the Octave of Corpus Christi, fourteen converts were received into the Catholic church, by the Rev. H. J. Cooke, of Holyrood Chapel. More than a dozen others have offered themselves for instruction.

PROTESTANTISM;

ITS INCONSISTENCIES AND CONTRADICTIONS.

But God is Faithful, for our preaching, which was to you, was not, IT IS and IT IS NOT.

2 Ep. Cor. Cap. 1. v. 18.

To sum up the observations, with which we concluded the leading article of our preceding number, we may reason thus on the late disruption of the Scottish Protestant Church. Either previously to the disruption, its Ministry was a lawful Ministry, or it was not. If it were, then its authority was upheld by all those numerous passages of the New Testament, in which the Saviour accounts the honor and obedience rendered to the Pastors appointed by him, as a tribute of homage done to himself, and, on the other hand, every disrespect and resistance shown to them, as not less criminal than if perpetrated against his own divine person. If, on the contrary, the Scottish Kirk Ministry were, previously to the disruption, either wholly, or for the greater part, an unlawful, intruded, and usurping Ministry, then, as it was radically vitiated in its origin, it could not be the representative of the Ministry, to which were granted, and through which were to be transmitted, the sacred powers of the Pastoral office in the Church of Christ. Consequently, the Clergymen who composed it preached without being sent, and they administered Sacraments, without being invested with the power to do so validly. For, strange as it may appear, it is true, that Calvin, although in his system the ordination of Presbyters was almost extinguished, yet did he most paradoxically insist, in opposition to the belief of the Catholic and all other Churches, that even Baptism was invalid, if administered by a Lay person. But if the Ministry of the Kirk before the disruption were unduly appointed, and in opposition to the rules, which the Scriptures prescribe for the choosing of Christian Pastors, then it follows in the next place, according to Calvin's own principle, that for the century or half century, during which the Intrusion system has prevailed, there was no valid Baptism in the Scottish Kirk. If this be so, the first proceeding of the seceding Clergy should be, as soon as they had repaired, if indeed that were possible, the defect in their own Ministry, to baptize their followers, in order to aggregate these regularly into the true Christian Free Protestant Church, founded A. D. 1843. Before, however, the Free Protestant Clergy venture to remove the mote from their brother's eye, they would do well, to reflect, for the reasons already premised, on their own baptism also, because if the reasoning already advanced be accurate, not only their ordination, but their Baptism must have been unduly administered. In a word, in whatever light the late disruption is viewed, it reveals the weakness and helplessness of the Scottish Kirk, as manifestly as the Puseyite controversy exposes the destitution and imbecility of the English Protestant Church. Let it not be said, that we are disposed to trifle with, or to treat with levity or discourtesy, the religious feelings of our separated brethren. Far from us be an inclination so repugnant to Christian charity. What we have advanced has been dictated solely by our zeal for the restoration of Catholic Unity, a blessing the attainment of which, we think, may be greatly aided, by showing those who differ from us, that Protestantism, whatever be its peculiar name, in one country or in another, is as an edifice raised on moving sand, that uncertainty and fluctuation enter, if we may so speak, into the very essence of its constitution, and that it would be as wise to expect that the Moon in her course should retain a uniform appearance, as that Protestantism should not undergo mutations, in correspondence or accordance with the genius of each succeeding Innovator, who may think that his predecessors in the work of religious revolution did not either push to its full extent the right of private inquiry, or, on the contrary, may, like the Puritans, censure the reformation for its daring and impiety. In a word, the more attentively we peruse the history of Protestantism in every country, the more intimately shall we feel convinced of the Psalmist's words "unless the Lord build the house, in vain do they labour, who build it; unless the Lord guard the city, to no purpose do they watch, who guard it." Yes, to use the words of the illustrious Bossuet, Protestantism carries indelibly stamped on its brow the bloody traces of the wound it endured, when violently sundered by schism from the primeval stock of Christianity, the Catholic Church. Its followers even bear in their bosoms, as vividly as their Ancestors did at the period of the reformation, the bitter feeling, the morbid sentiment, which is the inevitable portion of those who adhere to a cause which owes its origin and continued existence to an insubordinate refractory spirit of disobedience. They know that the first leaders in the religious revolution with which they are unhappily mixed up, having begun their career by resistance to their lawful superiors, whom they were solemnly bound to reverence and obey, could not transmit any right or authority to their successors in the work of reformation or rebellion. Hence, they, without remorse, claim for themselves the privilege to innovate on the system of the first reformers, with infinitely more justice than these could have asserted against the Prelates, whose authority they rejected. For if the first reformers could conscientiously set at naught an authority, which, without restriction as to time or place, they had promised, at the altar of God, ever to obey; an authority which they confessed had been transmitted by an unbroken succession of pastors to the prelates whom they rebelled against; an authority which was then recognised and revered throughout the Catholic world, as the only legitimate depositary of the sacred powers of the Hierarchy; if with a good conscience the reformers could spurn at and contemn so venerable an authority, merely because they thought proper to do so, how can it be obligatory on the successors of those reformers, to evince greater deference for pastors only of yesterday's growth, for men whose very presence in the sanctuary recalls to mind all the crimes of sacrilege and usurpation of the priestly office, which stained the reformation at its very outset. We need not then wonder, that in what regards the evil of schism, we should find that the children of the reformation profess principles the very opposite to those which the early pastors of the Christian Church laid down as sacred and inviolable. Thus, at the present day, it is notorious, that at the very instant in which any doctrinal or disciplinary decision of any of the conflicting Protestant Churches displeases either an influential adherent, or a larger number of its followers, in that same moment the seeds of rebellion are sown, and never cease to germinate, until they attain a maturity, which will enable them to assert a separate and independent existence for the fatal tree, which is destined to be their offspring. Let us compare with this temerity and propensity for separation, the familiar maxims of the great and learned fathers of the early Church, with for example, the reiterated principle of St. Austin "There can be no just cause for breaking unity:" and shall we not conclude, that, as the fixity and unity maintained by the first pastors proclaim, that they recognised a living, speaking, unerring authority in the Church, so the unsteadiness and vacillation of Protestants make it manifest, that they are tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine.

SCHOOLS AND ORPHANAGES

The examinations of the Cathedral Male and Female Schools, were held on last Thursday 14th instant in presence of the Lady Superioress and two of the sisters of the Loretto House.

The examinations at the Loretto House having terminated on the 15th instant, the distribution of Premiums to the young ladies was made on Monday the 17th instant, in presence of the Archbishop.

The examinations of the Cathedral and also of the Bow-Bazar Male Schools were held on Wednesday the 20th instant in presence of the Archbishop V. A. B., of four of the Rev. Gentlemen of St. Xavier's College and of the clergy of the Cathedral.

Business will be resumed at the Cathedral Female Schools and at the Loretto House on Monday the 23rd of October.

The examination of the Bow-Bazar Female School will be held on Monday the 25th inst.

The examinations at the Bengal Catholic Orphanage will be held on Monday, October the second.

The acting committee beg to return thanks, to Mr. Frewin and the friends who united with him in sending an interesting collection of Books to be distributed as Premiums to the Orphans.

The Serampore Schools having been so recently established, the examination of the pupils will be deferred until next Christmas.

The particulars of the examinations at the several Catholic Schools of Calcutta will be given in our succeeding numbers.

SEAL'S COLLEGE.—The first exhibition and distribution of prizes to the students of Seal's College took place yesterday at St. Xavier's College.

FATHER MATHEW.

We have been favored with the perusal of a letter from a young lady at the Bar Convent, York, to her parent in this city, and we feel pleasure in making the following extract:—

"On the 5th of this month (July) Miss, Chadwick, cousin to the Rev. F. Chadwick, professed; the ceremony lasted three hours. In the afternoon Dr. Briggs, Father Mathew, and four Priests came to the school, but as Father Mathew had an engagement, their visit was very short; the next day we witnessed the procession of the Teetotallers. On the 10th, being Sunday, the Rev. Theobald Mathew preached in Blake-street Chapel, on death. I believe it was the first sermon he preached in England. After staying a week in York, during which time numbers took the pledge, he went to Leeds, and next to Manchester, where eighty thousand persons took the pledge, and at Liverpool forty thousand. At the latter place twenty gentlemen of title went together to become disciples of Father Mathew. He is coming to York again, as the reception he met with when in this city was very flattering."

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

The first of the fathers, whom I intend bringing forward as a witness to the truth of Transubstantiation is the zealous and holy patriarch of Jerusalem, St. Cyrill; whose testimony enhances its value, by considering that it occurs in a treatise, in which far from the flighty and imaginary allusions of human eloquence, he was obliged to confine himself to the clearness of didactic simplicity. In truth in an explanation of the tenets composing the Church's catechism, there is almost no opportunity of indulging a flight into the regions of fancy; but the catechist is bound down to the utmost simplicity of language, to an unadorned statement of truths and facts. Hence the mystagogic catechesis of St. Cyrill have always enjoyed a well deserved high esteem with controversial writers in particular, and with the Church in general. The passage I wish to bring forward in confirmation of not only the truth of Transubstantiation, but also for the overthrow of the Protestant assertion of its having been introduced in either the 9th or the 12th century, is the celebrated one, which occurs in his 22d mystagogic catechesis. Upon those words of St. Paul in his 1st letter to the Corinthians chap. XI. "I have received of the Lord, that which also I delivered unto you," &c., he enlarges in the following manner. "*Vel hæc sola Beati Pauli institutio abunde sufficit, ut certum vobis de divinis mysteriis fidem faciat: quibus digni habiti, concorporei, et consanguinei Christi facti estis. Tlle enim moda clamabat: Quum igitur Ipse pronuntiaverit et dixerit de pane: 'Hoc est corpus meum,' quis audebit deinceps ambigere? Et cum ipse ad severaverit, et dixerit: Hic meus est sanguis, quis unquam dubitaverit, ajens non esse ejus sanguinem? Which means: "Even this one instruction of blessed Paul suffices abundantly to render certain your faith about the divine mysteries, through which, by being deemed worthy of them, you have become of the same body and blood with Christ. For he proclaimed even now: As then He himself has pronounced of the bread, and said: 'This is my body,' who will henceforth dare to put it into question? And as he himself has affirmed and said: 'This is my blood,' who will ever doubt it, and say, it is not his blood? This is pretty clear and strong language; indeed stronger and clearer than for example the Magazine, Advocate, and the like of them, would choose to make use of, when speaking, or more so when explaining the nature of their Lord's Supper. The phrases of St. Cyrill are so well chosen, and happily so appropriate as if he had intended to lecture and refute future heretics. He could not have argued better to the purpose, if his auditors in Jerusalem had been composed even of John Calvin and his shadowist followers. 'What!' I see him, fired with holy indignation, exclaim, what! Christ himself has pronounced of the Eucharistic bread; and did you: 'This is my body,' how do you therefore dare to put it into question, and tell Him in his divine face, saying: 'No, Sir, it is no such thing, but it is a piece of simple bread as well in as out of the celebration of the Supper, and your body is no further there, than it can be brought forward by an act of commemoration of yourself and your passion.' Christ Himself has affirmed, and assured you, that: 'this is my blood' how then dare you to give him the lie, and* teach in direct opposition to his infallible declaration, that it is not his blood, but merely a sup of wine drank by the communicant in simple commemoration of that blood which was shed for us on Calvary? If you will not believe the words of Christ, you are not of his disciples, for we have no such custom, nor the Church of God." So much certainly St. Cyrill. Yet I confess that, however plain and intelligible his language is to a mind unpolluted by heresy and sophistry, it would hardly move those, who have the effrontery to dissolve into figures, and shadows the plain substantial language even of Holy Scripture on the score of the Holy Eucharist. But fortunately St. Cyrill has expressed his mind still more forcibly than in the above, in fact in a manner, which leaves no other chance to our innovators except one of these alternatives, either condemn the authority of this Holy Father and of Holy Church at his times, or confess yourselves condemned. The sentence which follows the above quotation from this early writer, is at once so stringent in favor of Transubstantiation, that it admits by no possible means of an evasive answer; and confounds without hope of mercy the shadows of John Calvin &c., the consubstantiation of Dr. Martin Luther, and the ignorant twaddle of a set of designing men, who would persuade the unwary that Christ's Holy Church in the four first centuries had no more idea of transubstantiation, than we have of the number of stars composing the milky way. "Aquam olim," continues St. Cyrill, "in vinum quod sanguini affine est, in Cana Galilee transmutavit; et Eum parum dignum existimamus cui credamus, quum vinum in sanguinem transmutavit? Ad nuptias corporales vocatus stupendum hoc miraculum efficit, et non Eum multo magis filiis thalami nuptialis corpus suum et sanguinem fruenda donasse confitebimur? Quare cum omni persuasionem tanquam corpus et sanguinem Christi illa sumamus." Which in English means: "He CHANGED of old in Canaan of Galilee water into wine, which has an affinity to blood; and should we deem him little worthy of credit, when he CHANGES wine into (his) blood? (or as the Greek has it: οὐκ ἂν ἱσχυρίζεσθαι, οὐκ ἔστιν μετὰ βαλὼν εἰς αἷμα; i. e. is he not trustworthy, when CHANGING wine into blood). Called to these bodily essentials he performed this stupendous wonder; shall we then not confess, that he has much rather bestowed it upon the children of his (chaste) nuptial bed, to feast upon his BODY and BLOOD? Hence let us, with full persuasion, receive them as the BODY and BLOOD of Christ." I dare say Protestant Agnostics will exclaim here: "This saying is hard, and who can hear it. St. Cyrill teaches Transubstantiation with a vengeance." Aye, well you may say that, and remember, that if I call you "innovators," I do you no wrong. If the doctrine of Transubstantiation was ever taught to perfection, if ever it was brought home by a well-adapted similitude, which prevents all danger of mistake, it was by those above quoted sentences of the pious patriarch of Jerusalem. In fact we have the tenet, under consideration, taught by the very word, by which is now understood, taught and expressed; for the Greek word μεταβαλλειν, or the Latin "transmutare," is as much synonyme with the word "transubstantiare" as "Jacob" is with "Israel." But even were we destitute of the invincible argument resulting from this expression, we should yet have his striking similitude to fall back upon in the demonstration of our dogma. I am sure nobody of sound mind will dispute the fact that at the nuptial feast in Canaan of Galilee our Blessed Redeemer changed substantially the water into the wine, in short, that he performed an act of Transubstantiation. Now, St. Cyrill teaches, that in the Blessed Eucharist, Christ does the same for the benefit of his faithful children. Indeed this is the very point upon which the holy Catechist of Jerusalem bases his comparison between the two performances of the Saviour. He expresses himself quite indignant at the absurdity of some persons, who perhaps (even in his time) might find a difficulty in admitting that Christ did as wonderful things in favor of his Holy Church, as they could not deny he had performed on an occasion of much less importance, viz. at a simple marriage-feast. Inspired with such sentiments of faith, the Saint can call upon his auditory and his readers, in the same confidence and simplicity, of meaning, as the Catholic Church does at present, to confess without reservation, that when they approach the table of the Lord, they feast upon the Saviour's body and blood, and that they should remain fully persuaded, that what they received in the Blessed Sacrament is nothing else but the body and blood of Christ. How silly, how confounded, I almost had said how reprobate, do the new-fangled views of the 16th century anent the Lord's Supper, look before such a thundering testimony of a venerable antiquity. How despicable the rabid efforts of a few enraged heresiarchs, to blow down by the breath of their mouth the faith of Christ, which had taken root in the bosom of Christendom during the storms of fifteen hundred centuries! How absurd, how deceptive, yes, how impossible would the language of St. Cyrill appear in the mouth of a Luther, of a Calvin, of the Editor of the Magazine, or of him of the Advocate.

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

The annual exhibition of St Xavier's College me off on Tuesday morning with general satisfaction, and, we might say, with éclat. The amination commenced at 10 o'clock, and the udemic hall at that hour appeared to be a void, scanty was the attendance. But a looker-on ight have been dazzled at 12, when the room was aced by a complement of belles dames, and a odly gathering of respectable gentlemen. Master orge DePenning a pupil of the 3d class opened e ceremony by a Prologue. The young gentle- n would have well succeeded in his attempt, it he seemed to have a very sincere wish to reire m under the canopy under which he stood, to s seat, and accordingly ran over his part at a ce that approached a false gallop. Four stu- nts of the 3d class were next examined by the ehbishop, and they, excepting a few instances ere two of the students failed, afforded as it ap- ared, general satisfaction. Of the gentlemen hom we have just alluded there was a Master eury, whose quick and ready replies added to s agility of motion and smartness of speech won r him the good will of all the audience. They re questioned in Pinnock's Goldsmith's History England, translated passages from Cornelius epos, and in all were found efficient in Geogra- y. The departments in which the second class re examined were, the four first Chapters of St. uke, in Greek, Ancient History, Cæsar's Commentaries, History of England and general Geo- graphy. We were wonderfully struck at the proficiency displayed by the students of this class, Master A. Botelho in particular, in the Greek Tes- tament. For we derived from an unerring au- thority that their study in the translation of the Greek language, and we know that to be no easy task, did not extend to more than 7 months. And yet such was the correctness of the explanation of the Testament, so striking their apparent ease in answering questions, that may, considering the period of their application, well be termed intri- cate, questions that inquired after the derivations, roots, links, &c. of the words of the languages, and so almost perfect their parsing of the same, that they at once gave positive proof of indefati- gable application in themselves, and established the laudable anxiety and consequent attention of the Professors of St. Xavier, without which the Pupils would have failed in the acquisition of so arduous, and let it not be said useless, tongue, despite their commendable efforts. But what spoke beyond the power of language of the credit alike of the scholars and the Institution was the remarkable advancement of the first class in the branches of knowledge it studies. The first class of the College is constituted of simply 4 pupils, two of whom, the competitors on the present oc- casion, the College may well be proud of. Mas- ters Pereira and Abreu merit the highest praise of their fellow disciples. Virgil, Homer and Xeno- phon were successively and most successfully handled by these students, and though Master Abreu was a little behind his rival in them, not- withstanding he deserves an equal if not a higher quantum of praise, by reason (laud ignota loquimur) of his having had occasion to apply himself to classics some time after his superior friend. Cicero was next explained, and we could not help re- marking an unaccountable inability on the part of Master Abreu in giving a very correct detail of the cause that led to Cæsar's death. Masters Da- ly, L. Fleury, C. Deverinne, Hogan, Gonsalves, Pereira, Cantopher and D'Silva severally declaim- ed in English, Latin and Greek, according to their respective abilities; but the two latter gentlemen spoke the best. Geometry was last- ly examined, and no one present on the occa- sion will, we are assured, deny, that Master Abreu, the candidate for the prize in this science, carried his reward well merited. At the close the Reverend the Archbishop address- ed the audience, when he expressed his satisfac- tion at what he had witnessed this morning. He applauded the zeal of the young aspirants for scien- tific fame for their pains, especially when he con- sidered the numerous obstacles that in this country opposed them in their march. He had the pleasure of presiding at thr such meetings in the College, and he was satisfied that every occasion testified the progress of the pupils in their studies. This was the fourth occasion, and he believed no one would differ from his opinion, that the scholars of the establishment had in their studies advanced another step since last September. He was con- vinced that one and all that were present in the room, would vote with him to offer cordial ex- pressions of commendation and rejoicings to the Rec- tor and the other Professors attached to the College for the application obviously bestowed and interest taken by them in the progress of their scholars. He was likewise aware that no mercenary motives had actuated such a laudable passion in them. But he trusted the diligence and ardour of the Rector and Professors of St. Xavier's would not be diminished from the untoward practice so much in vogue in Calcutta, removing children from schools prematurely, for engaging them for purposes from which the discipline of the College is far, very far. He warned those parents that then heard him to avoid this practice so fatal to improvement, lest the warmest zeal be damped. With another word of praise to the pupils, His Lordship digressed into remarks which he trusted was not out of place. In the course of the examination a certain question was put to a pupil, which led to an account of King John's shaking off the Papal authority, and another which introduced the subject of the holy wars. His Lordship had declined producing any remarks from the pupil thus questioned, for the allotted period of time for the exhibition would not permit him. But he would seize the opportunity of making a cursory remark, and requested the attention of all his hearers. He would leave it to be inferred from the consequences that attended this step of the king, how easy it was to learn when the Roman Pontiff kept within authorized bounds, or when he transgressed them. With reference to the Crusades, he would remark, that many were the vituperations flung on a Catholic Church; but he would refer that portion of his hearers who differed with him in religion, to the proper authorities who refuted these gratuitous censures. He would request them to read these authors sincerely and without bias; and then, he was almost convinced, those early prejudices in which they were nursed would be dispelled. His lordship concluded with a sincere wish of seeing on the next occasion those who were now around him in a favourable state of health, and again applauded the interest of the Professors in the improvement of their pupils. The assembly then dispersed.—Englishman, September 21.

LAUDA SION.

(From the Lyra Ecclesiastica.)

Zion, thy Redeemer praising,
Songs of joy to him upraising,
Laud thy pastor and thy guide:
Swell thy notes most high and daring;
For his praise is past declaring,
And thy loftiest powers beside.

'Tis a theme with praise that gloweth,
For the bread that life bestoweth,
Goes this day before us out;
Which, His holy supper taking,
To the brethren twelve His breaking,
None hath ever called in doubt.

Full then be our praise and sounding,
Modest and with joy abounding
Be our mind's triumphant state,
For the festal's prosecution,
When the first blessed institution
Of this feast we celebrate.

In the new King's new libation,
In the new law's new oblation
Ends the ancient Passal rite;

Ancient forms new substance chaseth,
Typic shadows truth displaceth,
Day dispels the gloom of night.

What He did at supper seated,
CHRIST enjoined to be repeated,
When His love we celebrate.
Thus, obeying His dictation,
Bread and wine of our salvation
We the victim consecrate.

'Tis for Christian faith asserted,
Bread is into flesh converted,
Into blood the holy wine.
Sight and intellect transcending,
Nature's laws to marvel bending,
'Tis confirmed by faith divine.

Under either kind remaining,
Form, not substance, still retaining,
Wondrous things our spirit sees.
Flesh and blood thy palate staining,
Yet still CUPIST entire remaining,
Under either species.

All untorn for eating given,
Undivided, and univen,
Whole He's taken and unrent;
Be there one or crowds surrounding,
He is equally abounding,
Nor, through eaten, ever spent.

Both to good and bad 'tis broken,
But on each a different token
Or of life or death attends.
Life to good, to bad damnation:
Lo! of one same manducation
How dissimilar the ends.

When the Priest the victim breaketh,
See thy faith in nowise shaketh,
Know that every fragment taketh
All that 'neath the whole there lies.
This in Him no fracture maketh,
'Tis the figure only breaketh,
Form, or state, no change there taketh
Place in what it signifies.

Bread that angels eat in Heaven,
Now become the pilgrim's leaven,
Bread in truth to children given,
That must ne'er to dogs be thrown.
He, in ancient types disguised,
Was with Isaac sacrificed,
For the feast a Lamb devised,

Bread, whose shepherd care doth tend us,
JESU CHRIST, Thy Mercy send us,
Do thou feed us, Thou defend us,
Lead us where true joys attend us,
In the land where life is given.
Thou all ken and might possessing,
Mercies aye to us largessing,
Make us share Thy cup of blessing,
Heritage and love's caressing,
With the denizens of Heaven.—AMEN.

CONFIRMATION.—His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin is now on his visitation. On Wednesday last he administered the holy sacrament of Confirmation to several hundreds in the Catholic Church of Saggard. The Rev. John Dunne, the zealous pastor, and his active coadjutor, Rev. Hugh Murphy, assisted, prepared the children on the occasion.—Tablet

ON THE INVOCATION OF SAINTS AND ANGELS, AND THE VENERATION OF IMAGES.

To the Editor of the Orthodox Journal.

SIR,—I received a letter on Friday evening last, from a very respected Protestant friend of mine, in which he informs me that his parson, on the Sunday before, declared from the pulpit, "That the Romish doctrine of the invocation of saints and angels, and the veneration of relics and of images, were the inventions of Satan and contrary to Scripture." My friend wishes to know from me what I have to say on the subject. My intention, therefore, is to enter at large on this point in a future letter, but in the mean time I send you these few hurried lines, which, I think, will more than ever convince the public of the folly of placing any belief in parsons. The great Protestant theologian, Dr. Whitaker, declared that "he seeks in vain for truth from Protestants, but that he is sure to find it on the side of Popery." To this I reply that the parson's assertion is a repetition of the old cant, the very same which the ancient heretics had so often in their mouths, as we are informed by the pens of St. Cyril, lib. vi, in Juli and l. xx. l. 8, c. 6; Eusebius, lib. iv, hist. c. 15; St. Hierome, Adv. vigilant; St. Augustin, l. xx. cont. Faust. To clear the matter, I must premise:

First. That honour or worship is nothing else but a testimony of excellence.

Secondly That this testimony may be performed by words and actions.

Thirdly. That the gestures of the body bear not the variety and distinction of language, nor language itself the copiousness of thought; so that necessity often forces us to express, by the very same gestures and expressions, the most different ideas and conceptions of the mind. For example, we bow to one another, stand bare in the courts of law, in the high court of Parliament, and kneel to parents; we give the title of sacred majesty, most high and mighty, to kings, who are nothing but creatures; that of lord to bishops and to the nobility; all which are the very same we use in our addresses to God himself.

Fourthly. Honour, worship, &c., are words of this nature, as is evident in holy scripture; and though adoration appears in the English language most commonly appropriated to the supreme honour and worship due to God alone, yet Adorare, which, in Latin, corresponds to it, is promiscuously used to God, Gen. xlvii. 31, to angels, Jos. v. 15, and to men, Gen. xxiii. 7; and therefore, taken as well for a civil as a religious reverence and respect.

Fifthly. The English and Latin languages are deficient in distinct words for all these kinds of worship, and, consequently, have borrowed them from the Greek, and call the supreme honour due to God latría, and term the inferior one given to God's glorious servants dulia, which inferior honour, being in a more eminent degree applied to the mother of God, takes the name of hyperdulia.

Sixthly. It would not be prudent or just to call out idolatry without looking into the nature of the honour and worship given to creatures. This premised.

Honour and worship of saints and angels. "And Joshua (the captain of the Lord's host) fell on his face to the earth, and did worship. Joshua v. 14.

St. Justin, explaining the Catholic faith as to this point, in the name of all Christians, makes this declaration (2 Apol. c. 2.): "We worship and adore, and in our words and deed reverence the prophetic spirit and the host of angels; and this we teach abundantly to all who are willing to learn, after the same manner as we have heard, and are taught ourselves." St. Cyril of Alexandria, shows that herein is no idolatry, for he says (l. vi. in Juli): "We never said that the holy martyrs were become gods, but that they ought to be highly honoured and to be held in great veneration" St. Hierome thus gives the reason of this honour (Epist ad Ripar.)

"We honour the servants, that the honour done to them may redound to their Master." The illustrious St. Augustine, the most eagle-eyed doctor of the church, and so much respected by Protestants, says, Serm. 1, de SS. Peter and Paul, "A multitude of nations with bended knees adore the most blessed fisherman, Peter."

The council of Trent truly says, "Who is there possessed of so little sense as to imagine that upon the king giving his orders that no one should presume to take upon him the person of the king, or suffer himself to be honoured in quality of such, that he should violate these orders by shewing a respect and giving honour to his magistrates?" His understanding is shallow indeed who can for a moment suppose that the honour given to the king's mother, or to a favourite subject, can be prejudicial to the sovereignty of the people. Make the application, and you will find that these inferior addresses dulia and hyperdulia to the saints, the angels and the holy mother of God, do not derogate in the least from the supreme honour due to God alone. This will direct my esteemed Protestant friend to give a satisfactory answer to most objections, and the means to reconcile the several passages of scripture concerning this matter, as how an angel accepted worship from Joshua, Josh. v. 14. And an angel refused worship from St. John, Rev. xix. 10. St. Augustine (Lib. 20, Centrac. Faust. c. 21) is of opinion that this angel appeared in so glorious a manner that St. John took him to be God, and, therefore, would have given him divine honour had not the angel stopt him by telling him he was but his fellow-servant. St. Gregory (Hom. 8, in Evang.) rather thinks that the veneration offered by St. John was not divine honour, nor in any other than what might be lawfully given; but was nevertheless refused by the angel, in consideration of the dignity to which our human nature had been raised by the incarnation of the Son of God, and the dignity of St. John, an apostle. So far at least is certain, that the saint knew his duty too well to offer the angel any idolatrous or superstitious worship. (See Rev. 22.) The Protestants themselves seem not to be averse to this honour and worship, for what do they mean else when they celebrate the feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary and many other saints? (See Common Prayer Book.) And let this parson ponder well on the words of the great St. Ambrose (Serm. 6), "That in honouring the martyrs, Christ is honoured, and that the Lord is despised by the contempt of his saints." The 39 articles declare nothing against this worship: it is true the 22nd article pronounces against the worshipping of images and relics, and invocation of saints; but who values the opinions of the church of England, who separated herself from the communion of all other bishops in the world, as is as evident as the sun at mid-day, since she was never able to shew one single bishop in the whole world who professed to be of her communion. Now if this be not schism, I confess I know not what is. I have proved before the bar of public opinion that the Church of England is nothing more nor less than an heretical and a schismatical church. Let the public then judge between us.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
VERAX,
A CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Orthodox Journal.

THE TWENTY-NINTH ARTICLE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Examined, and proved to be at variance with the real Statement of St. Augustine, in 395. The Wicked, and such as be void of a lively Faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as Saint Augustine saith) the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ: but rather, to their condemnation, do eat and drink the Sign or Sacrament of so great a thing.

St. Augustine, in his twenty-sixth treatise on the gospel of St John, considering these words, "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him," thus writes: "To eat His flesh and to drink His blood is, therefore, the way by which to abide in Christ, and to have Christ abiding in us. And, consequently, he that abideth not in Christ, and he in whom Christ doth not abide, does not, it is certain, eat His flesh or drink His blood SPIRITUALLY, though carnally and visibly he press with his teeth the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. But rather doth that man eat and drink to his own condemnation the sacrament of so great a thing, because he, when unclean, presumed to approach the sacrament of Christ, which none receive worthily but they who are clean—regarding whom the scripture saith: "Blessed are the clean of heart: for they shall see God." Matt. v. 8. These are the distinct and unequivocal words of St. Augustine. Nothing, therefore, can be more manifest—nothing more reprehensible—than the disingenuousness resorted to by the framers of the thirty-nine articles in wilfully garbling this passage of St. Augustine, and thereby fully misrepresenting the doctrine taught by that ancient and eminent father of the church. The object sought by those who descended to means so unworthy evidently was, that they may give to their innovation the semblance of antiquity—knowing that, in times of general confusion and revolution, such as those in which they lived, it would be difficult for the orthodox Christians who still preserved, in its original apostolic purity, the true doctrine of St. Augustine, to make the great bulk of the English nation sensible of the fraud thus practiced upon them in the name of religion. Those days of confusion are now, thank heaven! gone by; and hence it is hoped that those who adopt the thirty-nine articles as their creed, will duly weigh and examine them—will enquire upon what authority they are based—and how far they are consistent with truth. That the article under examination is not consistent with truth, but is attempted to be foisted on Christians by means of the suppression of truth, will be fully apparent to all who compare the garbled extract from St. Augustine, contained in the twenty-ninth article, with the unmutilated passage fairly translated above.

It must be evident to modern Protestants that the framers of their articles and the founders of their church by no means despised the authority of the ancient fathers; but that they, on the contrary, held those holy and learned men in the highest possible estimation—for, were the case otherwise, they never would have striven to make it appear that the articles of the Protestant religion were countenanced by them. When speaking of the doctrine falsely ascribed to Augustine, it was said that the quotation from his works was "wilfully garbled" in the article now under discussion. That it is "garbled" must be already manifest to those readers who will take the trouble to compare it with the text of the entire quotation: and that it is "wilfully" garbled must be admitted by every scholar who reads, in the original, the passage referred to; for it was impossible that men, having even the most superficial knowledge of the Latin language, could, except they did so wilfully, give to his words a construction wholly different to what the author of them intended. What a truly painful reflection it is that men, when defining one of the most solemn articles of faith, should have recourse to fraud and imposition! But is it not still more painful to reflect that millions and millions of well-meaning Church of England men have been led astray by the semblance of antiquity thus fraudulently given to innovation?—Orthodox Journal.

THE MORMONITES.

When the Mormon heresy first became known in England, and its pernicious tenets had begun to allure the uncouth Saxon labourers on Ribbleside from their peaceful homes, we exposed in this journal the rascality, forgery, and imposition of the knave and fanatic, Joe Smith, its author. The discovery of the gold plates which Joe read through a pair of free-stone spectacles, the great variations in the first and second translations of the plates, ably detected and exposed by the ingenuity of an American book-seller, were fully detailed; since that time many country people have been enticed away by a knavish agent, and have deserted comfortable situations and moderate prospects, to go in quest of wealth and happiness at the great Mormon city of Nauvoo. From their practice of re-baptizing grown-up persons, they are nick named by the people Dippers, and some of the dupes have paid for their rashness and credulity with the forfeit of their lives. During an inclement season of the year, a weak and delicate female was persuaded to undergo the progress of dipping, and she died soon after in consequence of it. This made a deep impression; but sullen batches of young people were enticed away to go in quest of the terrestrial paradise at Nauvoo. Letters have since been received from them by their friends, and though some were too proud at first to own that they had been duped, yet the melancholy truth has at length come out, and they declare their intention of returning from that dismal earthly hell as quick as they can. But the happy followers of the Nauvoo prophet have taken the precaution to ease them of their money, so that their minds might not be blinded in the pursuit of spiritual by the possession of earthly goods. Before leaving their own shores a goodly consideration was exacted from them to pay for their passage; but these strong Lancashire yeomen, fed on beef and bread, found themselves well nigh famished on ship diet. Still they were buoyed up by the notion that Nauvoo would bring them peace and plenty, and ease them of all their troubles: but, they found the prophet, like the rest of men, eating and drinking of earthly food, and not sipping nectar and ambrosia, as their fond fancy had depicted. Though living almost within the precincts of the temple, and breathing the same atmosphere as the prophet, they found that they could neither procure a night's lodging nor a mouthful of food without an equivalent of dollars. To their cost they found that the spirit of prophecy had not subdued the spirit of the Yankee in Joe Smith; and that, though associated with the new world, they had still to transact business with the old. But for this timely arrival of a letter from the disappointed dupes of Marmonism at Nauvoo, the writer of this article would not have been able to dissuade several respectable families from committing their all to the rapacious grasp of Joe Smith and his harpies on this side the Atlantic. A Mr. Caswall has lately given us an account of his visit to Nauvoo; and strong proofs it contains, if any were needed, of the imposition practised on the credulity of these poor people. In one vessel alone he found 300 English emigrants on their way to the city of the Mormons. Many of them were decent-looking people, and by no means of the lowest class, from the neighbourhood of Preston: perhaps some of the very ones whose fate we have been recording. The city is built on a grand plan, accommodated to the bend of the Mississippi and the situation of the temple, which is a large rough unfinished stone building, about ten feet above ground; it is 120 feet in length by eighty in breadth. In the centre of the temple is a large baptismal font, twenty feet square and four deep, made of wood, supported on the backs of twelve oxen as large as life, also of wood, but hereafter to be covered with plates of gold. In this will be performed baptisms for the dead, and for healing diseases: baptisms for the remission of sins will be performed in the more cleansing waters of the Mississippi.

In the mean time service is performed in a grove; and it is a most painful mixture of hymn-singing, blasphemous panegyrics of Joe Smith, and soft and artful speeches to gull the new comers out of their money, and sundry word-of-mouth advertisements. One brother had lost a keg of white lead, which he was anxious should be restored, if any of the brethren had taken it by mistake. Another, who never lost money before in his life, had lost a ten-dollar bill. It is surprising that they should plunder one from another, especially as Joe has liberally sanctioned the principle of spoiling the Egyptians, i.e., those who do not belong to them. He is Mahomet on a small scale, converting with the sword when argument fails.

The arch-impostor, the prophet, seer, merchant, revelator, president, elder, editor, and general of the Nauvoo legion, is described as a person of coarse, plebeian aspect, exhibiting in his countenance a curious mixture of knave and clown; his hands are large and fat, and on one of his fingers he wears a massive gold ring. His dress corresponds with his look, being of coarse country manufacture. Mr. Caswall showed the prophet a Greek Psalter in the MS. character of the 13th century, and begged him to explain its contents. The prophet asked him if he had any guess of its meaning. He replied, that he took it to be a Greek Psalter. "No," he said, "it ain't Greek at all, except, perhaps, a few words. What ain't Greek is Egyptian, and what ain't Egyptian, is Greek. This book is very valuable—it is a dictionary of Egyptian hieroglyphics." Pointing to the capital letters at the beginning of each verse, he said,—"Them figures is Egyptian hieroglyphics, and them which follows is the interpretation of the hieroglyphics, written in the reformed Egyptian. Them characters like the letters that was engraved on the golden plates." Mr. Caswall then asked the Nauvoo seer to explain his own hieroglyphics, written on papyrus and kept in glass frames; but, Joe, something like his fat namesake in "Pickwick," seemed very reluctant. Finding that no answer was returned to his request, to have one particular figure explained, he looked up, and behold! the prophet had disappeared; but, on descending to the street he saw him flourishing his whip, and driving away in his waggon as fast as two fine horses could draw him.

Had any thing been wanting to expose the barefaced knavery and wretched ignorance of this scamp and trafficker in merchandise and religion, this interview of Mr. Caswall, an Anglican parson, would have done it: still, Greek and Egyptian are things about which a countryman's notion are all afloat. Had the prophet tried to persuade some knowing farmer, that a sow and her litter was an ewe and her lambs, or a cow and her calves, Hodge would have turned away with a thorough contempt for the silly fool; and yet Joe's attempt to palm the Greek Psalter on a Greek scholar, as a work written in Egyptian hieroglyphics, is equally foolish, silly, and knavish. If the fabulous golden plates were written, as Joe stated, in the same character as the psalter, it is clear that their meaning never could have been discovered by him, even though he possessed the aid of his free-stone spectacles.

A melancholy reflection must here come afloat to the readers' mind—in what a mass of ignorance is our country population involved? And on whom rests the responsibility? In whose gift are the numerous schools founded out of the proceeds of the suppressed monasteries? What class of men are appointed as masters? Whom does the state pay, and pay largely too, for instructing the people? It is clear that the established church has utterly failed to instruct and educate the people, and therefore has utterly failed in the great and only object of a state church. Were the money now swallowed up by the church parsons and their children, legitimate and illegitimate, justly disposed of, there would not be a single hamlet which would not share, and amply share too, the blessing of a liberal, sound, and commercial education. As it is, all who do not belong to the established church have nevertheless to contribute to the support of its schools, and at the same time are obliged to support schools for the education of their own children, as the establishment virtually excludes them by its intolerance. But whilst censuring the law church, we must not shut our eyes to the wide field opened for our own exertion. Spiritual destitution exists on every side. Even in districts thickly dotted with chapels, you may pass over miles of country without meeting with a single Catholic. This should not be, and this would not be, did every Catholic layman as well as priest faithfully perform the duties which are in such cases exacted at his hands.

But we have still another question,—for the further we advance, the less are we able to fathom or comprehend the precise rule by which the right reverend prelate would guide us in our inquiries after truth—or, as he styles it, the secrets of God; for there certainly is, as he himself tells us, a right and a wrong interpretation of the articles, which yet are to be so readily proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture. * But "there's the rub;"—how are these most certain warrants to be discovered, in his sense only, amongst the multitude of contradictory opinions which surround and puzzle us, all and each of them drawn as confidently, one as the other, from these self-same most certain warrants of holy Scripture? By tradition? "No," says the Bishop; "we willingly run to tradition for her assistance, when we need it in support of those doctrines upon which we have no most certain warrant of holy Scripture, but which, notwithstanding, we have judged it proper to embody into our system; such, for example, as the appointment of bishops to govern all the Churches; and the Lord's day, as the day of public worship; the general prevalence of infant baptism, and some other points, &c. —such, also, as the right of our Saviour to divine worship, and the implied assertion of a trinity of persons in the form of baptism. These, says he, we are content to take from tradition, because we cannot obtain them by any other means,—but this must be the exception, and not the rule. We will be beholden to her only for our own immediate and indispensable necessities, —she shall be no witness for aught but them. Yet presently espying his difficulty, seeing that he has woven an inextricable web, and yet that it must be unravelled before he can advance, time pressing, and no more ingenious contrivance coming to his aid, he valiantly cuts the knot, by boldly averring that we are to look neither to the creeds, "nor to traditions of any kind, as being so necessary, that holy Scripture, WITHOUT THEM, would not have been sufficient to teach ALL things requisite to salvation." So that the government of the Church by bishops, the sanctification of the Lord's day, the validity of infant baptism, the right of our Saviour to divine worship, the belief of a trinity of persons in one God, are neither separately nor collectively essential portions of Christianity!!! To this singular catalogue of small matters in the faith and practice of a Christian, we must of ourselves add one other point, namely, the whole canon of holy Scripture, with its authenticity and inspiration; for if this be not received and held through tradition and the authority of the Church, the whole ground and stay of Christianity will slip through the right rev. prelate's meshes, and vanish into air: for in default of tradition and the authority of the Church, both of which he so ingenuously and consistently throws overboard, he has no other resource but to fall back upon his single, ultimate reference, "the written word of God,

* This is the first time we ever remember to have seen it asserted by a member of the Church of England, much less by one of her most dignified ministers, that "The right of our Saviour to Divine worship" rested upon tradition only. Is the bishop reading with Socinian eyes, that he finds a difficulty in proving the Divinity of our Saviour from the Scriptures? Surely, the Divinity proved, the right to Divine worship follows of course.

—the most certain warrants of holy Scripture; and where the warrant is for this, we defy either the learning or ingenuity of the right reverend prelate, or that of all the controvertists who have preceded him, or who may perchance follow him in the same track, to discover.

We must presume also that, amongst the other points to which the right reverend prelate alludes, as being not to be proved by most certain warrants of holy Scripture,—though he has had the discretion not to name it (as if he had forgotten it to be one of the true doctrines of the Church of England agreeable to God's word*, to which he has so solemnly subscribed), is that which invests the civil sovereign with the power to rule "all states and degrees, whether they be ecclesiastical or temporal," and which, by the statutes of the 26 Hen. VIII, the 1 Ed. VI, and the 1 Eliz. means, that "The royal Majesty is justly supreme head on earth of the Church of England, and hath full authority to correct and punish all manner of heresies, schisms, errors, abuses, &c., which by any manner of spiritual authority or jurisdiction ought or may lawfully be reformed, &c.; and, that whatever privileges and spiritual pre-eminences had been heretofore in use, by any ecclesiastical authority whatsoever, should be for ever annexed to the imperial crown of England; that the queen and her successors might substitute certain men to exercise that authority: howbeit with proviso, that they should define nothing to be heresy, but those things which were long before defined to be heresies, out of the sacred canonical Scriptures, or the four first Œcumenical councils, or other councils, BY THE TRUE AND PROPER SENSE of the holy Scriptures; or should thereafter be so defined by authority of Parliament, with assent of the clergy of England assembled in synod"—Camden, An. 1559, and the statutes.

It is not for us to reconcile the modified language of the thirty-seventh Article with these positive and explicit declarations of the statutes. Suffice it here to say, that an act of Parliament is paramount over every other authority recognized in these realms! a point clear from this very act, which was passed, nine bishops out of fourteen (all who were then living) "stiffly repugning it," and no synod assenting to it; while we will take leave also to remind the bishop that it ever has been questioned—as it was by Sampson, when offered a bishopric in 1560—"whether it was lawful to swear to the queen, as supreme head of the Church under Christ;" because, as he observed, "he thought Christ was the sole head of the Church, and no such expression of any inferior head was found in the Scripture †"

* His Majesty's declaration prefixed to the articles.

† Burnet, Ann. 1560. The scripture references in defence of the 37th article, are so exceedingly wide of the mark, that, referring one and all so completely and exclusively as they do to the civil power, it is extraordinary that a Church, professing to have everything from most certain warrants of holy Scripture, should ever have thought of putting them forward in support of their power ecclesiastical, which, put it as you will, if there be any meaning in words or deeds, (and we refer to all the ancient acts for our assertion) convey a real spiritual authority, and spiritual jurisdiction to the first civil magistrate of the realm, in his or her quality, as supreme head, or chief governor of the Church. The texts above referred to did not satisfy Sampson in 1560, and why should they satisfy Dr. Bloomfield in 1842? for the act of Elizabeth expressly provides and

How marvellously does the right reverend prelate amuse himself and his hearers with enigmas! Tradition is likewise of use, he asserts, in making us historically acquainted with the belief of the ancient Church in general. But what object has he in becoming historically acquainted with the belief of the Church in general, unless he will allow it to guide him in his own belief? and yet this he most consistently declares he will not; he will dig and dive for himself, in another mine, and make the written word of God his SINGLE ULTIMATE REFERENCE. We venture to suggest, then, that the Right Reverend Prelate spare himself the trouble of his historical investigations; for he is predetermined not to avail himself of their helps to a right understanding of the sense in which Christianity was understood by the disciples and immediate successors of the apostles. His single, ultimate reference, is his own JUDGMENT AND HIS OWN OPINION. Where tradition and his opinion clash, it requires no seer to predict which of the two shall be driven to the wall. The Bishop has already determined that. And it is for him to consider whether he so determines it by that courtly rule, so much in vogue at one period of our history, that disputations concerning religion do always bend that way as the sceptres incline."

But, as we are wearying both ourselves and our readers with the repetition of these oft-refuted fallacies and contradictions, and as we have pledged ourselves to be content merely to ask a few simple questions, without dilating upon the arguments arising from them (difficult as it may be to pass on through the throng of tempting matter which presses on us), we will not now undertake to consider what was the doctrine of primitive antiquity upon these points; we will satisfy ourselves by citing—with one slight alteration, which we consider very materially to improve the reading,—a few words already quoted from this celebrated charge: "To suppose," says the writer, "that the Spirit of God dictated the materials only of saving truth to be written by his inspired servants, while He failed to commit the right interpretation of them (to some competent authority), is surely an hypothesis of the most unreasonable and improbable kind;" and this we find also to have been the conviction of all the fathers and doctors of the Church, beginning with St. Irenæus in the second century, whose decision upon this point we have already seen in one of the foregoing quotations, dictated after the saving truths contained in the Scriptures had been committed to writing, and, when engaged in combating the heresies of his time, which were, equally with those of ours, ever attempted to be supported by this same ultimate reference to the inspired penmen.

But arguments that were plain and convincing to the simple minds of earnest and obedient Christians in the early and apostolic ages,—and be it remembered, that St. Irenæus had lived with St. Polycarp, the disciple of St. John the Evangelist,—fall like so many blunted arrows against the thicker understandings of modern men, verilying, we presume, enacts, (clause xxxv.) "that no manner of order, act, or determination for any matter of religion, or cause ecclesiastical, had or made by the authority of the present Parliament, shall be accepted, deemed, interpreted, or adjudged, at any time hereafter, to be any error; heresy, schism or schismatical opinion; any order, decree, sentence, constitution or law, whatsoever the same be, to the contrary notwithstanding." So that the acts must interpret the articles, and not the articles the acts.

the words of our Saviour, who praised his Father, the Lord of heaven and earth, because He had hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and had revealed them to little ones.

We had really thought to have dismissed this part of the subject here; but on casting our eyes back upon the rule laid down by the bishop for discovering "the secrets of God," "the essential doctrines of Christianity," we cannot forbear one or two more observations, because we conceive them necessary to complete our defence against what we are vain enough to believe has been principally aimed at ourselves. "The implement," says the right rev. prelate, "with which the secrets of God are to be dug out of the mine of his written words, is not tradition; but a plain and rightly informed understanding, guided by an honest and good heart, and aided by the Holy Spirit." Now, the first question which presents itself to our mind is, Is this the grave and deliberate opinion of a doctor and bishop of the Church of England, who believes that his Church hath authority in controversies of faith, under whatever modifications? or is it the sudden and heated effusion of a fanatical dissenting minister? For is it not the language of Wickliff and of Huss, of Penn and of Wesley, and of all the multifarious followers of that great heresiarch? Though Wesley died as true a member of the Church of England as is Bishop Bloomfield! Nay, is it not the very principle adopted by Luther, and Calvin, and Knox, and Fox, and every separate leader of a separate heresy, from the days in which the Church had first to contend against the attacks of her rebellious children, grown impatient of restraint, down to these prolific ages of sectarianism, in which creeds spring up at the bidding of every trader in religion? If this be the "implement" by which the Thirty-nine Articles are to be dug out of the mine of the written word we beg to surmise that the search will be as wild and fruitless as that of the prince who toiled up the stony sides of the Black Mountain, in pursuit of the speaking bird, the golden water, and the singing tree; and that the seeker for these secret treasures of God has just as much chance of lighting upon the philosopher's stone as upon the doctrines of the Church of England, still less upon those of the right rev. prelate. Indeed we question not that the deeper he goes, the greater will be his obscurity; for certain it is that the lights of his doctrine will not shine amidst the darkness in which he will find himself involved; and he may be glad to return to the twilight regions he has left behind, and into which he entered the moment he commenced the search.

Heaven knows that we have reason to rejoice at, and God grant that we may sufficiently appreciate, the immense blessing which the contrary doctrine—for it is precisely the contrary that is the doctrine of the Catholic Church—confers upon its professors; for they who believe with the ancient Fathers, that the Church of Christ is founded upon a rock, and that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it*; that Christ is with those to whom He entrusted the commission of teaching all days, even to the consummation of the world; that the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, abides for ever with the Church,† the Church of the living God, the pillar and the ground of the truth*; are thereby no longer exposed like children to be tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the wickedness of men, by cunning craftiness, by which they lie in wait to deceive†; nor to become the victims to error and to pride, because of those things which are hard to be understood, and which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction‡. Not only are they preserved from these great and afflicting dangers, but they are at the same time secured in the enjoyment of a firm and steadfast faith.

But we can hardly dismiss this part of the subject without some few illustrations.

Fox for example, the celebrated founder of the Quakers, was precisely of the same opinion as Bishop Bloomfield: he was "firmly persuaded that if no such formularies (as the creeds) had ever been drawn out, all the essential doctrines of Christianity would have been discoverable in the Bible." Fox had no companion but the Bible, no interpreter but the aid of the Holy Spirit, no qualification but a plain and (as he and as hundreds of thousands of others believed with him) a rightly informed understanding; but then he was more consistent than the Bishop, and never attempted to supply his deficiencies, by artfully enlisting in his cause a whole creed of doctrines drawn from other sources. He neither believed in the validity of infant, nor indeed of any other baptism; nor in the sanctification of the Sunday§; nor in the government of the Church by bishops; nor indeed in any Church government at all; nor in the Trinity; nor in the right of our Saviour to any worship, but the worship of the spirit; nor in some other points, such as the Lord's Supper—rejecting all other communion but the communion of hearts. All these he discarded from his symbol of faith, because his plain understanding could not discover them in the Bible; and we must own that, in so doing, he has evinced, upon the whole, more consistency than has the Bishop of London in adopting them; while both maintain the same rule of faith. Penn also taught, with the Bishop of London, "that nothing more was required to be believed than the fundamental articles of the Christian religion; that is, those truths which are so clearly expressed in the sacred Scripture, as to be easily understood by each particular person." Yet Penn did not believe any one of those which the Bishop of London believes, though they both start from the same point, both draw their faith from the same sources, and both pretend to have discovered the truest system of Christian theology||.

REVIEW.

The Manual of Devotion. By Ambrose Lisle Phillips, Esq. Derby: Richardson. For the Catholic Book Society. 1843.

We are very glad to receive from Mr. Phillips this little pious offering. His "Manual of Devotion" is exclusively concerned with the devotion of the Living Rosary; of the origin of which the author gives the following account:—

The devotion of the Living Rosary was established a short time ago at Lyons in the kingdom of France, by a pious lady, who devotes her whole time to the service of God, and by a holy priest, who is the curate of the celebrated church which is dedicated to the B. Virgin Mary, and St. Thomas of Canterbury, on the hill of Fourvieres, very near the city of Lyons. This devotion was submitted to the present Pope Gregory for his approbation; and the holy father expressed himself filled with consolation at its institution: not only did he highly approve of it, but he attached to it the grant of holy indulgences. Behold the terms in which our chief bishop recommends to us this holy devotion:—

"Gregory, bishop, servant of the servants of God—Beloved children, health and apostolic benediction."

"In the midst of that profound sorrow, wherewith these evil days have overwhelmed our soul, we have found one subject of consolation, in that which we have heard from our dear son, Aloysius Lambruschini, cardinal presbyter of the holy Roman Church, touching a pious exercise instituted to promote the devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary, under the title of the Living Rosary, principally owing to the zeal of our dear daughter, Mary Jaricot, which, by your efforts and care, is now making such happy progress in the kingdom of France. We have not failed to bless God Almighty, the true fountain of all consolation and the Father of Lights, for having vouchsafed to inspire you, and so many other servants of his holy mother, with the holy thought of devoting yourselves entirely to propagate everywhere her devotion by the recital of a form of prayer so short and so easy. Most readily therefore do we concur with our authority, in order to help you in extending this pious institution as widely as possible; wherefore we open to you the heavenly treasures of holy indulgences, as you will find in the apostolic letter which we have directed to you, appended unto this.

"Continue then, dear children, encouraged by this spiritual assistance, which we have drawn forth for you from the inexhaustible treasury of God, most diligently to promote the devotion of the Blessed Virgin, the mother of God; being confirmed moreover by the most sweet thought, that under her guidance you have nothing to fear, and that as long as you are ruled over by her, you can never fall away. That you may succeed in your pious purpose, as an earnest of the divine protection, and in testimony of our good-will towards you, and towards all those who devote themselves to this pious exercise, we cheerfully impart to you our apostolic blessing.

"Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, this second day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, in the first year of our episcopacy. GREGORY, POPE XVI."

Endorsed as follows:—"To our beloved sons, John Francis Betemps, canon of the Church of Lyons, and to Benedict Marduel, vicar of the parish church of St. Rock, at Paris."

To this letter is appended an apostolic brief, wherein the holy father is pleased to grant the following indulgences to all the faithful of Christ of both sexes, who shall be inscribed in the guild or confraternity of the Living Rosary.

The method of this devotion may be new to many of our readers; we therefore beg our author to give them an explanation in his own words.

A confraternity of the Living Rosary consists of several little companies, of fifteen individuals in each, answering to the fifteen mysteries of the holy Rosary. When they have been admitted into the confraternity, they assemble every month in their parish church for the purpose of receiving each individual his proper ticket, on which is written one of the fifteen mysteries of the Rosary, for which he draws lots with the other members of the company composed of the fifteen. However many companies of the fifteen there may be, each one does the same. By this arrangement, each individual of the fifteen reciting his own proper decad every day, all fifteen mysteries are recited every day of the month. No one can complain of the length of this devotion, for the recital of one decad of the Rosary will not take up much of his time; the poorest labourer may surely give a few minutes each day to the service of Jesus and his dearest mother Mary. If he will do so, Jesus and Mary will bless him, Jesus will forgive him his sins, and Mary will not fail to pray for him. Oh! blessed is the man for whom Mary prays! oh! can such an one perish? Before we recite our decad of the Rosary, it will be profitable to read the meditation belonging to the mystery which has fallen to our lot, when we drew our ticket on the first Sunday of the month. It is not necessary to do this in order to gain the indulgences annexed to the devotion, but it will enable us to recite our decad with greater fervour, and we must never forget that the fruit of prayer depends in a great measure upon the fervour with which we offer it to God.

The greater part of this little volume consists first of an explanation of the devotion to our Blessed Lady, and of the Rosary in particular—then of this particular confraternity—and lastly, of a series of meditations on each of the fifteen mysteries. We have looked over these—rather too hurriedly, perhaps, but yet with much pleasure and edification. We hope they may be found as extensively useful as their pious author desires. We conclude with the following extract:—

It is a fact that millions of devout Catholics all over the world are at this moment praying to God for the conversion of England. There is no object for which our holy father, Pope Gregory, is so solicitous, as he is for the conversion of our country. To this object the prayers of the confraternity of the Living Rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary, established at Lyons, in the kingdom of France, are specially directed; and for this purpose the brethren and sisters of that devout confraternity, to the number of more than four thousand, assemble every Saturday in the church of St. Mary, of Fourvieres close to the town of Lyons, where they receive the solemn benediction of the holy sacrament, and sing the litanies of our Lady, to implore her intercession for the conversion of England. In this same church there is a chapel, dedicated to our glorious Archbishop of Canterbury, the blessed Martyr of Jesus Christ, St. Thomas à Becket. The pilgrims devoutly implore the intercession of this great servant of God for the same end. As the confraternities of the Living Rosary established in England are intimately connected with the great confraternity of Lyons, we should never omit to add to our decalogue of the Rosary this invocation—"St. Thomas of Canterbury, glorious martyr of Christ, pray for England." It would seem to be full of heavenly mystery, that this pious devotion, the principal object of which is to obtain from God the conversion of England, should have been first instituted at Lyons in the very church which is dedicated under the invocation of our great English saint, St. Thomas of Canterbury, who was the first to fall a martyr to that rebellious and sacrilegious spirit, which three centuries later was destined to overthrow the outward profession of the faith in this country. It plainly indicates that this glorious martyr has not forgotten his unfortunate country, but that he now again stands up before God to implore of him its re-conversion. Let us hope that as the first act of those who separated the church of England from Catholic unity in the reign of Henry VIII. was to destroy the glorious shrine of this great saint, and to burn his bones, so the first act of England, when it shall return to that unity, will be to restore with more costly magnificence than ever the shrine of this our thrice blessed patron, in the cathedral church of Canterbury. Oh! what a goodly sight it would be once again to behold tens of thousands of Englishmen marching to Canterbury for the restoration of the shrine of St. Thomas the martyr! O glorious St. Thomas! O blessed archbishop! most holy primate of England! pray for us, that we may one day behold this blessed sight! To man this may seem impossible; but to God all things are possible.—Tablet, June 17.

MISCELLANEA.

THE CHILDREN OF CATHOLIC SOLDIERS.—We have received the following paragraph from a rev. correspondent:—"I had the honour of addressing you some two or three weeks ago relative to the education of the children of Catholic soldiers. I stated—with the view of calling the attention of those concerned to the fact—I stated then, and I now beg to state again, the lamentable truth that all, or nearly all the children of our Catholic soldiers are being educated Protestants. The Catholic catechism is not taught in the regimental schools, but instead of it, our children learn the catechism of the Church of England. Now, what I want is, to apprise the Catholic public of this sad state of things—to rouse the Catholic clergymen in every part of the world where there is a Catholic soldier's child to be found, and to implore of him to cause the parent of such child to see that it is not, under the specious pretext of education, cheated out of its religion. The Government, I verily believe, may be said to act with regard to the education of our regimental children, in a spirit of fairness. They do not, indeed, teach our catechism in their schools; but neither do they compel us to learn theirs, while, at the same time, they use every art to encourage us to do so. What they insist on is, that we learn something in point of religion: and if we do not wish to learn our own, they will very charitably teach us theirs. Under these circumstances, our duty is obvious. Let the parents be urged to see that their children do not, in the first place, learn the Church of England catechism. They must insist on this; and secondly they must take care to see them taught the pure doctrines of Catholicism. No Government can object to this; the British soldier is free in religious matters; he must, of course, worship somewhere, but he can choose his place and form of adoration. Now, it would be a shame, a crying injustice, to compel the parents to march every Sunday to a Catholic church, and, at the same time, teach the children during the week, that the worship of the Catholic Church is false and idolatrous. I need not say any more on this subject: I trust enough has been said to call the attention of parents, of clergymen, and of the Catholic public in general to so important a subject as the religious education of the dear offspring of our brave Catholic soldiers.

THE JESUITS.—We understand the Jesuits have at length received from Rome permission to build a church on their recently-purchased site, near South Audley-street, the conditions being that they shall build another church in such locality as may be appointed by the Bishop, and shall not have the power to administer the sacraments of baptism &c.

The Right Rev. Dr. John Hughes, Bishop of New York, has spoken in the following terms of Mr. O'Connell's last work:—"Every man of every creed who hates persecution and intolerance, ought to have it; every Catholic, and above all, Irish Catholics, ought to have two copies—one for himself and his children, another to be loaned to his Protestant neighbours who may be anxious to ascertain how and why it came to pass that so lovely a land and so brave a people as Ireland and the Irish should have been oppressed, degraded, and impoverished as they are at the present day."

SCHOOLS AND CONVENTS.—Out of 1,222,137 children receiving instruction in this kingdom, 48,470 are found in the schools of Dissenters.—Herald. The total number of grammar schools in England and Wales are 450. About 150 of these were founded as apologies for the destruction of religious houses in the sixteenth century, and were sometimes endowed with such discount out of the spoil as the spoilers' conscience dictated. Compare the "good" done in these grammar schools for the last 300 years with the works of education and charity performed on their sites during the preceding three centuries.

THE TETOTAL SYSTEM.—In a letter vindicating the tetotalisers from a statement made by the London correspondent of a provincial journal, Mr. Mathew says:—"I have never advocated temperance as a substitute for the eternal Gospel—God forbid! I have, from my own private resources, without ever soliciting a shilling of public aid, distributed some thousand copies of the Douay version of the Holy Bible; and with the approbation of the most rev. the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland, I have in the press a new edition of the sacred volume, to be published in twelve numbers, at the low price of six-pence each number. This will place the Old and New Testament within the reach of almost every head of a family in Ireland. If I had pecuniary resources equal to my wishes, every one of the six millions of tetotalisers in this kingdom would have a copy of the blessed book before the end of the present year."—Tablet.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

We have already explained the reasons why we deem it of so much importance to refute the injurious statements to religion contained in Mangnall's Historical Questions. Besides the motives which have been assigned, we may add, that we are also influenced by the consideration that the principles and arguments which we shall employ in repelling the unjust statements we complain of, will fully suffice for the confutation of many of the calumnies, with which not only school books, but even popular works in great circulation, too often abound. To proceed in the work on which we have entered. In page 14 of Mangnall's Questions the following are enumerated as the chief events of the sixth century. "Time computed by the Christian era: a plague which extended over Europe, Asia and Africa, lasting fifty years: and the unlimited temporal, as well as spiritual authority assumed by the Popes." We need hardly say, that we mean to confine our remarks to the last member of the preceding quotation. And first, we may be allowed to indulge in a certain degree of complacency in the admission, that the exercise of the spiritual power of the Popes is here allowed to be of so ancient a date as that of the sixth century. If Catholics err in recognising the spiritual supremacy of the Roman Pontiff, there are at least some honor and consolation to be derived from the reflection, that the authority which they profess to reverence is the most ancient in the world—that it has seen, in the revolution of ages, empires and dynasties crumble into ruin, whilst itself, after the lapse of nearly thirteen hundred years, according to Mangnall, retains together with the hoary honors of centuries all the vigor and energy of youth, and sends forth in the nineteenth century her Bishops and her Missionaries to the end of the earth, with the same zeal, with which, in the sixth century, she accomplished the conversion of the Franks, and planted the cross by the hands of St. Augustine, in the heart of England. How has the perpetuation of the Papal dynasty alone, amidst the wreck of every other, been effected? Whilst other dynasties had to sustain only the shock of political evils, the Roman Pontiff's throne was exposed besides, to all the dangers, and the fierce assaults, which originated in the malice and hatred of innovators against the chair of Peter, because, by the condemnation of that chair, heresy and schism, under all their various names and pretences, were in every age proscribed and paralysed. Yet despite of the vengeance of temporal princes, or of daring and rebellious Heresiarchs, the Apostolic bark of Peter has outlived the fury of every tempest, and never from the age of Christ himself, did she appear more buoyant than at present, never better prepared to guide the whirlwind and to rule the storm of error or innovation. Let any calm reflecting man only advert to the strange, the astounding spectacle, which presented itself in our own time, when the venerable Pontiff Pius the Seventh was restored to his capital by the arms of Great Britain, a nation which for three centuries was drunk with the blood of Catholic Martyrs, and which, even at the very period, when controlled by an unseen Providence, she was made instrumental in the perpetuation, of the chair of Peter, visited with ignominy and dishonor the profession of Catholicity in her dominions. Again, let us turn our attention to the mysterious dispensations of God in the terrific event of the French Revolution. A Dynasty and a Nation preeminently Catholic are prostrated by the desolating evil of an Infidel revolution. For a time, the enemies of Catholicity triumph in the imaginary success thus achieved over one of the noblest portions of the inheritance of Christ. God permits for a season the humiliation of his people. The Monarch, the Hierarchy, the Priests, the Holy Virgins, together with the pride and flower of the French Nobility flee for refuge to Protestant England, and Protestant England receives them with open arms, throws open her palaces and asylums for the refugees, and calls on her Parliament to provide for their decent and honorable subsistence. From shore to shore invitations come to these Confessors of Catholicity from the English Nobles and aristocracy offering them a home in their princely mansions. Many profit of the invitation; and Catholicity, which was before almost an unknown religion in England, becomes everywhere a familiar subject of conversation and inquiry. The result is, first, that ignorance and prejudice are gradually dispelled, and next, these great impediments to impartial inquiry being removed, the seed of the true faith began to be committed to the soil, and to grow, until, as every mail now bears testimony, it fructifies a hundred fold, and realizes to the letter the promise of the Saviour, that though at first small and tender like the mustard seed, it should attain a maturity and expansion so great, that the birds of Heaven, the high and the exalted in learning and dignity, should seek shelter under its branches. The man who can view all these wonderful occurrences unmoved, and not perceive in them strong though silent indications of the Providence of God in the order of Religion, does not deserve to be envied either for the qualities of his head or of his heart. Such a man would not recognise in the order of the Heavens, in the succession of day and night, in the revolution of the seasons, or even in the wonders which are contained in human nature, any other effects, except those which might be ascribed to blind chance or an unmeaning destiny. The pious Catholic, on the contrary, discovers in the exaltation and humiliations of the true religion, the parental watchfulness of the Saviour for the sanctification of his Church. He sees the Church, at one time like the Bark of Peter, almost submerged beneath the waves of calumny and persecution, but, at the very instant, when destruction appeared inevitable, he hears the voice of the Saviour commanding the waters to be still, and a great calm ensues. At another time, he sees the Apostolic Fishermen labouring in vain during the dreariness of the whole night, and their toil left almost wholly unrewarded, when, again he is cheered by the interposition of the Saviour bidding Peter to let go his nets a second time, and, as it were, in a moment they are replenished, so as to require additional aid in order to draw them to the shore. Can we view the past sterility of conversions in England for nearly three centuries, and contemplate the numbers that now hasten with emulation to enter into the Apostolic nets, and not be reminded of the instructive parable, to which reference has just been made? For the present we shall dismiss this subject, only to resume it more fully in a short time.

Extracts from a letter written by a Convert in Dublin to another in Calcutta. July 28, 1843.

Dr. O. has not yet made his appearance, but he is daily expected. I am sorry he was not here in Pentecost week, he could have got some of the newly ordained Priests, whereas now they are all dispersed; however God will provide more; I cannot tell you how truly thankful I am, that you so abundantly thought of me on the happiest day I have ever seen; the day of my reception into the Church; be assured I shall not forget you next month; but to do myself justice, I must tell you I conceive the debt I owe you of such immense magnitude, that I could never be satisfied with a yearly payment. I am aware the coin I pay you in even surpasses in value the magnitude of my debt, but my infirmity is such as to weaken its power, so in order that you should not be a loser I make it a rule (God permitting) to approach the holy communion to obtain showers of blessings upon you every Thursday, so you may know what I am about and of whom I am thinking every Thursday at 8 o'clock. I choose that day because the blessing bestowed on the faithful on that day was verified in the same gift being bestowed on myself on the same day, and, humanly speaking, you were the cause of it; and oh let me thank you, and let me tell you how grateful I am, but indeed words are of no use, they cannot convey all I feel; you will be pleased when I tell you that I have become very intimate with Dr. Wiseman: he has been making a tour of many parts of Ireland, and I happened to have a friend in Mrs. G. Wise, the M. P.'s sister-in-law, at whose house Dr. Wiseman was staying at Kingstown, I have in consequence met him at dinner frequently and hope for that pleasure again to-morrow. I wish I could have sent you a paper containing an account of the holy sacrifice being offered up about 3 Sundays ago by a Protestant Minister (that was) who administered the holy communion on the same day to 7 other late Protestant Divines: was not that a glorious sight? there was not a dry eye in the Church. It took place at Oscott.—I think if——had seen them he too would have run to be received into the Church; but oh! ask him from me wherefore does he loiter—tell him the way is open now, the day may come when that awful passage of scripture might be verified in him “that he shall strive to enter in and shall not be able.” The conversions in England go on at a rapid rate: they are truly wonderful. The Hon’ble and Rev. Mr. Talbot. Nephew to Lord Talbot, was to have preached about 4 Sundays ago to his congregation near Dublin, but being in London, he thought he would return by Oscott and witness some of the ceremonies there, but glory be to God, the previous Saturday to the Sunday to which he was to have preached in darkness, he was admitted into the Church of Peace and Truth.

What! they teach, that the same change which happened to the water at the feast in Cana, happens even yet at the nuptial feast of the children of promise in the Lord’s Supper? You might as well expect them to swallow poison, as to teach such doctrine. They believe nothing more to be contained in the Sacrament than mere bread and wine, and if you ask their opinion (not faith) on the Sacrament, they will probably tell you, that they think it is not what the Papists believe it to be; but that it is a figure of the body and blood of Christ!! (vide Dr. Watt’s small Catechism.) Aye, if they could see the change of substance in the Sacrament, or find it out by the taste, as well as the persons at the marriage-feast in Cana, could find out thereby the transubstantiation of the water into wine, it would become quite a different affair; but now, as they neither see nor taste any thing better than bread and wine in the Sacrament, they have no mind of admitting anything else being there. As for the blessing pronounced by Christ upon those who do believe, although they did not see, they think it to be good only for simpletons, who won’t make good use of their reason. How far different from theirs the behaviour of the faithful of ancient times, how little were they accustomed to make void the faith of Christ by corroding sophistries! Indeed they will not deserve the reproach of our divine Master: “O ye of little faith, why did you doubt?” But to continue our quotation from the celebrated passage of St. Cyrill, “Nam in figura panis,” he goes on to say, “datur tibi corpus, et in figura vini datur tibi sanguis.” Which means: “For under the figure of bread is given to thee THE BODY, and under the figure of wine is given to thee THE BLOOD.” This is certainly pressing matters very hard with our modern figurists, and holding forth the present Catholic doctrine to its utmost perfection. The Catholic Church teaches by Transubstantiation, that the real substance in the Blessed Eucharist consists in the body and blood of Christ; so does St. Cyrill. She moreover teaches, that of the elements, viz. bread and wine, nothing else remains, except the outward figure; so does St. Cyrill, as is evident from his Greek: ἐν τῷ γὰρ ἁρώ; οἶνον, that is, under the type, the emblem, outward appearance of bread and wine. Let us now see how well Calvin and the venerable Patriarch of Jerusalem agree in their doctrines. The Saint teaches, that under the figure of bread and wine we receive (in substance) the body and blood of Christ. On the contrary John Calvin teaches his disciples, that under the real substance of bread and wine, they get only by a figure of Christ’s body and blood. This is a goodly example for sovereign contempt of antiquity. A fool may see that John Calvin and St. Cyrill do not unite in the bonds of theological friendship; and a child may decide the question of who of the two has the more reasonable chance of being aright. St. Cyrill continues by saying: “Quamobrem ne tanquam nudis panis et vino adtende, sunt enim corpus et sanguis Christi, secundum Domini asseverationem: nan etiam si illud tibi suggerat sensus, fides tamen te certum et firmum efficiat. Ne judices rem ex gustu; sed ex fide citra ullam dubitationem certus esto, te, corporis et sanguinis Christi dono dignatum fuisse.” That is “For which reason do not attend to them as MERE BREAD AND WINE, for they ARE the BODY AND BLOOD of Christ, according to the Lord’s assurance. For although the outward sense may suggest it to thee, yet faith has to render thee certain and firm. Do NOT JUDGE OF THE THING BY ITS TASTE, but by faith rest assured beyond the shadow of doubt, that thou art vouchsafed the gift of the BODY AND BLOOD of Christ.” This is what we call the simplicity of unostentations, christian-like faith; very unlike that which actuated the hearts of certain so-called reformers (!) in the sixteenth-century, with whom at one time nothing would go down except faith; who strained every nerve to create a hue and cry about the necessity of faith, about the paramount importance of faith alone, and, when they had thrown people into a fever of maddening excitement made off with some of the most precious parts of divine revelation. Imitating thereby closely the usual trickery of cutpurses, who are apt to raise a false alarm about approaching thieves and robbers, and in the interval of ensuing consternation and confusion decamp in safety with whatever things valuable, come into their predatory hands. Is it not as much surprizing, as it is melancholy, to perceive how in an age which prided itself with having restored (?) faith to its proper high position, those very persons who boasted of having achieved this great action raised their sacrilegious hands against one of the most awful articles of divine faith, and tried to bring the doctrine of the Lord's Supper from the lofty eminence it enjoyed at their time, certainly all over Christendom, down to the level of their own span of poor human reason, and the lowliness of their own uncertain senses! The case was widely different with the ancient Church, for example with St. Cyrill and his times. They possessed that great, simple, and lively faith, which both enlightens in this life and saves in the other; though they made but little noise about it. Their faith was a practical illustration of St. Paul's precept, "to submit our reason to the obedience of faith." They did not say with Thomas the Apostle and our modern Protestants, "unless I see, and touch, I won't believe," but they judged of the things of God by the assurances received from the Lord. Hence the filially faithful address of St. Cyrill to his hearers; cautioning them against mistaking the Lord's Supper for mere bread and wine; for, he says, they (viz. what seems bread and wine) have been transubstantiated, they are the BODY AND BLOOD of Christ. And the reason thereof, assigned by the saint, is that simple one, lesser than which none would suffice to persuade a Christian mind, and greater than which there is none, because, he says "the Lord hath assured us." Indeed, he continues, thy senses are apt to suggest to thee nothing extraordinary in the Blessed sacrament; yet it is not by the testimony of the eyes or the taste, &c. that thou hast to form thy judgment in these heavenly matters, but faith, by the word of Christ, must render thee assured, that, what thou receivest in the Blessed Eucharist, is beyond a shadow of doubt the real, true, and substantial body and blood of Christ. Methinks, Mr. Editor, all this shews evidently that even in our days we have not a stronger advocate of Transubstantiation than St. Cyrill and the fourth century of the Church were in theirs. In fact the zealous Catechist can hardly find words strong enough to express his Catholic sense of the subject. Hence he calls in this same catechesis, those that have received the holy communion χριστοφοροι, which means persons that carry Christ within their bodies, because they received His flesh and blood within themselves, and have thus become partners of the divine nature. Now let us see, how a Calvinistic Catechist would address his auditory: "For which reasons, my worthy Christians," he would say, "I beg you will be attentive, lest you take the Lord's Supper to be anything else but mere bread and wine; and mind, this sacramental bread and wine, you ought to take with a pious commemoration of Christ's passion, because hereby they become an emblem, or, what's the same, a figure of Christ's body and blood, in the same way, suppose, as a picture represents a man. And you may rest satisfied about this being the case, because that pious and clever man John Calvin of Geneva hath assured us of it. For although the Papists pretend that there is something extraordinary in it, yet our outward senses must convince us at once that the Romanists are dreaming. For what is to render us certain in these matters? Is it not our senses? Christ, our Blessed Lord hath said to us nothing about these things. How then have we to judge of them, I wish to know? Is it not by the testimony of our eyes, our nose, our mouth our touch, &c.? Has not God given us our senses for the very purpose of ascertaining exterior objects? And if we venture upon mistrusting them, what can be certain to us? Hence you may rest assured, that when you receive the Sacrament, you receive nothing else than the body and blood of Christ in figure, but mere bread and wine in reality." It is evident at first sight that the Calvinistic and ancient Christian Catechists teach diametrically opposite doctrines, and it is easy to determine, who had the better opportunity of knowing the truth. I now conclude, Mr. Editor, my reflections upon the doctrine of St. Cyrill anent the Eucharist, but cannot take leave of him, without once more affording myself, and, I hope your readers also, the pleasure of repeating at full uninterrupted length his justly celebrated and convincing passage: "Even this one instruction of blessed Paul suffices abundantly to render certain your faith about the divine mysteries, through which, by being deemed worthy of them, you have become of the same body and blood with Christ. For he proclaimed even now.... As then He Himself has pronounced of the bread and said: 'This is my body,' who will henceforth dare to put it into question? And as He Himself has affirmed and said: 'This is my blood' who will ever doubt, and say, it is not His Blood? He changed of old in Cana of Galilee water into wine, which has an affinity to blood, and should we deem Him little worth of credit, when He changes wine into (His) blood? Called to these bodily espousals, He performed this stupendous wonder, shall we then not confess that he has much rather bestowed it upon the children of His (chaste) nuptial bed, to feast upon His body and blood? Hence let us with full persuasion receive them as the body and blood of Christ. For under the figure of bread is given to thee the body, and under the figure of wine is given to thee the blood. For which reason do not attend to them as mere bread and wine, for they are the body and blood of Christ according to the Lord's assurance. For though the outward sense may suggest it to thee, yet faith has to render thee certain and firm. Do not judge of the thing by its taste, but by faith rest assured beyond the shadow of doubt, that thou wert vouchsafed the gift of the body and blood of Christ."

SCOTLAND.

HAWICK —LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH, BY THE REV. WILLIAM WALLACE.—Thursday, the 1st of June, was a happy day for the Catholics of Hawick and its vicinity. The Rev. William Wallace, chaplain to the Earl of Traquair, being made aware that nearly two hundred Catholics, employed in this town and the surrounding district, had no place of worship within upwards of twenty miles surrendered his all in behalf of this destitute class, and raised a Catholic chapel, where there had not been one since the demolishing days of John Knox. On the day appointed for laying the foundation stone of the sacred edifice, which is in a considerable state of forwardness (the wall being upwards of four feet above the base), the rev. gentleman, in his robes, attended by the provost and magistrates of the town, proceeded from the Commercial Inn to the site of the high altar, and immediately commenced the sacred ceremony in Latin, according to the Roman ritual, after which he repeated the same in English, for the edification of the crowded congregation. In the stone was deposited the following inscription, enclosed in a bottle, sealed with the town's seal and arms, and also registered in the town's books, which will remain for ages yet unborn.

Anno Incarnacionis Dominicæ MDCCCLIII.
Regente Universalem Dei Ecclesiam Gregorio XVI.,

Pontifice Maximo.

Magnæ Britannix Sceptum gerente Victoria Regina.

Sub R. R. Andrea Carruthers Districtus Orientalis Scotiæ Vicario Apostolico, et. R. R. Jacobo Gillis ejusdem.

Coadjutore.

Prætores Hawick, Gulielmo Turnbull.
Plaudentibus utriusque religionis civibus hujusce Ecclesiæ in honorem B. V. Mariæ, et sub S. David Scotorum regis tutela Deo dicatæ primarium posuit lapidem Gul. Wallace Sanctæ Ecclesiæ Cath. Apost. et Romanæ Sacerdos, Calendis Junii.

It is not a little singular that the original parish church of Hawick, also called St. Mary's, was founded in the year 1214, and within four days of the same date as the present church, which is to be an extensive neat structure, with a very chaste Gothic front. The rev. gentleman has purchased ground sufficient to build a dwelling house and school-house. The utmost attention and decorum were manifested throughout by the assembled multitude, for which we Catholics cannot be sufficiently grateful. In the evening the rev. gentleman entertained a numerous party at dinner in the Commercial Hotel; the company consisted of the magistrates of the town, Messrs. Reid and Michie, the contractors, and some of the rev. gentleman's private friends. The Rev. Mr. Wallace occupied the chair, and was ably supported on the right by William Turnbull Esq. senior magistrate, on the left by Wm. Scott, Esq., junior magistrate; Peter Wilson, Esq., late chief magistrate of the borough, acted as croupier. The cloth being removed the following besides many other toasts and sentiments were given and kindly responded to :—"The Queen, may her reign be long and prosperous" (from the chair, three times three); "Prince Albert and the Royal Family;" "Her Majesty's Ministers;" "The Army and Navy;" "The Magistrates and Burgh of Hawick," to which Wm. Turnbull, Esq., responded in a very neat and appropriate speech; "The Earl of Traquair, and Lady Louisa Stuart;" "Success to the building of which the foundation has been this day laid;" "The Rev. Wm. Wallace, may he long enjoy the church he has this day founded," to which the rev. gentleman replied in an address full of affection and kind feeling, in which he stated that he was most anxious to see his arduous undertaking finished, so that his successors might have less to do; "Daniel O'Connell;" "Father Mathew, success to his labours" (much cheering); "May Hawick hearts, as usual, be ever in their proper place." It was also unanimously voted by the magistrates that when the church is opened for Divine worship (which it is anticipated will be in October or November), the Right Hon. the Earl of Traquair and the Rev. Wm. Wallace shall each of them be presented with a burgess's ticket, being the highest mark of respect they (the magistrates) have in their power to confer. The rev. chairman returned thanks in his own name and that of his noble patron, assuring them, in the most feeling manner, how much he valued the honour the magistrates of Hawick intended to confer upon himself, considering how little he had done to deserve it, at the same time assuring them, in the name of the noble earl, that there was no token of respect and esteem of which he was not worthy, as a kind, considerate, and most indulgent landlord, a good master to all under him, and a faithful dispenser of relief to the poor, the widow, the helpless, and the orphan. After spending the evening in the most harmonious manner the party separated, in the hope of soon meeting again before the altar of St. Mary's Church. As the Rev. Mr. Wallace wished to show the utmost kindness to all concerned, he gave all the men employed at the building (about forty) a substantial supper. The following toasts, amongst others, were given :—"The Rev. Wm. Wallace," "Success to St. Mary's Church," "The Builders of the Chapel," "The Earl of Traquair, the best of landlords, and Lady Louisa Stuart." On the rev. founder's health being given, Mr. Andrew Michie one of the contractors, rose and replied in a long and able speech. He stated that the rev. founder of the church could have no other motive for the undertaking except the purest charity; after having spent a long life in instructing others into justice, he was now establishing a house of prayer for members of his religious profession, where they might offer up their supplications to their God, according to their conscience, for ages to come.

BRUGES CATHEDRAL.—The gigantic outward proportions of the building struck Edward with amazement; but when he passed into the interior, a sense of solemn admiration made him stand still and silent before he advanced many steps.

There is a reverential feeling, produced by the aspect of a large gothic interior, which even long habit cannot overcome, and whose first experience is almost oppressive. The cold vastness into which we at once are plunged on passing the portal has a chastening effect, and we pause; the lessened light permitted through its painted windows is subduing, yet enticing, from the tainted harmony it sheds. The eye, raised ~~off~~ involuntary wonder of those lofty yet slender shafts that bear the over-hanging pile above, is lost in the complex beauty of the fretted roof. With slow and respectful steps, we move towards the centre of the aisle; we stand beside one of those apparently slender columns, and perceive it is a ponderous mass of masonry, to which the artifice of sculpture has imparted the seeming of lightness, and the presence at once of beauty and power commands our homage. We look through that long vista of columns, that stand like mighty sentinels guarding the approach to the altar, shedding its glories of gold and marble and pictured art from afar, through the open arch of the elaborate screen, whose slender filagree supports as if by magic, the gigantic organ above, whose melodious peal, should it then be waked, first bursting like thunder through the vaulted pile, and then fading to the faintest echo through the solemn vastness, fills the heart with a reverence bordering on awe, and lifts the mind above this world.

With what dumb stricken admiration did Edward first behold the cathedral of Notre Dame, where the gorgeous ceremony of a high mass increased his reverential wonder! Imagine a young man from the remote shores of Ireland, where the humble chapel of a friary was all he had ever seen in the service of that religion, whose exercise was there and then little better than felonious;—imagine him, for the first time, entering a temple of colossal proportion and elaborate beauty, and witnessing a high mass, in all the pomp of a dominant religion, with its gorgeous altars, its massive wax-lights, the odour of incense flung from silver censers by numerous acolytes, before the train of bishop, priest, and deacons, clad in the utmost splendour of sacerdotal robes, amid the organ's plaintive notes or full toned peal—the wail of choral voices or their exulting burst, as they were subdued to the penitential spirit of the confiteor, rose to the triumphant outpouring of the Gloria in excelsis—imagine this, and think with what emotion Edward knelt at a high mass in Bruges! Though the service in word and act was the same, yet the difference in extrinsic circumstances might well suggest the internal question—"Can this be the same religion in which I was reared? Is this the poor frightened faith, which hides in holes and corners in my native land?" And then the wish arose that those who sat in high places in Galway could only witness the splendour of the rites which appeared so powerfully to his own weak points. His passion for the lofty was flattered to its utmost bent by the "pomp and circumstance" he saw before him; and his father's apprehensions of the superior "gentility" of the Protestant religion were no longer valid, for from that moment Ned was firm in the faith of Rome.—S. LOVER.

INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

To the Rev. William Palmer, of Worcester College, Oxford.

REV. SIR,—I have received communications from several friends, assuring me that the letters which I have had the honour of addressing to you would not be complete unless I added another, demonstratively proving the infallibility of the church: therefore, complying with their request, I shall commence by asserting, that the Saviour has expressly promised that the gates of hell should never prevail against his church. The Protestant church of England, on the contrary, maintains in her thirty-nine articles, in the writings of her theologians, and in her pulpits, that they have prevailed against her. If the church of England consequently be in the right, I have no hesitation in declaring that it must necessarily follow, that Jesus Christ is an impostor, even when he proclaims himself to be the Son of the Eternal God. What! can I believe him to be the Son of God—he, who has deceived the whole world, declaring as he did that his church is infallible, and that it is more powerful than hell itself? No! The Christ is nothing more nor less than an impostor! Oh! behold here the horrible consequences which must spring forth from the principles sustained by this Anglican church. Cease then, inconsistent church of England, cease I say, to despise the gospel, which assures and confirms to the church an immortal existence; or cease for ever, to thunder forth your anathemas against the infamous Socinus and his followers. The Anglican church, as I have demonstratively shown in my second letter addressed to you, is the mere creature of human invention. This Anglican church presumes to declare, in the face of all truth, that the Catholic and apostolic church, the ground and pillar of truth, is deceived, and that she teaches error; consequently, that hell has prevailed against her; to which I reply, that if hell has prevailed against her, then Christ is no longer the Son of the Eternal God, having uttered a wilful falsehood, according to the Anglican church; and if Christ be not the Son of the Eternal God, then the monstrous Socinus and the infamous Arius are worthy of having altars erected to them, for having endeavoured by every means in their power to prevent the Christian world any longer from bending their knees to an idolatrous worship, since they have adored as a God he who, according to this Anglican church, has been convicted of uttering a shameful falsehood.... Thus arises the most revolting, the most impious of all assertions. Behold here, rev. sir, what must consequently follow this doctrine of your Anglican church, when she presumes to deny the infallibility of the church, which the Son of God has bequeathed to her in terms so clear and so precise that no man blessed with common sense and free from prejudice can deny it. Christ has likewise said to his apostles, "He who hears you, hears me; he who despises you, despises me; and he who despises me, despises my Father who is in heaven." Now permit me here to ask you, is it possible for a moment to be supposed, that the Saviour would grant to those whom he sent an authority equal to his own, at the same time, he did not render them infallible in their teaching? If so, we must listen with a perfect submission to men who are liable to error, and would not the consequence evidently be, that their teaching would ever be uncertain, and therefore impossible to arrive at the truth?

I shall not stop here to show that these words of the Saviour were equally addressed to the successors of the apostles. But is it not most evident, rev. sir, that the Saviour, in establishing his church, included both in his mind and in his love the whole universe, all ages and all generations, who were successively to appear on the stage of the earth. As, therefore, the apostles and their successors possess an authority exactly similar to that of Christ, they therefore are infallible; there can be no difficulty in regard to this point; there remains absolutely nothing to be solved but the question of fact, viz:—Where are the true lawful successors of the apostles to be found? a question which is not difficult to answer. Perhaps in a future letter, if I have time so to do, I shall treat of the sovereign pontiff as the head of the universal church, in his capacity as successor of St. Peter in the apostolic see of Rome.

Permit me now to ask you, was it sufficient that our blessed Saviour bestowed on his apostles and on their successors an absolute authority, and to have established them as his representatives among his people, in order to procure for them eternal salvation? Surely not. In the fear that some innovator like Luther and Calvin* should appear and pretend that the church has lost her infallibility in having taught damnable errors, Christ added therefore the following words, worthy of being written in letters of gold in all your splendid halls at Oxford, Cambridge, and Trinity College, Dublin: these admirable words are as follows:—"Go, my apostles, announce the gospel to all men; go, and behold I am with you all days, even till the consummation of the world." These words, rev. sir, are as brilliant and as expressive as the sun at mid-day. He who says "behold I am with you all days" leaves no ground for supposing any change in her doctrine. Catholicism is the river of peace, of which the prophet speaks, which flows through the bosom of the church, to refresh the bodies and souls of the faithful, and which will continue ever so to flow, till it be mixed up with the living waters of eternal life, of which St. John speaks in the Revelations, and where he represents it as transparent as crystal, and ever flowing before the throne of God and of the Lamb. I can cite the opinions of St. John and St. Paul in support of the proposition which I have just mentioned. Why does the first of these apostles call it the eternal gospel of Christ, if it were not to make us comprehend that the apostles, who were the first who received it, were to transmit it to their successors, these to others who were to follow them, and so on till time shall be no more? Why does the other apostle declare the church to be the ground and pillar of truth, if it were not likewise to make us comprehend that an edifice requires to rest on a solid foundation, without which it would very soon tumble to pieces?

* Luther was a man of the most shameful character; he broke all the vows which he solemnly made to God, and which conduct is in direct opposition to the sacred volume (see Numbers); he acknowledges that he abolished private masses by the advice of the devil, and that the devil used constantly to sleep closer to him than his Kate,—viz. Mrs. Luther.

Calvin was even still of a more infamous character than Luther, having been convicted and branded on the shoulder for the sin of Sodom. I have proved this in a former letter, to be found in one of the numbers of this excellent "Journal."—Such are the infamous and pretended Reformers of the Church of Christ.

Consequently the edifice of the Christian religion would have no consistency whatever, if it had not infallibility for its foundation, as an eternal and invulnerable basis. You cannot surely fail, rev. sir, to perceive the force of the evidence which I lay before you, with the Bible in my hand, of the immortal existence of the Catholic church, founded by the apostles.

The Catholic church is immortal because she is infallible, and she is infallible because the Saviour of the world has communicated to her his divine power, and has sent his blessed Spirit upon her, which will ever prevent her from darkening, in the smallest degree, the shining light of faith, or mixing up errors with her sacred doctrine. Any one, blessed with common sense and free from prejudice, cannot fail to perceive in the texts which I have quoted, and many others which I could produce, how authorized I am to proclaim, that in the Catholic church there is an absolute and a sovereign authority. Every innovator who falsely ranges himself among the enemies of the church's infallibility is, therefore, obliged, before he raises the standard of revolt, to destroy our holy Scriptures, or to uphold this horrible proposition; viz.—that our blessed Saviour and his apostles have deceived the whole world, since they have forced mankind to submit to the teaching authority of a church which has served for no other purpose, as Protestants continually assert, but to corrupt the nations of the earth, in presenting to them, with a divine authority, the cup poisoned with the superstitions and errors of Paganism. All the efforts of the holy fathers are directed, as you cannot fail to perceive in perusing their works, to establish a one only society, founded by the apostles in the name of Christ, in order that it may evangelize, in every age, all the inhabitants of the earth. Consequently this society has derived its origin from Christ himself, according to the opinions of the fathers, such as Saint Irenæus, Saint Tertullian, Saint Cyprian, Saint Augustine, &c., &c., &c. It is therefore incontestable, that she must be considered as immortal, she being constructed in a very different manner from all your philosophical schools, or from all your Protestant sects, who acknowledge for their founders none but depraved and sinful mortals, such, I repeat, as Luther, Calvin, Zwinglius, &c., &c., subject to errors, and who for a certain period have been permitted by the Creator of the world to vomit forth their horrible doctrines, and then to disappear from the face of the earth. If this society, according to the constant opinion of the fathers, has alone the right to make herself respected and obeyed, the Saviour placing all her disobedient children under the dreadful penalty of being considered as heathens and unbelievers, it must necessarily follow that she ever delivers the truth, or, in other words, that she is infallible, when she proclaims any dogma to be of faith, or when she condemns any error whatever. This is the reason why the illustrious Saint Augustine, who so sincerely believed in the infallibility of the Catholic church, has pronounced these solemn words:—"As Satan exercises his power out of the church, therefore Christ is always to be found in the church." "Extra ecclesiam diabolus est, sicut in ecclesiâ Christus," (Serm. 68, de Verbis Apost.) Remark, I pray you, the conduct which the Catholic church has always followed in regard to the first heretics, and you cannot fail but to perceive that she ever considered herself to be infallible in all her decisions. But before I proceed farther, I propose to myself to put to you, to speak in the language of philosophy, an argument ad hominem, as follows:—Protestants admit that the teaching of the Catholic church was divine, and that her doctrine was holy and pure for the first four centuries (the church of England acknowledges the first four general councils, every one of which was presided over by a pope or by his legates, yet still, she madly and inconsistently refuses to acknowledge the supremacy of the chair of Peter); therefore Protestants cannot but assent to her infallibility, as we shall very soon perceive, for she (the primitive church) cast off from her communion and excommunicated all those who revolved and opposed her divine teaching, in consequence of the gift of infallibility, which she so justly considered herself to be possessed of, as having received it from her God: and this, rev. sir, at the very period, when Protestants considered the Catholic church to be in all its purity. On the other hand you cannot help remarking all the variations which are to be found in the writings of your most eminent theologians, and in the thirty-nine articles of the church of England; in so much so, that I defy this Anglican church ever to establish, in an absolute and definitive manner, any one single point of doctrine.

When I peruse the writings of your divines I see plainly their anxiety to attack all these sects, which torment and desolate your Anglican church. I likewise constantly hear them bestowing on these sects the odious names of schismatics and heretics. But, in the name of heaven, rev. sir, what can be the meaning of this language? Besides, it envelops within itself a flagrant inconsistency. Is it not entirely destroyed by the principles which are found in the works of your most eminent theologians, namely,—that salvation can be obtained in every sect, provided only that we, with the greatest care and to the best of our judgment and capacity, interpret the sacred Scriptures? Consequently, I defy this Anglican church ever to presume to give one single dogmatical decision, such as would be binding as to conscience. What! your church to give such a decision? Oh no! it never could, it never would be mad enough to attempt doing such a thing, for one single dogmatical decision would be its ruin, and would cause its entire destruction. Can she, separated as she is from Catholic unity, can she, I ask, preserve her existence, except in persevering in a total silence? Since she does not blush to publish to the whole world, WITHOUT DOUBT, with a perfect HUMILITY, that she cannot even propose any one verity, because she herself is subject to error; and, this is the reason why she conjures all British subjects to place their sole belief in the bible, which alone, says this Anglican church, contains the pure word of God. You know better than I do, rev. sir, that the church of England pretends not to infallibility, and this is the reason why she permits, or is obliged to permit, to spring up and to exist in her very bosom so many sects, notwithstanding the absurdity of the principles which they teach.

I shall now proceed, and will demonstratively prove, that the church of the four first centuries ever and always attributed to itself the gift of infallibility, as well as does the church of this day and which will ever continue so to do. See this primitive church anathematizing all heresies which were springing up in her day, and casting off from her bosom all sectarian opinions. Acknowledge then, that our Catholic church is the true church of Christ, since she constantly and in every age has acted and spoken, when any revealed article of religion has been attacked, with an independent power, and with a sovereign and absolute authority. Is it not as clear as day, that the church of the four first centuries considered herself possessed of the gift of infallibility, when we find her thundering forth her anathemas against all those who dared to raise the standard of revolt against her supreme spiritual authority, which she holds not from man, but from God himself? Recollect, I entreat of you, how she sent forth her excommunication, &c. &c., against Valentinus, Carpocrates, Marcion; against Montanus, Priscilla, Maxilla, Paul of Samosata, and particularly against Arius, &c. &c. &c. If this church had had the same principles and had followed the same line of march which your present Anglican church does, would she ever have dared to have opened her mouth to condemn heretics? If she had the principles of the church of England, would she not have acted in the same manner as your Anglican church does in regard to all innovators? as follows, addressing the different Protestant sects. "Examine with care if our doctrine be conformable to holy scripture! For me, I could not presume to tax you with error, since I myself am not certain to have discovered the truth. Be, therefore, most careful to see clearly that our new doctrines be contained in the bible.".. Shame upon such language! Yet it exactly accords with the Anglican church, and with all the other Protestant sects which have sprung forth from her. Examine, I entreat you, and see if the primitive church acted in this manner in regard to innovators, and you will find, on the contrary, that the moment a new doctrine was announced she instantly, with an absolute and with a sovereign authority, fulminated her anathemas against them as long as they persevered in their culpable revolt; because in pronouncing their sentence, the pontiffs of the church, in their capacity as successors of the apostles, and following their glorious example, made use of the same expression which they did in the council of Jerusalem, viz;—"It appears good to the Holy Ghost and to us; Visume est Spiritui Sancto et nobis."

We here behold the church of Christ, such as was founded by the apostles, advancing full of force, full of majesty, and full of power, drawing into her bosom all those who hunger and thirst after virtue, overcoming all persecutions which have arisen against her, blunting the sword of the executioner, trampling to dust, according to the words of the Prophets, all those little Babylons—I mean those schismatics and heretics who have dared to raise a revolt against her infallible authority. And why, permit me to ask, in this Catholic and apostolic church do we behold concentrated so great an authority and such power to promulgate all the sacred Christian dogmas? May she not truly exclaim—I can do everything through Him who strengthens me; I can do everything in the name of God, who said to the first apostles; "Go, he who hears you, hears me; and he who despises you, despises me; go, and behold I am with you all days, even till the consummation of the world." Was it to answer no wise purpose that the church thundered forth her anathemas against innovators? I shall answer out of the mouth of Saint Cyprian, who declares that the proud and contemptuous, whom the church has cast off from her bosom, were truly struck to death by the spiritual sword. I ask you, rev. sir, if she strike innovators with death by the spiritual sword, must not bishops consequently, as the legitimate successors of the apostles, regard themselves as invested with an inalienable right to judge without appeal, and with the sovereign and infallible authority of God himself? Also the faith and the absolute authority of the bishops, in every point which regarded religion, was considered so incontestable, so respected in its practice, that the faithful would have no further communication with the innovators, who, though struck by the anathemas of the church, yet would not retract their errors. The faithful accordingly shaped their conduct in this respect, according to the words which we find in holy Scriptures. Christ himself says, "He that will not hear the church let him be unto thee as a heathen and a publican." The Catholic and the primitive church then are but one and the same church. The Catholic church, for nineteen centuries, continued to conduct her faithful flocks into the paths of truth and of virtue, and in order to preserve her dear children from troubles, &c., &c., and that peace and harmony may ever reign among them, she therefore is forced to excommunicate, to strike with the spiritual sword, all those who endeavour to corrupt her divine teaching by dangerous innovations, and leaves them prostrate under the force of her anathemas, so long as they will not abjure their errors, and so long as they refuse to return to the sacred sheepfold by the door of penance.

I remain, Rev. Sir,
Your obedient servant,
VERAX,

(Orthodox Journal.) A CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

FROM A CONVERT.

If there be but one door of safe entrance upon that path which leadeth to the heavenly Jerusalem, and if he who "climbeth up some other way is a thief and a robber," who is there but ought to be solicitous about the course he has chosen, to lead him to that better country. That the one straight gate must be entered, and that the Christian only will attain the goal, is admitted by most. But, alas! in this age of laxity, the anomaly is entertained that Christians may exist out of, and independently, of the church. Will the tree put forth its green leaves and blossoms when its roots are no longer imbedded in the soil which nourished it? or will the tenant of the waters live when deprived of the element adapted to its being? Neither can regenerated man ordinarily retain spiritual life out of the church. To him it is the "garden of the soul;" there he draws his first breath of renewed being—there he eats, and lives for ever—there he enjoys a communion, not confined to brief lives terminated by a grave, but where the spirit rises above the little spot of terrene existence, and is embraced by powers and sympathies genial with its own nature and ultimate destiny. The "communion of saints." What! is it no more than the imperfect and broken companionship, circumscribed by three score years and ten? Must maternal love, which watches, which weeps, which prays, which would die to save the object of its solicitude, be all obliterated in a moment? And must memory of the past become a blank when there is most power to serve? Will the innocent, the pure, the holy love of childhood, implanted in the soul of God, be forgotten as a worthless thing because the body ceases to be animate? Ah, no! for revelation and reason attest the contrary. But to return. The church is the channel through which blessings come to man; and, lest any might mistake in a matter of so great moment, its identity is always discoverable from its being minutely and graphically described in the scriptures of truth. And what she was at her establishment such she still remains as to faith, laws, and institutions; testifying by her very immutability to the guardianship of powers, supernal in their agency, and altogether independent of sublunary vicissitudes; and though at times she may have stood persecuted and bleeding in the wilderness, yet every wound has bespoke an immortality which could neither be quenched nor destroyed. Thus has she established her claims, and proved herself to be indeed that church against which Immanuel declared hell's gates should never prevail.

O sad infatuation! O baneful influence of corrupt education! O master-work of Satan! so blinding men as to lead them to suppose deformity attached to "whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report." For myself, I can only say that the very doctrines which prejudice and ignorance had led me to regard with the greatest aversion were those which were most easily proved from "the Bible alone." I have beheld these things with astonishment; and, after due deliberation and much prayer, I have disclaimed all fellowship with a "Reformation" (what a misnomer), conspicuous only for its attendant atrocities, and subsequently for having blunted every religious feeling, nay, impaired even common humanity, which now can gaze unmoved on scenes which would have drawn tears of blood from the "dark ages."

O Anglican establishment! we owe thee dear thanks. Thyself, the first revolter from the church, thou hast become the parent of those numerous sects which, though born of thee, disclaim thy maternity, and smile at thy pretensions, secure in the grant with which thou hast endowed them, viz. "the right of private interpretation." Thou hast given the ground, and the Socinian, the Muggletonian, the Quaker, the Mormonite, &c., have built upon its site.

As an individual, I can never be sufficiently thankful that I am at length free from the perpetual vacillations of so monstrous a system,—so injurious to society, so baneful to piety, and so favourable only to Infidelity!

CHANGES IN THE PERFORMANCE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND DIVINE SERVICE.

From the Morning Herald, August 3.

Yesterday morning a large public vestry-meeting of the parishioners of All Hallows Burking, was held in the parish church, for the purpose of considering the changes which had recently been introduced during the performance of Divine service, and to adopt such measures thereupon as might be deemed expedient.

Mr. Thomas Howell, the senior church-warden, was called to the chair, and read the requisition, which had been addressed to him by a large number of the resident parishioners, requesting that a meeting might be convened.

The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, remarked that, in consequence of the document which he had just read, he had considered it his duty to call a public meeting of the inhabitants. The subject which they were about to discuss was one of immense importance in the present distracted state of the Church, and he would beg leave to suggest, that whatever opinions might be advanced, either in favour of the recent changes or adversely, might be stated calmly and temperately. He hoped the discussion, rather than tending to create additional breaches, would have the effect of strengthening their Christian intercourse, would prove beneficial to the Church, acceptable to the great body of the parishioners, who felt deeply anxious on the momentous question which would be brought under review.

Mr. Sellson said that, as he was the first to suggest the propriety of calling the present meeting, the parishioners present might indulge him if for a few moments he trespassed on their patience. He was thoroughly convinced of the truth of the chairman's remark, that the parishioners were sincerely and heartily attached to the Established Church, and he regretted that any circumstances should occur to alienate their affections from that Church which he believed to be the purest and the best which Christendom had ever witnessed. In the remarks he was about to make he wished it to be plainly understood that he was actuated by no unkind feelings. During the whole of his life he had lived in the parish of All Hallows, and from his earliest years he had worshipped in the church where they were assembled. He had heard the great truths of the Gospel faithfully proclaimed from the pulpit, and it was to him, therefore, a matter of deep regret that, after so long a period, customs should have sprung up which, to say the least of them, were highly objectionable. His impression was, after some years' experience, that as good a sermon might be preached in the academical black gown as in the white surplice; and he did not know how it was that the old practice had been so unceremoniously invaded, except indeed it was for the purpose of introducing, step by step, the pernicious practices of Popery—(cheers). The charge delivered by the Bishop of London, in October last, and which had been so thoroughly discussed by a portion of the public press, was to him a source of much anxiety; and if he must honestly state his conviction, it was this, that he looked upon the address of the right rev. prelate with alarm. There could be little doubt that in great things the Bishop of London was a great man, but he (Mr. Sellson) complained of him that he interfered with matters of little importance and by that interference destroyed the peace of the Church. His lordship had stated that it was improper to begin Divine service with a psalm or hymn. The practice now sought to be abolished had been observed in his own parish church from his earliest years, and he regretted that it should be discontinued. To prove the soundness of his position the bishop had referred them to three or four centuries back, but he (Mr. Sellson) had no fear in stating that he believed such a proceeding to be highly objectionable, because there was no necessity to adopt the principles or practices of an age disfigured by some of the worst features of the papal system—(hear, hear.) If we went back so far, we must go back in human knowledge also, and he believed there were few amongst them who would like to carry out their principles to such an extent as that. He intended to submit for the consideration of the meeting a series of resolutions, which he hoped would be adopted. He did not intend to suggest the presentation of a memorial to the bishop, because he was fully aware that it would be treated with contempt, as in the case of the memorial from Ware, and that they would not receive an answer which would be at all satisfactory to themselves. He would rather appeal to the vicar on the subject, and he felt sure that the reverend gentleman on becoming acquainted with the wishes of his parishioners, would resume the customs the abandonment of which had driven many of the best families of the parish from the church where they had formerly assembled. Mr. Sellson proceeded to make some strictures on the Bishop of London's recent charge, and concluded by moving the following resolutions:—

“That the inhabitants present at this public vestry-meeting regret that alterations have lately been made in the forms observed at Divine service in their parish church.

“That they are desirous of continuing to worship ALMIGHTY GOD in the way their fathers and themselves have done from time immemorial.

“That without giving any opinion on the necessity or propriety of the changes referred to, they are convinced the same have alarmed the conscientious feelings of many inhabitants, and, if persevered in, will certainly tend to diminish rather than increase the attendance at church, if not also to interrupt the unanimity which has happily so long prevailed in the parish.

“That knowing the anxiety of our highly respected vicar that his church should be well attended, and the parishioners continue to live in harmony with each other, they request the church-wardens will be pleased to communicate to the Rev. Samuel Johnes Knight, M. A., a copy of these resolutions, and recommend the subject to his early and serious consideration.”

Mr. TALBOT seconded the adoption of the resolutions.

A PARISHIONER thought the resolutions were feeble and inadequate for the purposes they were intended to serve. He hoped something might be added to them. The alterations in the performance of Divine service had disgusted the parishioners, and he was certain that if they were persisted in the church would soon be entirely empty on Sundays. In the church of the neighbouring parish of St. Dunstan's in the East, which was not under the control of the Bishop of London, but one of the Archbishop of Canterbury's peculiars, no alterations whatever had been made, and the consequence had been that the congregation had steadily increased, while that of All Hallows had rapidly diminished. That some measure to arrest the evil should be taken was agreed upon on all hands, and he trusted the meeting would not separate until they had taken some more decided course than that which had been suggested.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he had no hope from the channel they were now appealing to. The vicar was determined strictly to follow up the recommendations contained in the Bishop of London's last charge to his clergy.

Mr. HANSON remarked that although he knew, from the strong feeling which had been manifested, that in what he was about to state he should run counter to the general feeling, yet he was prepared boldly to dissent from the propositions which had been submitted by the gentleman who first addressed the meeting. No man in that assembly had a more thorough detestation of Popery than himself, and no one would more heartily resist its progress. Since the first number of the “Tracts for the Times” made its appearance he had anxiously watched the development of the system those papers professed to defend, and it was his firm conviction that they were fast verging to Popery. As he was opposed to Popery, so therefore was he opposed to Tractarianism. That the recommendations of the Bishop of London had anything to do either with Puseyism or Popery, he (Mr. Hanson) denied, and he thought it was a monstrous absurdity to get up such an agitation on matters so utterly unimportant. By conforming to the bishop's wishes in this particular they strengthened their own hands, and would be able more successfully to resist aggressions if such a painful necessity should occur. The revival of the offertory, which the bishop had suggested, had been violently opposed, but he (Mr. Hanson) did not see how any danger could be apprehended from it. The practice was condemned as being a novelty; but that was not so, and even if it were true that would not be a sound or valid objection. The Church of England had marvellously improved during the last 50 years, circumstances mainly attributable to the excellent changes which had been introduced. Again, the introduction of the prayer for the Church militant was said to be a new thing, but that was a palpable and gross error. These were minor points; and whether they were settled one way or the other, would never affect Tractarianism. If they intended to oppose that system they must do it on sound principles, and not by the perpetual recurrence to the little points which had been the subject of such unfruitful agitation.

Mr. GARRETT denied that the recent alterations in the Church service were innovations. They were all provided for in the rubric or canons of the Church. Upwards of 20 years ago he regularly attended St. Botolph's Church, Bishopsgate, and there the forms now condemned were observed first, by Dr. Blomfield, as rector of the parish, then as Bishop of London, and subsequently by the Rev. Dr. Grey, afterwards Bishop of Hereford. Nothing grieved him more than when, on leaving that church to take up his residence in the country, he found that in the church he afterwards attended these observances were disregarded. It was not his intention to offer any opposition to the resolutions proposed because he did not wish to disturb the peace of the parish on matters of so much importance.

Mr SELLSON briefly replied, and

The CHAIRMAN took the sense of the meeting on the resolutions, when all held up their hands in favour, with the exception of Mr. Hanson, who protested against them.

A vote of thanks having been proposed to Mr. Howell, the chairman, that gentleman stated that in the position in which he had been placed he could not offer any remarks on the subject which had engaged their consideration, and which, he was glad to say, had been temperately discussed. If, however, he had been otherwise situated, he should have expressed his conviction that not the slightest danger was to be apprehended from the recent change, but on the contrary, that they were likely to be of essential service to the Church. He would not fail to place the resolutions which had been adopted in the hands of the vicar, and he would communicate the result to the vestry at the earliest opportunity.

The meeting then broke up.—Morning Herald, August 3.

Barclay, the famous apologist and theologian of Quakerism, speaking of the Scriptures, and their use and their interpretation, thus defines his rule: "Nevertheless, because they are only a declaration of the fountain, and not the fountain itself, therefore they are not to be esteemed the principle ground of all truth and knowledge, nor yet the adequate primary rule of faith and manners. Nevertheless, as that which giveth a true and faithful testimony of the first foundation, they are and may be esteemed a secondary rule, subordinate to the spirit from which they have all their excellency and certainty; for as by the inward testimony of the spirit we do alone truly know them, so they testify that the spirit is that guide by which the saints are led into all truth. Therefore, according to the Scriptures, the spirit is the first and principal leader." "Moreover, these divine inward revelations, which we make absolutely necessary for the building up of true faith neither do nor can ever contradict the outward testimony of the Scriptures, or right and sound reason. Yet from hence it will not follow, that these divine revelations are to be subjected to the examination, either of the outward testimony of the Scriptures, or of the natural reason of man, as to a more noble or certain rule or touchstone: for this divine revelation and inward illumination is that which is evident and clear of itself; forcing, by its evidence and clearness, the well disposed understanding to assent, irresistibly moving the same thereunto; even as the common principles of natural truths move and incline the mind to a natural assent." "Can the reader fail to be struck with the coincidence between the rule of Bishop Bloomfield and that of the anti-episcopalian, unitarian Barclay? And yet this latter discovers—not one of Bishop Bloomfield's "secret treasures," but the monstrous opinion laid down in his eleventh proposition, that to worship the Almighty in any prescribed form, as in a liturgy, is but abominable idolatry in the sight of God!

Was it not the same with the Puritans? The symbol of faith, and the bond of union with the Brownist and Barrowist Puritans was,—“I declare that I will walk with you as long as you walk in the way of the Lord, and as far as the word of God will warrant it to be requisite.” Is not then the Bishop of London a Barrowist? and yet Barrow was hanged for his opinions in 1592; while two of his predecessors in these principles were put to death, in 1533, for publishing libels against the English liturgy,—the liturgy now in use by the Bishop of London! And are there not millions in this very island, in this very day, who are firmly persuaded that Barrow was gifted with as plain and rightly-formed an understanding as Bishop Bloomfield? and therefore do they reject episcopacy, deny the validity of the sacraments when administered by an Anglican minister, disallow the virtue of ordinations, &c., and roundly assert, that “the laws of the kingdom, and the authority of the sovereign, have introduced many innovations into the Church, and added to the religion established by Christ several customs which cannot be maintained with any colour of justice; and that the religious worship (of the Church of England) was disfigured by palpable and shameful errors.”

These views it is, too, which after knocking under to the civil power for some centuries, and forming a solemn compact with it for their mutual advantage and protection, have now induced the Kirk of Scotland to reassert her former principles in all their integrity, and to insist upon her emancipation from the thralldom of the state. And what right has the Bishop of London to gainsay them, or to presume that his understanding is more rightly informed than was Barrow's, Fox's or Penn's, as long as he adheres to the rule by which they were, one and all, governed? For it is but a shallow artifice, nay, the height of absurdity, to give us a rule, and then immediately to qualify it by injunctions which utterly frustrate its operation,—for if we are to believe the doctrines of the Church of England, and to subscribe to her articles, and yet dive into the mine of Scripture for them, where the Bishop himself tells us they are not to be found, is not the rule entirely overlaid and abrogated?

Let us yet consider this matter a little further. Burnet, speaking of the Anabaptists, says,—“Upon Luther's first preaching in Germany, there arose many, who, building on some of his principles, carried things much further than he did. The chief foundation he laid down was, that the Scripture was to be the only rule of Christians. Upon this many argued, that the mysteries of the Trinity, and Christ's incarnation and sufferings, of the fall of man, and the aids of grace, were indeed philosophical subtleties, and only pretended to be deduced from Scripture, as almost all opinions of religion were; and, therefore they rejected them. Among these, the baptism of infants was one,” &c. (Hist. of Reform. A. 1549) But that such principles, and such errors, might not run riot in England, as they were doing in Germany, Cranmer, and Ridley, the bishop of London of that day, forced the young king Edward, sorely indeed against his will, to sign the death warrant of Joan of Kent for holding the doctrines which she, in conformity with these new opinions, pretended to deduce from Scripture, while bishop Scory “preached at her burning!” And yet could bishop Bloomfield, with any consistency, even have objected to her that she was wrong? for she only interpreted Scripture with a plain, and as she thought, and as thousands think still, with a rightly-informed understanding. Henry's six articles too, which were every one of them sound Catholic doctrine, and to which Cranmer was a reluctantly assenting party, with seventeen other bishops, and which, "after much consultation and long debating were agreed to," were also declared to be the result of this same principle of "reforming all by the rules of Scripture, and that nothing was to be maintained that did not rest on that authority." (Burnet.) Though Cranmer, that pattern of piety and pink of orthodoxy, as he seems to be esteemed by bishop Bloomfield, was grievously suspected at that very time of not believing them, and was evidently drawing off from them only a few years afterwards, when, in 1549, his new liturgy was introduced, with this recommendation, that it had been "concluded on with one uniform agreement, by the archbishop of Canterbury, and other learned and discreet bishops and divines, by the aid of the Holy Ghost," though four of the said bishops protested against it! That which was impiously said to have been inspired by the Holy Ghost in 1549, was new-modelled and arranged by the very same theologians in 1552, upon entirely new views, though upon the very same principles, and if we are to believe them, under the very same guidance; but not even then being quite right, it received its last touch with several amendments, and its last change by several omissions, at the hands of new men, acting under new yet equally sacred illuminations,—though still under the same old principle,—at the final settlement of the 39 articles in 1562!

Cromwell had told the convocation which passed the six articles, amongst other things, "that it was absurd, since the Scripture was acknowledged to contain the laws of religion, that recourse should rather be had to glosses, or the decrees of popes, than to these;" while "Cranmer, in a long and learned speech, showed how useless these niceties of the schools were, and of how little authority they ought to be; and discoursed largely on the authority of the Scriptures,.... of the uncertainty of tradition," &c.; and when published the advocates of the reformation "rejoiced to see the Scriptures, and the ancient creeds, made the standards of the faith, without mentioning tradition or the decrees of the Church. Then the foundation of Christian faith was truly stated, and the terms of the covenant between God and man in Christ were rightly opened," &c. * Thus early did the new rule begin to show itself, when once the ancient usage was broken in upon; though they who used it did not yet rightly understand its application: this the more thorough-going spirits among them fully felt; but it was so strange to most men, so utterly at variance with long-cherished prepossessions, so different to what they had been heretofore authoritatively taught, that it was no wonder if it required a long and tedious process of development before it came to maturity. In its former comparatively partial and insignificant trials, it had already puzzled all by whom it had been adopted,—more especially when it was attempted to regulate it by another rule which was to curb and clog it, and in fact to supersede it—a rule which serving, in one shape or other, for every sect, however differently they use it, will still continue to puzzle them to the end of time, as bishop Bloomfield might indeed have discovered before he again recommended it for adoption.

Burnet, Ann. 1536.

Having advanced thus far in our strictures, we were in hopes that our labours had been nearly concluded, when, alas! to our dismay and disappointment, in page 49 we stumble upon another astounding assertion, that "honours are paid in the Church of Rome to DEIFIED SINNERS"!—and again we are summoned forth to our defence. DEIFIED SINNERS!!! There is at least no phraseology here—no courtly insinuation of some deep, mysterious, but unintentional error—no mincing of the matter, but an out-and-out accusation, "an uncompromising assertion" of downright idolatry—"a practice," says he, "which began in poetry, and ended in idolatry." As we shall have occasion to show again, the right reverend prelate observes no measure in his wrath—he dwells in "the whirlwind of passion," not in the temperature of reason. Such ebullitions "may make the unskilful laugh," but they will also make "the judicious grieve;" the bigot, however, will chuckle in his ignorance and be confirmed in his error. We have already touched upon the case—we now only meet it with a flat denial, declare it to be a detestable calumny, and demand proof to the contrary.

"The unspeakable abomination" of the Church of Rome, "that system of corruption and tyranny, which is still maintained by Rome in theory, and as far as circumstances will permit, in practice also,"—"her deadly errors,"—"GUILTY OF SCHISM, if not of apostasy," having "forsaken the true faith, and defiled herself with superstition and idolatry,"—such is the prologue to the denouncement of the piece, so charitably imagined, and so happily expressed, in the following terse and pithy sentence:

"And let us speak all the more plainly, seeing that she again employs, as her chosen defenders and emissaries, a society of men, bound together by a vow to uphold by all methods, and at all hazards, not Christianity, but Popery; and who, in accordance with that vow, have framed and carried out a system, so hideous in its principles, so mischievous in its effects, that it well deserves to be described as having embodied the very 'mystery of iniquity.'"

"The Church of Rome has added to and debased the apostolical 'form of sound words;' has superseded the apostolical succession; has mutilated and corrupted the apostolical communion..... Its errors are not less opposed to Gospel truth and holiness now, than they were at the time of the Reformation. The doctrines and practices which rendered necessary our separation from that Church, are still retained by her, unchanged, unmitigated, unqualified; nor are the differences between us in essential matter, less at the present moment, than they were in the times of Cranmer or of Jewel, of Taylor or of Bull."—Charge, pp. 59, 60.

Verily we should be "duller than the fat weed that rots itself in ease on Lethe's wharf, did we not stir at this."

Yet we know not whether we are more moved by wonder than by indignation,—wonder, that in the nineteenth century any man should be found, with pretensions to learning, with character and reputation to maintain, and with a cause to advocate, and yet so deluded, so insensible to all that was passing around him, so reckless of consequences, as to fall back upon all the exploded calumnies and fabrications of a period, when the frenzy of the fanatic, the fears of the timid, and the interest of the selfish, combined to misrepresent and falsify all that was considered opposed to them on the one hand, or that it was determined to destroy on the other. Why! there is the testimony of the whole world against him, of all the saints and sages, the heroes and the martyrs of Christianity, the concurrent voice of ages, the united evidence of the great company of the faithful from one generation to another, now and at all times, to hurl back with indignant defiance the atrocious crimes of which we are accused. We give him the feelings and convictions, and solemn assertions of individuals; we give him the deliberative and authoritative decisions of the Church, as our defence,—but no, says he, you are all hypocrites and prevaricators,—the doctrines which you profess have a tendency to superstition and idolatry; I insist upon it, that you are guilty of both, because it suits me to assert it; it is a doctrine necessary for these times because it is the best argument I can use to deter my wavering subjects from deserting their ranks and going over to you*. CATHOLIC MISSIONARY COLLEGE OF ALL-HALLOWES, DUBLIN.—This institution continues to receive active support. The following is a copy of the original letter of the Bishop of Agra to the Secretary:—"Agra, 22d April, 1843.—Rev. Sir—It has been very gratifying for me to receive your very kind letter of the 10th Dec. last, and I rejoice, indeed, hearing that at last a seminary for the foreign missions has been established in Ireland. I approve entirely of the plan of education to be given to the young men, which plan cannot fail to produce the most satisfactory results. I will be very happy to pay in advance 20l per annum, for the support of two young men for this mission. You will please, in consequence, to enter into an arrangement with the Rev. Makime Roosat, Vicaire Général du Diocèse de Gap (France), to whom I have already written on the subject. I have no particular advice to give you with regard to the training up of the young men, if it is not that I wish that besides science, they would acquire a spirit of obedience, zeal, and disinterestedness. I trust that next year, if possible, I will go to Europe, and then we shall settle this matter in a proper manner. Meanwhile, I beg to present my respects to you and to all the professors of the seminary, and to subscribe myself sincerely, Rev. Sir, your most humble and obedient servant.

INCREASE OF "POPERY" IN GENEVA.—The progress which "Popery" has made at Geneva in the last thirty years has been great and rapid. A recent number of "L'Esperance" gives some statistical details, which shew this in a very striking light. In 1814 there were in the city of Geneva only 800 Roman Catholics; now they amount to 7,000. At this day (1842) the numbers of the two parties stand thus: 36,000 Protestants, and 24,000 Roman Catholics; so that, without any extraordinary additions* being made to the numbers of the latter, according to the regular rate of increase, at no very distant period, unless something unforeseen prevent it both city and canton must fall into the hands of the Papists. "Thus, in less than forty years," says "L'Esperance," "will Geneva, pre-eminently the Protestant canton—Geneva, the bulwark of the reformation—Geneva, the city of Calvin, become a soppendicle to the see of Rome."—Tablet.

TRACTARIAN CEREMONIES.—We have just received one or two communications upon this subject, which is now exciting very great attention in the Church. In another part of our paper we give extracts from an article in the Quarterly Review, which also treats upon it. We have, moreover, had described to us by an eye-witness the scene which occurred in one of the churches of the metropolis, on Sunday last, during the performance of the morning service. The altar is adorned with a large wooden crucifix in the centre, and two huge wax tapers in massive silver candlesticks, and covered with little golden chalices with opercula, patens in gold and silver, traverses for waters, bows for offerings, corporal cloths, and other gew-gaws. The whole of the internal arrangements of the church are also made to conform as closely as possible to those of a Romish mass-house; and the many deviations in the reading of the services from the established usages of the Church of England, were all in the direction of the Pontifical and Missal. Many additions to the rubric of the Prayer Book were described to us. We notice one or two of the most remarkable of them. The two clergymen who officiated were attended throughout the entire service by a boy in a surplice. This, we need scarcely remark, is borrowed altogether from the Roman Catholic ceremonial: he is called in their service books the Acolyth or Altar-boy. On ascending the pulpit stairs, the incumbent of the church was observed to kneel on two or three successive steps in the course of his ascent, remaining for a few moments in silent prayer on each of them. He was doubtless reciting that portion of the mass service which is called the Graduale. At the conclusion of the sermon, and during the reading of the sentences, four velvet bags were taken from a silver salver, which stood upon the altar, and carried round the church by as many lay devotees to collect the offerings. The bag (sacculus) is used for this purpose in the Romish ritual, and nowhere else. On presenting the offerings, the laymen made a profound reverence to the curate, who stood within the altar rail, holding the salver to receive the bags. Having done this, they made a genuflection towards the altar with the arms folded over the chest, uttering certain words (no doubt, mea culpa, mea culpa) in a low tone, and at the same time smiting the chest with the right hand, the well-known Romish practice which the martyr-fathers of our Church of England reprehended so severely 300 years ago, under the homely description of "kneeling and knocking."—Manchester Herald, June 17.

* To show how early this doctrine of tendencies was enlisted into controversy, and employed to substantiate this same accusation of idolatry, we will cite the charge of the Unitarian Praxeas, in the second century, who declaimed against the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, because, as he said, it would lead to idolatry. The doctrine of tendencies is a mere fanciful theory, and may be employed with a plausibility of reasoning against every dogma of Christianity; it comes from this, that people mistake Christianity for a system of opinions, instead of a series of facts. The question should ever be, has the doctrine been revealed by God, and promulgated by his Church? If that be proved, we must receive it without further reasoning or enquiry.

ROME AS IT REALLY IS.

FROM THE GERMAN OF J. GORRES.

All pilgrims arriving in Rome are lodged and fed for several days in a house, destined for that purpose. In this house you would admire not only the wonderful cleanliness but the splendid liberality also of this vast establishment. Vast indeed I must call it, for, before the French invasion, more than twenty thousand beds were here prepared for the reception of the pilgrims. Although during the last jubilee their number was not so great as on former occasions, yet it has always been considerable; and during the last days of the year above ten thousand of both sexes were received and entertained. The guests are received in the most Christian and charitable manner—the men in one part, and the women in another. After the recitation of a short prayer they are conducted into the apartment destined for the washing of their feet. In this act of Christian love, not only ecclesiastics of the highest ranks, Cardinals, Patriarchs, Archbishops and Bishops, but also temporal Princes, among whom this year appeared the reigning Duke of Lucca, of the royal house of Spain, joyfully emulate each other. Here, as in the room where the dinner is served, they appear in the dress belonging to the confraternity, with whom they promiscuously join in the service of the table. The women are treated in the same charitable manner, by ladies of the most exalted rank; among them, this year, the Queen of Sardinia was distinguished. Do not imagine that this ceremony is one of mere pomp and vanity. The feet of those who come here, are really the feet of pilgrims, some of whom have journeyed many hundred miles. Here one evening the Pope unexpectedly arrived, and he, whose sacred dignity is honored by the lovers of Christ's Kingdom upon earth by the kissing of his feet, shewed to the world, how God is to be honored in the persons of the poor; for he humbly washed the feet of two pilgrims, dried them and kissed them. At table he served the pilgrims, as if he had been the meanest of the brotherhood destined for that purpose. You cannot easily imagine the magnificent sight which these tables present, stretching along each side of this immense hall; the looks of the pilgrims are lighted up with contentment and joy, and although they are here served by persons of the highest rank, their conversation is not at all restrained. All nations, all tongues and conditions are here mingled together, and all united by one common bond of happiness.

I will relate to you another act of his Holiness no less conducive to the good of his fellow-men than the preceding. This was a nightly visit which he paid to the hospital of the Holy Ghost, a vast establishment always containing a great number of sick, both of the city and the country. Some previous suspicion of negligence in the care of the sick suggested the idea of this visit. At an hour and a half after midnight, he called his guard, ordered a sedan to be brought, and it was not until he had arrived in the streets that he gave his orders, a Santo Spirito. In this manner, not discovered by the sounds of a carriage and accompanied only by two of his Swiss, he arrived at the hospital. Think of the surprise which his coming brought with it. He forbade any of the superiors, who were sleeping, to be awakened, nor would he suffer any one to called to accompany him. Then did our magnanimous Pope, himself frequently ill, always sickly, and learning from his own sufferings to pity those of others, proceed from bed to bed of the sick inmates of the hospital, even of those afflicted with the most loathsome diseases; he examined all the beds, food, and drink, tasting of all; to each of the infirm he imparted words of friendship and consolation. With one who was near death, he remained for some time, praying for him and with him, spoke to him words of holy consideration, blessed him, and left him happy and rejoiced. It was rumored on the following day that he was not greatly pleased with the appearance of the hospital; and the fruit of his visit appears in an entirely new appointment of attendants, a fact which promises still new improvements. I mentioned in another part of my letter that Leo was an excellent prince, and here is a point upon which the wisdom of a rule and the benevolence of a man may be beheld united. But he merits no less glory in his transactions of politics and finances.

It is easy to imagine into what difficulties the See of Rome was thrown during the troubles that of late distracted Europe. I have not, however been so far initiated into the secrets of the government as to give you a detailed account of its present position; nor, had I been, would this be the proper place for such a narration. Thus much I can say, that his present Holiness employs all his wisdom and moderation to turn passing events to the greatest advantage, and to apply remedies for the evils which have been inflicted upon his states. In his financial affairs he performs wonders: for he has not only discharged the debts entailed upon him by the splendid, but, for the poor Romans, impoverishing schemes of Consulvi, and regained his church lands so generously bestowed by the allies upon prince Eugene; he has, also, by free concessions remitted a fourth part of the ordinary taxes. Complaints are indeed raised against this system of economy by interested hirelings. But any one who considers the unsparing retrenchment, which he practices in his own household, ought not to repine, if they experience some slight inconvenience. His admirable disinterestedness appears in this, that though descended from a noble, but now not affluent family, like his predecessor, Pius VII., he, with Spartan-like firmness, resists all worldly temptations in his relations' regard. Not only has he neglected to confer riches or honorable distinctions upon any of them—he has not permitted them to come near the city. Thus not only every immediate but every attempt to establish the reign of nepotism has been frustrated. Scrupulously economical in his domestic establishments, he is far from being so when the honor of God calls for interference. Fifty thousand crowns are to be drawn yearly by his command from the public treasury, for the rebuilding of the Basilica of St. Paul. We must praise also that good taste which led him to ordain that this temple should not be modernized, but that it should be rebuilt according to the plan of the original founder, without paying regard to more recent variations. He has lately made a large addition to the funds of the Propaganda; and I hope as much from him in favor of the German College, to gain admission into which twelve new candidates a few days since presented themselves. But here I must conclude my account of the Pope, or my epistle will begin to assume the bulk of a volume, a length to which I ought not to be led by these wandering digressions. Let me then remind you that we have strayed from our consideration of the Roman establishments dedicated to instruction. We will return to this pleasing task.

I shall now direct your attention to that institute, which has for its end the preparation of children for the first communion. An idea of these beautiful exercises will, I am sure, delight you. It is a general custom that the children, after they have been fully instructed and prepared for the reception of the Holy Sacrament, should retire from the society of their parents and relations, to spend ten days in the retirement of a cloister. Here, forgetting the whole world, they enter into the proper dispositions to meet the Creator and Lord of the world. Their hours of sleep and rising, of occupation and rest, of prayer and recreation, are all regulated: their time is engaged by instructions, exhortations, meditations, and prayer, succeeding each other in such pleasing variety, that the heart is influenced with holy love and desire, and the soul receives that grace which sanctifies a whole life. This short abode in this sacred retreat, produces the most lively impression upon the tender souls of these Christian youths. Here is often sown the seed of that desire, which afterwards ripens into maturity, of dedicating themselves to a life wholly consecrated to the service of God. To many, if not all, these days are a point towards which, amid the distractions and giddiness of a worldly life, they can look back with delight, as to a monument of truth and alliance with their Redeemer, as to a tower in the holy city of God—of God who rejoiceth our youth; ("ad Deum qui lætificat juventutem meam.") At the termination of the exercises, the act of Communion takes place in public. But, as no particular day is appointed for this purpose, (for it occurs as often as ten or twelve youths resort to the cloister,) there are few persons present besides the friends of the young communicants; a circumstance which gives more solemnity and feeling to the ceremony. I wish you were able to witness, were it but for once, this enchanting sight; particularly on an occasion when young females are, for the first time, admitted to the holy altar. Here, as elsewhere, the expressions of female piety are more tender and pathetic. But, on these occasions, the interest of the scene is heightened by the elegance of their external appearance. They appear in dresses, the form of which they have received from tradition, similar to those anciently worn by the vestal virgins. A white garment, rich in folds, with hanging sleeves, a veil of pale violet flowing from the head to the ground, a coronet of gold upon the head, all simple, chaste, and beautiful, form their attire. If you had ever seen any of the paintings of the sainted Dominican, the lovely, the heavenly Fiesoli, you would perhaps have thought, with Michael Angelo, "that Fiesoli must have been in heaven, to have caught his idea of beauty." An impression, similar to that produced by the celestial figures of Fiesoli, is worked upon our souls by one of these communions. Enraptured, like angels, these tender spouses of Christ kneel around the altar of their heavenly bridegroom, without a look, without a motion that seems of this earth: the tears that through their eyes gush from their hearts, fall to the ground unnoticed and undried; so sweetly, and so fixedly is their attention directed to their holy spouse. A low mass is celebrated; but after the Gospel the priest turns to them and addresses himself to their devotion: he does the same also before and after the communion. They then return to the cloister, where they remain eight days, to return thanks to God for the great favour they have received from him, and to allow the grace which has been implanted in their souls, to take firm root there. Is not this enchanting? Could the Church evince more maternal affection towards her well-beloved children? Are here not laid the foundations of firm piety and of a truly Christian life? But to ensure perseverance thus happily commenced, the Roman Church has many resources. To this end is directed the institution of those many confraternities, the members of which, on certain festivals, all communicate in company: a practice observed also by the children of each parish, to whom this general communion is a worthy renewal of the first approach to the holy altar. In the centre of a circular elevation, that is raised at a distance from the communion rail, and which, like the whole church, is adorned with rich tapestry, the holy sacrifice is offered. In a small pulpit, at the side of the altar, there kneels a priest praying aloud, and expressing in the most fervent terms those sentiments of desire and humility which should occupy the mind of the devout communicant. The intervals between these prayers are occupied by simple but moving chants in the Italian tongue. You cannot imagine what an overpowering effect is produced upon the minds of all present: all distraction is banished from their imaginations, and every soul seems to pray by the mouth of the preacher, for every heart is melted into one general act of devotion. Another means for preserving grace thus received, or of renewing the cooled fervor of a Christian life, is presented to the Romans of all ages and conditions by the spiritual exercises so frequent in this city. How praiseworthy is this institute, you will judge, when I tell you, that here, for once in the year at least, the poorest mendicant and laborer can retire to forget the world, its miseries, and its vices, and to employ himself exclusively in the affairs of eternity. This Retiro, as it is called, always takes place in some monastery, and there exist confraternities who direct in turns the performance of the exercises. During the time of the exercises, the poor are entertained free of expense,—the men in cloisters of monks, the women among nuns. While in the abodes of piety, they are regulated by rules of a religious life; and during these few days the most important considerations are presented to their meditation. They are taught first to ponder well upon the end of their creation, and when they have seen many widely wander from that end, when they have beheld displayed before them the wide and awful reign of corruption and sin, they are consoled and encouraged by meditations upon the mercy and tender love of their Heavenly Father, so beautifully painted in the parable of the lost son. Considerations upon the eternal joys of heaven close the holy exercises. The pleasing succession of the various acts of piety renders these days of salvation most agreeable. Even hours of recreation are not forgotten, and so pleasingly does the time flow on under the directions for a spiritual retreat drawn up by the holy St. Ignatius, that, at the end of the week, all wonder how the time can have passed away, and depart with regret from a place where they have felt so great happiness. You will, I think, find a powerful evidence in favour of Roman piety in the fact, that, although most of the inhabitants consider the Carnival as the time of the greatest amusement, and against which on account of its harmless nature, no objection can be raised, yet there are many who select this time of merriment and sport for the performance of the spiritual exercises. I myself spoke two days ago with a young friend, who with seventy others, from 16 to 24 years of age, spent the last Carnival in this laudable manner*. The same is observed by the clergy of the city; and all confessors, without exception, with many others of all ranks, resort once in the year to the house of missions on Monte Citerio. The same exercises are also performed in many private Oratories, I mean small churches belonging to various confraternities, where the people are instructed in the same manner as in the Retiri, with this modification that here the instructions consist of a series of sermons delivered to the men and women separately; that so, those whose domestic affairs will not permit them to abandon their families, may not be wholly deprived of the benefit of these devotions. All these things considered together evince a truly Christian, and, on the part of the church, a truly maternal anxiety for the salvation of men; but think not that I have related all that might be told. The devotion towards the Holy Sacrament of the altar, which besides the forty-hour, and the change of churches, never ceasing adoration is continually practiced in the church of a nunnery, whose inmates are dedicated to this exercise, and which is heightened by the sound of sweet song and holy prayer, the many evening oratories, the numerous novenas, to which the faithful are invited by the almost daily Invito Sacro placed upon the doors of different churches; the frequent and beautifully conducted devotion of the Via Crucis performed in many churches and in the Colosseum, that field of glory of so many martyrs: the functions of the Papal Chapel, the music of which, unique and sovereignly grand, is celebrated through the whole world—all these would swell my description to too large a bulk. Many, too, are the institutions of piety of which I have perhaps never heard the name. I might enlarge in the praise of the service as performed every Sunday in each parish church and of the simple, and therefore edifying, manner in which the people listen to the explication given by the priest of each Sunday's gospel. But let what I have written suffice, for I wish not to fatigue your patience with long drawn descriptions. Happy shall I be, if my sketch, though faint and rude, has given you a more favourable idea of Rome, than those representations so often presented by prejudiced or ignorant authors.

* On the last day of this year's Carnival, I met a young priest, lately one of my school companions; who informed me that he had been from his home since the Carnival, assisting seventy young men in their spiri-

You must not imagine that, amidst this extreme care for their eternal interests, the civil and temporal happiness of the people is neglected. For, considered only with regard to this world, the Romans are certainly the most happy people that I have anywhere found, and, in my judgement, can anywhere be found. If, on the one side, the opportunities of embracing the religious state be many and great, the means of entering a married life are not less promoted and protected. Nine hundred young women are yearly endowed either by the government or by pious institutions. I wish it were possible for you to behold the processions of these happy children, the most considerable of which is formed at the Dominican convent di Santa Maria sopra Minerva, and proceeding from a house at a small distance traverses a great portion of the city. Like those whom I before mentioned, these also appear in the dress of the Vestal Virgins: those who instead of embracing the married state, employ their power to gain admittance into a convent; wear crowns upon their heads: and in a procession of three or four hundred, I have generally enumerated about forty thus distinguished. Nothing can be imagined more impressive than one of these processions. If provision be thus made for a happy and virtuous entrance into the matrimonial state, the education of children is not less provided for. Among a multitude of colleges, seminaries and congregations dedicated to the instruction of both sexes, there are some that merit particular mention, the one called San Michele possessing an income of 300,000 florins, the other at the Termini, with an income of more than 200 000 florins of our money. In the latter all, in the former as many as cannot pay a pension, are educated free of expense. They are taught any mechanic trade which they may choose, or any one of the fine arts to which their genius seem to incline. The morality, religion and learning of the public schools are worthy of every tribute of praise, and more so since the Jesuits have been restored to their college. The University, called the Sapienza, is more frequented by students of medicine and law, than by theologians,—a circumstance that appears surprising, but which is explained by the number of theological schools in cloisters, in seminaries, and particularly in the Collegio Romano. The talent and learning displayed by the young students in their public disputations are wonderful. The disputations which we witness at home can give you no idea of those in Rome. The theological discussions take place in the public church of the college; and he that is hardy enough to mount the defendant's pulpit must be no novice in his profession. For, to answer with readiness to any opponent, upon any proposition out of four hundred (the number generally chosen) for a whole day, and in presence of the most respectable and most learned men of Rome, is a combat into which few of the heroes of our learned schools would venture. The difficulty is increased, when we consider that these disputés are carried on, not in simple ratiocination, but in the scholastic form, and require a profound knowledge not only of the Scriptures, but also of the Fathers, of Councils of Papal decretals, and of Ecclesiastical History. Ridiculous and mean must now appear the impudence and haughtiness of many foreigners, and alas! of too many of our countrymen, who accuse the Roman clergy and other learned men of ignorance of the Latin language and of inability of speaking it: for the elegance and ease with which you hear the Latin tongue spoken on these occasions merit a great part of the praise due to these exhibitions.

A young man who had won for himself a high reputation as a philological scholar in one of our German Universities, and upon that account had, upon his return to his native city, been appointed to a professor's chair, afterwards in Rome presented himself for trial at one of these disputations. The discussion took place in a room of the college, in presence of a very few opponents and only upon three propositions; yet so sorry a figure did this young man make, that truly it required all the kind-heartedness and urbanity of the Romans to grant him the indulgence he received. I was myself present at this scene, and, if I were mortified at his disgrace, I was surprised and consoled by the kindness and modesty of the students who were witness of his failure. How different would an Italian have found himself in a similar situation in one of our schools: here all was serious and composed, in the midst of his stammerings, and I could perceive that those present compassioned his feeling. When at length, he returned somewhat like an answer to the objections of two of his adversaries, and was buoyed up by their encouragements, all present made signs of congratulation and openly shewed their pleasure. Now what will, you say, when you hear that this same young man, thus humbled by this mortifying event, has since ceased not to proclaim aloud the ignorance and inexperience of the Roman professors and students? But such conduct as this forms part of the patriotic pride of our now-a-days Germans. We are not Germans if we do not hate and despise whatever is not German. But verily this pride is a crime before God, an obstacle to his mercy—to that mercy, of which, perhaps, no land upon the face of the earth stands more in need than does our degenerate, and of its ancient fame and glory forgetful, country.—EDIN. CATH. MAG.

In the Catholic Orphanage during the preceding week, the infant child of a European Baptist Father and of a Native Baptist woman was baptized according to the rite of the Catholic Church. Also, in the same institution, the child of a European Protestant Father and Mother, the Mother deceased, received the Sacrament of Baptism.

During the Ember week of the preceding September, Bishop Ceretti, Vicar Apostolic of Ava and Pegu, ordained two Priests at Amarapura, the Capital City of the Burmese Empire. This is the first Ordination ever held in that City. The Rev. Mr. Storck, the excellent Clergyman who administered the Apostolic Vicariate of Ava and Pegu until Bishop Ceretti lately arrived has entered on the Bengal Mission, with the leave of the Sacred Congregation.

During the preceding week, a respectable young woman born of European Parents and educated in the Protestant Orphanage of Calcutta, embraced the Catholic Faith, after having been duly instructed in its doctrines for the space of several weeks.

In the Notice inserted in last Saturday's Herald of the Hours for Divine Service, it was omitted to be mentioned that Sermons are preached in the morning in English, and in the evening in Portuguese at the Cathedral, and in English at St. Thomas' Church. In order to enable both the congregations which assist at first and at the High Mass at the Cathedral to profit of the Sermon without any unnecessary delay, the first Mass will begin at a quarter to 7 exactly, so as to allow the Sermon to commence at about a quarter past 7, when those who purpose assisting at High Mass can without inconvenience be present.

An Examination of the Pupils of the Catholic Orphanage was held on Monday last. Our venerated Archbishop, to whom, under God, we are indebted for this excellent Asylum, assisted at the examination. The children answered satisfactorily in the several portions of Geography, Arithmetic, Algebra, &c. assigned for the examination. There are 68 boys and 56 girls now in the Orphanage. Of this large number only two are in a delicate state of health.

CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT RULE OF FAITH.—In a late visitation sermon the Right Rev. Dr. Coen, Bishop of Clonfert, in adverting to the unworthy practice of compelling poor Catholic parents to send their children to Protestant schools, where the Master is a Protestant and the school book the Protestant Bible without note or comment, pointed out in the clearest manner, that the true Church of Christ should be one; as He and his Heavenly Father are but one; and being the Eternal Truth, whatever he revealed can have but one precise and particular meaning, which, if properly ascertained by all those denominations of Christians who call themselves His disciples, and members of His Church, they should be of one mind as to the sense and meaning of those great and sublime truths. But, alas! said his lordship, daily experience convinces us that this is not the case, as our blessed Redeemer clearly foresaw when He said in the gospel according to St. John, "other sheep I have who are not of this fold, these also I must bring back, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be but one fold and one shepherd." His lordship subsequently alluded to the rule of faith followed by Roman Catholics, and also to that adopted by his dissenting brethren. The former look up with the greatest respect and veneration to all the truths contained in the sacred volume; but as to their sense and meaning, they firmly adhere to, and believe that alone which the church has defined to be of faith in her general councils, where three, and sometimes more than four hundred bishops were assembled together, aided and assisted by the Holy Ghost, whom Christ sent down on his apostles to teach them all truth; and, moreover, he promised the same Divine assistance to their lawful successors in the ministry, saying that he himself would abide with His Church to the end of time, and that the gates of hell, that is the spirit of error, should never prevail against her. On the other hand, the only rule of faith adopted by our dissenting brethren are the same Scriptures as understood and interpreted by every man's private judgment; and Bossuet, in his history of the variations, clearly demonstrates what must be the consequence of adopting such a rule of faith, namely, that a wide door is open to all manner of errors and heresies differing from each other according as the private judgments of their authors differ in interpreting the sense and meaning of the Word of God; and hence unity, the distinguishing mark of the true Church of Christ, is entirely lost, and myriads of Christians are involved in labyrinth of error. Arius denied the divinity of Jesus Christ, Macedonius denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost; Socinus denied all mysteries revealed by God in the Holy Scriptures. Such were the horrid blasphemies which these heretics broached against those sublime mysteries which Protestants as well as Roman Catholics are bound to believe; but they were all condemned by the Catholic Church in different general councils convened to examine and pronounce judgment on these blasphemous doctrines. But let us here pause for a moment, said the venerable prelate, and ask our dissenting brethren what remedy could they apply, or how could they, consistently with their principles, confute these heresiarchs, who might reply that they followed the rule laid down by themselves, and that they were to be their own judges in interpreting the sense and meaning of the Holy Scripture?

As the project of tying the Catholic Clergy of Ireland with the bands of Mammon to the chariot-wheels of the State engages public attention in England and Ireland, it may be interesting to such of our readers as do not see the Tablet, to learn in what light this insidious proposal is viewed by the illustrious Priesthood of Ireland

At a meeting held at Wexford the Rev. Father Synnot adverted to the subject in the following terms; "The Catholic Clergy—I speak in the presence of many of them, and in the presence of their venerable head—the Catholic Clergy, and they will be joined by the Irish people, would set their faces as vigorously, and perseveringly, and determinedly against Catholic ascendancy as they would against Protestant ascendancy. We ask no state revenues. We ask no tithes—the labourer is worthy of his hire. If we labour we get our hire, and this is all we want. (Loud cheers.) But a connexion between our church and the state, even though it should be a Catholic state, we consider injurious to the interests of true religion. (Cheers.) Therefore I make this public declaration for the satisfaction of our Protestant brethren, that we will resist to the last, even to the death, if necessary, every invasion against the independence and rights of the church, which would be sacrificed by a state connexion."

Nor is the language of the "Lion of the Fold of Judah," as the Archbishop of Tuam has been felicitously styled, less explicit: "The binding," says this Athanasius of our day, "of the Catholic Clergy with golden fetters to the pillars of the Castle is already put forth by the organ of the unprincipled things as one of the necessary sanative measures for Ireland; and there are hollow Catholic patriots, who would gladly support such a ruinous project in order that the Apostolical freedom of that body should no longer be an impediment to the betrayal of whatever remains of liberty among the Irish people."

"At one time, the Catholic Clergy of Ireland are held up by the ruling powers to public execration, but of late they are drawing aside the veil of the royal treasury in order to tempt us by the dazzling sight—nay, they talk of seating us on the high places of their legislative assemblies, in order that being seduced by the glory which they lay before us, we may be brought to bow down and worship their ascendancy. But we are as indifferent to their flattery as we have been to their vituperation, and I trust they shall find that the virtues of the Irish hierarchy, which were proof against the fiery ordeal of their persecution will never yield to the more dangerous and seductive treachery of their caresses."

The proposition to make state provision for the Catholic Clergy of Ireland was unanimously and unhesitatingly reprobated by the hierarchy when brought forward under far less suspicious circumstances than it can now or ever again be. Nothing therefore could exceed the futility of reviving it, when no doubt of its real and deceitful object can for a moment exist.

It is hardly necessary to observe that if Government paid the Catholic Bishops, it would claim a voice in their election. Now it unfortunately so happens that the very qualities which Government would look for in a candidate are precisely the reverse of those which constitute a good Bishop. Subserviency in the Bishops would be the object of Government. And it would ill accord with this object to raise up a Lion for the protection of the Fold of Judah. Instead of the noble and undaunted Lion we should have the despicable hireling so vividly portrayed by our Saviour.

The indifference of the Catholic Clergy of Ireland to the charms and allurements of the Royal treasury, seems to be quite inexplicable to their enemies, to whom their motives are incomprehensible. The oracles of the Press must, however, in support of their own pretensions to superior sagacity, assign some reason. Accordingly we find the self-denying conduct of the pious and devoted Clergy of Ireland, ascribed—not to pure and holy zeal for the maintenance and extension of the kingdom of Christ—but to a conviction that what they now receive from the free-will of their faithful and loving flocks, is more than they would get from the Government. We are not prepared to say what force this argument might have under similar circumstance with the Protestant Clergy of Ireland, but we feel assured that no such sordid consideration ever entered into the minds of the Catholic Clergy as a ground of objection to state connection. It is but natural however that their conduct should be attributed to the only motive which is intelligible to their enemies. For it is not to be expected that people will give others, especially the objects of their vituperation, credit for higher motives of action than ever influenced their own conduct.

THE CATHOLIC DOCTRINE OF THE MASS.

To the Rev. Dr. Hook, of Leeds.

REV. SIR,—As no one has calumniated the Catholic Church more than you have done, therefore I cannot do better than to give the public, by way of question and answer, the true Catholic doctrine of the Mass, as follows:—

Q. Pray give us the Catholic belief on the mass.

A. The mass is an oblation of Christ's body and blood, under the species of bread and wine, as a perpetual memorial of His sacrifice on Mount Calvary; for which reason it is called a commemorative as well as a propitiatory one."

Q. Give us the opinion of some eminent Protestant divines on this most important subject?

A. I shall do so with much pleasure. "The Lord's supper is frequently called a sacrifice by the ancient fathers, and by many learned men amongst ourselves; for if the priest and the altar be so near, the Lamb cannot be far off; even the most blessed Lamb of God, called, therefore, by St. Augustine the sacrifice of the altar, and by the English liturgy the sacrifice of praise: so it is in the canon of the mass; and by many learned writers of our own a commemorative sacrifice. The king grants the name of sacrifice to have been frequent with the fathers, and he sometimes calls it a commemorative one. Bishop Moreton does the same on the Roman sacrifice" Lib. 6, chap. 5; and "Cranmer against Gardiner," lib. 5, p. 439; and "Heylinus Introduction to Cyprianus Anglicus."

"The sacrifice of the supper," says the Protestant Bishop Forbes, "is not only propitiatory and may be offered up for the remission of our daily sins, but impetratory, and may be rightly offered to obtain all blessings; and although the scripture does not teach this in express words, yet the holy fathers, with unanimous consent, have thus understood the scriptures, as has been demonstrated by many, and must be evident to all." (Forbes de Eucharistia, lib. 3. c. 2. sect. 12)

"The first and chief question, though merely one of words," says the great learned Protestant divine, Molanus, "is, whether the sacrifice of the altar be a sacrifice? Whether it could be called one in the proper sense of the word is not the point, on which there can be but one opinion. The point is, can it be one in the strict sense of the word? A matter to be determined only by the manner of expression. As Christ does no more, the Roman church has never pretended the eucharist to be a true and proper sacrifice. Her opinion then is, that it is one in opposition to others so called, and still more improperly, such as prayer, &c.; or because the very same sacrifice offered for us on the cross, and the same blood shed for us, is most certainly given to us in the eucharist, in which sense Protestants may grant the eucharist to be a sacrifice properly so called, which shews the whole dispute to be of words alone. To which I add, that the holy fathers, viz., St. Cyril of Jerusalem, &c. &c. &c. do everywhere call it a most true and singular sacrifice, a holy one, most dreadful, and to be trembled at. St. George of Nyssa says, expressly, 'That Christ being at once both priest and victim, is immolated.' 'Quare,' says he, 'cum corpus edendum discipulis exhibuit, jam antequam esset spectabili ratione corpus erat immolatum, quoniam prima de resurrectione Christi.' If Protestants, then, will but express themselves as the fathers do, I see not why, on this point, an amicable agreement should not take place." (Molanus's Conference with Bossuet.)

"It is certain," says the learned Protestant Dr. Grabe, "that all the fathers, either contemporary, whether with the apostles or their successors, did consider the blessed sacrament as the sacrifice of the new law; and this was not the opinion of any one church, but the public doctrine of the church universal, which she received from the apostles and the apostles from Jesus Christ." (Grabe's Notes on St. Irenæus.)

The truth, to use the words of the Protestant Dr. Pocklington, "If there be no Christian sacrifice, there is not Christian priest; if there be no Christian priest, then away with our book of ordination of priests and deacons." (Pocklington's Altera Christianum, p. 130)

Why the Mass is said in Latin, &c. &c.

Q. Pray did not the church formerly use the vernacular language?

A. She did, and there was a very good reason for it. The Latin was then the vernacular tongue of the greater part of the civilized world, in consequences of the Roman conquests. It was generally known where other languages continued to be the vernacular. St. Paul wrote to the Romans in Greek, a language which all the Romans did not understand. The learned Protestant, Dr. Southey, agrees with the Catholic church on the subject of its peculiar fitness to be the languages of the Christian liturgy.

"Latin," says Southey, vol. 1, p. 59, "was made the language of religion; there had been the same reason for this in Italy, Spain, and France, as for making it the language of the laws; and in England also, there was reason, which, though different, was not less valid. A common language was necessary for the clergy, who considered themselves as belonging less to the country in which they happened individually to have been born or stationed, than to their order, or to Christendom; for in these ages Christendom was regarded as something more than a mere name. No modern language was yet fixed, or reduced to rules, or regarded as a written tongue; of necessity, therefore, Latin, in which the western clergy read the scriptures, and in which the fathers of the western church had composed their works, and the councils had issued their decrees, was everywhere retained as the natural and professional language of the ministers of religion. They preached, and catechized, and conferred in the common speech of the country, and that the church service was not verbally intelligible to the congregation was, upon their principles, no inconvenience. But in this respect there was no real disadvantage in the use of a foreign tongue; in other respects many and most important advantages arose from it. The clergy became of necessity a learned body; and to their humble and patient labours we owe the whole history of the middle ages, and the preservation of those works of antiquity which, for the instruction of all after ages, have been preserved. The students at Canterbury in Bede's time, were as well skilled in Latin and Greek as in their native speech: and Bede himself, worthy to be called venerable, if ever that epithet was worthy to be applied, had acquired all that could possibly be learned from books, and was master of what was then the whole circle of human knowledge."

The people have the substance, frequently the literal translation in their prayer books of what the priest reads during the sacrifice, in the ancient language of Catholic Europe. They know as well as the priest himself does to what they answer, "Amen." When a foreigner from any of the countries where Greek is not the vernacular language comes into our churches, and I need scarcely except even Catholics of the Greek rite, he is perfectly at home among his brethren in faith and worship. Their ceremonies and prayers are the same as in his native land, Germans, French, English, Irish, Scotch, Poles, Swiss, Italians, Portuguese, Spaniards, like the Jews, devout men from every nation under heaven, we hear our priests, as they did the apostles, speaking in a tongue which we may call our own, "The wonderful works of God." The sermons in our church are not preached in Latin, but in as plain English as we can find in common use.

Q. What does St. Augustine say of the sacrifice of the mass in his seventeenth book of the City of God?

A. "This sacrifice," says he "has been established in place of the sacrifice of the Old Testament."

Q. What says St. Irenæus, lib. iv. c. 32?

A. "The apostles received this sacrifice from Jesus Christ, and the church received it from the apostles; and she offers it to-day, throughout the whole world, according to the prophet Malachy."

Q. Did they say mass two hundred years ago?

A. Yes, throughout the whole of Christendom.

Q. Did they say mass twelve hundred years ago?

A. Yes they did, as the ancient liturgies, Latin, Greek, and Arabic, have grounded their faith on it.

Q. Is it known who was the bishop or pope who first commenced celebrating mass?

A. No.

Q. What consequence do you draw from that?

A. It follows, by St. Augustine's rule, that we have received this sacrifice of the mass from the hands of the apostles, and from Jesus Christ.

Q. Explain yourself?

A. When an usage is established in the church and when no bishop, no pope, nor any council has been the author of it, it is a proof that it was the apostles who taught us to practise it.

Q. How do you prove that the sacrifice of the mass is propitiary?

A. I prove it by these words of St. Mathew, c. 26: "This is my blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed for many for the remission of sins."

Q. What is meant by the blood of the New Testament?

A. As the Old Testament was dedicated, with the blood of victims, by Moses, in these words: "This is my blood of the Testament," &c., Hebrews ix. v. 20, so here is the dedication and institution of the New Testament, in the blood of Christ, here mystically shed: "This is my blood of the New Testament," &c.

Q. Have you any further proof that the mass is propitiary?

A. Yes I have, by these words of St. Paul, in the 5th chapter of his Epistle to the Hebrews: "For every high priest, taken from among men, is appointed for men in the things that appertain to God, that he may offer up gifts and sacrifices for sin."

Q. What do you conclude from that?

A. I conclude that as we have bishops and priests, it must necessarily follow that they offer up a victim for our sins.

Q. Are there, then, more than one propitiary sacrifice. Is not the sacrifice of the cross the only sacrifice which has expiated our sins?

A. The sacrifice of the cross and that of the altar are but the same sacrifice.

Q. Why then is the same sacrifice daily renewed? Has not the sacrifice of the cross sufficed for all?

A. The virtue of the sacrifice of the cross is infinite; but it is necessary that this virtue should be applied, and it can be applied only through certain channels.

Q. What are the channels by which this virtue may be applied?

A. The sacraments, the sacrifice of the mass, prayer, and good works.

Q. How must we consider the sacrifice of the mass?

A. As a particular instrument, by which the virtue of the sacrifice of the cross is applied in a most particular manner to our souls.

Q. Did the primitive church offer up the sacrifice of the mass for the dead from the earliest ages of Christianity?

A. Yes, as can be easily proved by the testimony of the holy fathers.

Q. What says Tertullian in his book of Monogamy?

A. "That a woman who neglected having the holy sacrifice of the mass offered up every year for her husband, on the day of his death, ought to be considered as divorced from him."

Q. What says St. Cyprian in his Epistles (Epistle ix.)?

A. That we must not offer the sacrifice of the mass for him who would appoint an ecclesiastic for the guardian of his children.

Q. Inform us what St. Augustine says in his 22nd book of the "City of God," chap. viii.?

A. He mentions that one of his priests having said mass in a house that was infested with evil spirits, from that moment it was never more troubled by them.

Q. Does not the tenth chapter, I Corinthians, v. 16, prove clearly that the apostles said mass in these terms: "These chalice of benediction which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? and the bread which we break, is it not the partaking of the body of the Lord?"

A. Most certainly; and the 13th chapter, v. ii. of the Acts of the Apostles, convinces us the more of this verity. "And as they were ministering to the Lord, and fasting, the Holy Ghost said to them: Separate me Saul and Barnabas, for the work whereunto I have taken them."

Q. This passage is very remarkable. I confess, because it is conformable to the Greek; and it clearly shews that the apostles said Mass. Pray proceed.

A. It is likewise from this passage that the Greeks take the word liturgy, which means sacrifice. In proof of what I assert, see the liturgies of St. James, St. Clement, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, &c. The Latins, on the contrary, have taken the word missa, from the feminine Hebrew word, missan, which signifies oblation, and which is derived from mass; which signifies liquefieri et dissolvi, because all these things which are offered to God ought to be, as it were, destroyed and annihilated, each in its kind, as an acknowledgement of his sovereign dominion, before whom all creatures, in place of whom these things are offered, should be destroyed and annihilated for his glory. Thus the word mass is sufficiently authorised in sacred scripture, see Deuteronomy, c. xvi. v. 10; and as the unbloody sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ ought to be offered daily to the Eternal Father for the remission of sins till the end of time. This is the reason why the apostles ordained priests for each church: "and having prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord in whom they believed." (Acts, xiv. 23) For this purpose St. Paul, in his first epistle to Timothy, iv. v. 14, says, "Neglect not the grace which is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with inspiration of the hands of the priesthood." Exhorting him by these words, to ordain priests, he does the same in regard to Titus, c. i. v. 5: "For this cause I left you in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and shouldst ordain priests in every city, as I also appointed thee." [Pray permit me to ask you here, rev. sir, who appointed you? I ask you in the words of Tertullian, whence do you come—shew me your credentials?] I know the word priest is left out in the Geneva Bible; nevertheless Calvin, one of the great authors of the reformation, in the fourth book of his Institutions, c. iii. sec. 14, cites the 23rd verse of the 14th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and makes use of the word priest; and in his commentary on the 1st of Timothy, c. iv. sec. 14, he says there is no other Greek word to express priest but presbyter; and he declares that all those who think that the Greek word in this passage includes the whole priesthood are quite right. In vain have Protestants endeavoured to change the word priest into ancient, for there is a great difference in regard to these two words (priest and ancient), as we learn from the first epistle of St. Peter, c. v. v. 5: "In like manner, ye young men, be subject to the ancients." The word ancient here has a reference to "young," but there is no office, no ministry attached to it, only age. The word priest necessarily supposes a sacrifice; I am not, therefore, surprised that Protestants, who allow of no sacrifice in religion, have changed the word priest into ancient, and have likewise abolished the sacrifice of the law of grace. No sacrifice no religion. See Daniel, xii. 11.

Q. Who first instigated Martin Luther, the father of the reformation, to abolish the mass?

A. The devil, the father of lies.

Q. How do you prove it?

A. I prove it by his own words and authority.

Q. Inform us what he says of his great intimacy with the devil, and then proceed to give us his reasons why the devil advised him to abolish the mass?

A. "Believe me," says Luther, "I know the devil right well; for he and I sometimes pace the room together. When engaged in society, he troubles me not; but when alone, he teaches me how I should conduct myself. Nay (says he), he and I are so intimate that I have eaten above a bushel of salt with him."—Concioni Dom. Reminiscere, fol. 19. The old boy, it seems, became his bed-fellow in lieu of Mrs. Luther herself, his beloved Kate! Hear him, my friends, "The devil (said he) sleeps oftener with me, and closer to my side, than my own Catherine!"—Idem in Collo-quia Germanicis, fol. 275, 281. This work is a general called Luther's Table-Talk, of which a most unfaithful translation has been made, and in which, not the above only, but many other similar passages are left out. What Luther says in one of his convivial moments can scarcely ever be equalled, and I sincerely hope it never may. It is horrible in the extreme, and is as follows: "I would rather fall by the hands of the devil than that of Cæsar, for I should then perish by a noble arm indeed."—Colloquia Mensalia, fol. 32. Luther was, on the 18th of February, 1546, after a hearty supper, found dead on his couch.

I shall now proceed to prove, by Luther's own words, that it was by the advice of the devil he abolished the mass, and which appears not only from his own account of the matter, but by the assertions of the most learned Protestants themselves. We shall attend first to his reverence, and he will tell us candidly that, on a certain winter's night, about the ghostly hour of twelve, the learned doctor approached his solitary bed (Kate was not Mrs. Luther at the time), attacked him in due form, and convinced him, by the strength of the most powerful arguments, that the mass, as celebrated in the Catholic church, was a sacrilege and an abomination in the eyes of God. But let Luther tell his own story in his tract "De Missa Angarali et Consecratione Sacerdotum qui extat," tom. vi. Germ. Immei, fol. 23; and also tom. vii. edit. Wittemberg, fol. 443. If you will not credit me, my Protestant friends, believe your own eyes:

"I am going to relate an anecdote concerning myself, and to make a little confession to you, my reverend fathers. You will excuse me however, I trust, though it may be of no service to you." N.B. He here addresses his compeers the cidevant Augustinians of Wittemberg. "It happened to me that just as I awakened, some nights ago, about twelve o'clock, the devil (who by-the-bye has caused me many an uneasy one) addressed me as follows: 'Listen to me (says he), most learned man! Are you not aware that, for the last fifteen years you have been in the habit of celebrating private masses? Now what will you say if all this while you have but committed daily acts of idolatry! and, in lieu of the body and blood of Christ you have but adored, and exhibited to others to adore, nothing but plain bread and wine!' To which I instantly replied, that I was an anointed priest, regularly ordained by a bishop, and only acted by the orders of my superiors; and why should not I have validly and truly consecrated, having pronounced the words of consecration diligently, and said my whole mass most devoutly? 'Very true,' answered the devil, 'but do not the Turks perform their rites through obedience as well as you?'

"But what if your very consecration and ordination were both false like theirs! Hic certe sudor mihi erupit, et cor tremere at que palpitare mihi cepit."

● "Here (says Martin) a cold sweat began to burst from every pore in my frame, and my heart beat violently.

"Satan put forth his whole argumentative strength. 'Habet que gravem et fortem vocem.'"

N.B. These last words of Luther, which so clearly prove the reality of this conference, have been shamefully expunged by the Wittemberg editors in their latter editions. Surely no Roman index could do more!

"Finding myself so hard pressed," says the friar (Luther was an Augustinian friar,) "I opposed to him the old Popish shield, viz, the faith and intention of the church.

"'Nonsensæ,' replied Satan, 'shew me where it is written (see my readers how fond he is of the written word, or the bible alone!) that a bad man can consecrate according to the faith and intention of the church! Where has God taught it?'

"How Satan detests the invocation of the saints, and this neither you yourself nor any other Papist can deny.

"'Secondly,' says Satan, 'your consecration of the sacrament is contrary to the intention of Christ. He commands an administration to the people, whilst you have for the last fifteen years received the sacrament alone! What sort of work is this? No! Thou hast never truly consecrated, but hast offered nothing but plain bread and wine, which thou didst adore, receive, &c. Thou art, I tell thee, no priest nor is the bread in thy mass changed into the body of Christ.'

Thus ended this famous conference, as Luther himself relates the story, the unhappy man congratulating himself on his delivery from the mass, and all other Popish errors.

"Viderint," says he, "nunc Papistæ quomodo sua pergamā defendunt!"

Our Protestant friends have taken every possible means to shake the credit of the above narrative, but in vain. I shall only insert one proof, and an unanswerable one, viz. the plain and unequivocal admissions of their own most learned men.

"In the course of the year 1522," says the learned Hospinian, "Luther published a book on the mass, wherein he describes a conversation he had with the devil, who, he confesses, told him of many existing abuses in the Popish mass, the sum of which was, that he was instructed by the devil of the abomination of the mass, and accordingly he did by his advice and instigation, abolish it."—Hospinian Historia Sacramentaria, anno 1533, fol. 131. And again, fol. 26, (N.B. No dream here!): "Does he not know," says he, "what Luther writes, not indeed of an angel, but of the devil himself, who had a conference with him one night, and pointed out to him several abuses in the Popish mass."

That this learned Protestant wrote not this from ill-will to Luther appears from another place in the same work, and is as follows:

"I will say nothing disrespectful of Luther, or reflecting on his character," says he, "whom I revere as a person adorned with many heavenly graces, with wit, learning, eloquence, zeal for the glory of God, &c., and raised by him to enlighten his church," &c. And another learned Calvinist, David Paræus, replying to a Lutheran who had objected to him Zuinglius's black or white ghost, retorts on him thus:

"Let the Lutherans look to themselves, and recollect what their own Luther relates of his own intimacy with the devil, and frequent conversation, with that black spirit (the devil), and the advice he received from him. Let them, I say, refute the Popish argument. Luther himself confesses his being instructed by the devil why the Popish mass should be abolished, therefore his doctrine on this head is diabolical; for if they do, the Papists will be down on them with Luther's long account of the conference," &c.—Paræus, lib. iv. de Eucharista, c. 7.

With what face then could Synge, in his scurrilous rejoinder to Malone, p. 92, assert the whole to have been "merely a temptation of Luther, not his instruction, and that Luther was disputed against not the mass!"

From such defenders the Lord deliver me. As to Chillingworth's silly evasion in calling it a dream, it not only contradicts Luther himself, who assures us of his being wide awake at the time; but the learned Lutheran, Baldwin, terms it a real truth, related by Luther "most seriously and truly" "Historiam illam," says he, "tam prolixè consideratè Lutherous conscripserit quod enim iam scripserit et quidam serio et historice etiam nam et constanter fateor."—Baldwinus de Disputatione Luther, cum Diabolo, a. d. 1605, p. 75.

Also, I beg to inform my readers that all these evasions of Synge, of Faulke, and of others, are well examined and refuted by Beverly in his Apology for the Roman Church, pp. 741, 742, to which Moreton never ventured to offer a single word of reply. My readers are also requested to consult the work of the illustrious Walsingham, a convert, entitled his Search into Religion, part 2nd, c. ii. p. 135, hitherto unreplied to, and such as will and must baffle the modern Anglican church to the latest hour of her existence. I have demonstratively proved by Luther himself, and by learned Protestants, that it was by the advice of the devil that Luther abolished the mass.—(From the learned works of "Julius Vindex."

The Protestant Dr. Hutter says: "I will willingly grant that the sacrifice of the mass has been celebrated in the world for the last thousand years."—De Sacrificio Missæ, p. 377.

Q. Pray inform us what Luther says of the Mass in his book of the Captivity of Babylon, tom. ii, fol. 68?

A. "Nothing," says he, "is at present more firmly believed in the church than this: that the mass is good, and a sacrifice. To overthrow it, then, from its long continuance and its approval by the whole world, will prove, perhaps, impossible. In fact it is so well and firmly established, that, in order to do so, the face of the whole church must be altered."—Captivity of Babylon, t. ii. fol. 68. And in the same work, fol. 244, addressing his old companions, the Augustinians, who had, like himself, discontinued it, "How often, my friends," says he, "has not my trembling heart reprehended me, objecting the strongest and only argument art thou, O Luther! the only man of sense in the whole world? Are all others in error? Have so many ages passed in ignorance? What if you should be the person mistaken, and lead so many into error, to be damned with you for all eternity!" A tragical reflection surely; but this docile and apt scholar was not to be daunted.

"Luther, like him who smoothly slides on ice, With caution trod the slippery path of vice; At first he trembled, but, the rub gone o'er, He posted briskly, and looked back no more."

And now permit me here to ask my Protestant readers "whether it be," as the learned "Julius Vindex" says, "not far more prudent in a man to assist at the unbloody sacrifice of the Christian and

Catholic church, called the mass, than to reject it with Luther, who, by his own confession, was instigated to do so by the devil.

Q. Did not Luther, after all, approve and find no manner of fault in the mass? Give us his exact words, and where we are to find them?

A. Hear and believe. He says, addressing the friends of Carlostadius, who had acted contrary to his orders: "If you continue to act as you do, I will unsay all I have taught or written. I will read my recantation, and leave you all. Remember my words! And pray now, after all, what harm will the Popish mass do you?"—Lutherus Sermo docens Abusus non Manibus, sed Verbo, fol. 275.

Now, my Protestant friends, what say you to your great apostle, the father of the reformation? Will you not now open your eyes and read with an unprejudiced mind?

I am, your obedient servant,
VERAX,
A CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

TEMPERANCE.

The Rev. Dr. Chas. Const. Pise, of New York, has written a letter to the Ven. Rev. T. Mathew, under date of 17th April, in which he denies having written anything unfavourable of his glorious movement; but merely said that the Catholic clergy of Cork, as a body, had not ranged themselves under his banner. To show his profound regard for himself and his beautiful country, he gives several emphatic passages from an oration which he delivered before the Washington Temperance Guards, consisting of an assembly of more than 3,000 persons, and also from a speech delivered at a great public dinner there before a considerable number. In the one, "he associates with the name of the Apostle of American freedom, that other of the Apostle of Temperance, which is hailed and venerated and loved wherever it is heard.—General George Washington and Father Theobald Mathew. The echo of two worlds repeat them, and millions emancipated from the thralldom of political and moral slavery love to bless them. In the other, he said it would be vain for him to express the honour which he felt was conferred on him, when he received an invitation from Father Mathew to partake of his hospitable board; and praised his kind manner, heartfelt sympathies, sincere tokens of welcome, and, at the same time, the social enjoyments of this extraordinary man. All strangers who have participated in his conversation and society, acknowledge this fact, and the clergy of Cork are unanimous in their expression of attachment and respect for him, while the whole nation cherishes him as a benefactor and an apostle." The Ven. Rev. Charles Chiriguy, of Quebec, has written also a most beautiful letter to the very Rev. Theobald Mathew, in which he describes in the most interesting terms, the wonderful movement there, under his banner! Amongst other wonderful things, he says, that whilst before the movement had taken place, there was not a single parish in the diocese where could not be found disturbances and scandals of all description, occasioned by the use of liquors, now, upwards of 7,000 Canadians have enrolled themselves in the temperance cause, determined to expel it from their country. In one parish alone, out of 14,000 adults, not more than 300 could be allowed to take the Sacraments at Easter, in consequence of the intemperance of the inhabitants. There were seven taverns in that parish, and not a good school; whilst now upwards of 1,200 persons had the happiness of receiving the bread of Heaven at Easter. The seven taverns were replaced by seven schools, wherein 300 children are receiving a sound religious education. That parish has since two years given 160*l* to the Propagation of the Faith, for the support of foreign missions, in addition to the aid for various local charities. The adherence of the Irish who arrived there to their pledge is unparalleled, and has excited a reverence, not only for Father Mathew but for themselves and the sacred cause of temperance.

FATHER MATHEW'S VISIT TO LONDON.—In a letter written to the Rev. J. Jauch, the Very Rev. Theobald Mathew says:—That, in consequence of the demise of his lamented brother, we must not expect him in London before the 22d of this month; and that it is his wish to be as retired as possible, especially during the first days after his arrival in London.

TEMPERANCE.—On Sunday, the 18th ult. the friends of temperance held a public meeting at the Catholic Testotal Assembly room, Etchell-street, Stockport, which was numerously attended. The Rev. Thomas Newsham, presided. The meeting was ably addressed by Mr. Dalby, who in a most eloquent speech pointed out the many evils arising from intemperance; after which, the rev. gentleman who presided, addressed the meeting in very forcible terms, and after descanting on the evils arising from intoxication, and the many benefits obtained by sobriety, he delivered the pledge to thirty-eight persons; after which a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Dalby, and the meeting dispersed.

GRAND TEMPERANCE CONFERENCE.—The delegates from America to the Anti-Slavery Convention and the friends of the temperance cause in London, met at the Crown and Anchor on Wednesday, Samuel Bowley, Esq. in the chair. Dr. Ritchie, of Edinburgh, the Rev. Mr. Clark, of Africa, S. P. Andrews, Esq., from Texas, Mr. S. Buckingham, the Rev. A. A. Phelps, Mr. Joseph Sturze, the Rev. J. Blanchard, Louis Tappen, Esq., of New York, the Rev. Mr. Howin, addressed the meeting. The expected visit of Father Mathew was dwelt on, and a Grand General Temperance Convention was proposed.

MISCELLANEA.

HAWICK, SELKIRK, KELSO, &c.—About six years ago the Rev. W. Wallace accidentally turned his attention to the small manufacturing town of Hawick, where he found nearly 200 Catholics—such exemplary Catholics too, that even the public authorities of the place did them the justice to say that a Catholic had never been brought before them, even for a misdeemeanor; yet there they were in a place where the feet of a Catholic clergyman had not trod since the devastating fire of the Reformation; and thus they might have been till the devastating fire of the last day reduced their neighbours to a level with them, if Providence had not led the above clergyman to visit and pity them. That which has been said here of Hawick may in like manner be said of Selburgh, Selkirk, Kelso, Gala-shiele, and Peebles—in every one of which, were there a chapel, there would be a flock; yet it is well known that, with the exception of Traquair, there is not even a station from Edinburgh to Carlisle, a distance of more than ninety miles. In none of these places is there any hostile feeling to Catholics. But Hawick has the singular commendation that in it not only is there no hostile feeling; but, on the contrary, there is a strong and marked feeling in favour of Catholicity. Though a Priest, and a total stranger, the Rev. Mr. Wallace found himself caressed, encouraged, and even supported by the most influential persons in the place. More than one of the best citizens of the town have even promised to take seats in the church, which is now begun; and if a charitable public would aid him to complete the shell, the Earl of Traquair has nobly volunteered to seat it, and the Protestant inhabitants have signified their intention to aid, if not to defray, the necessary sum for purchasing an organ.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.—A return of the number of students in the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth, during the years 1821, and 1842; also the number of professors at present employed therein, with their respective salaries and emolument:—The number of students in the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth, in the year 1840 was 437; in the year 1841, 427; in the year 1842, 425. There are at present employed, in the government and general administration of the Roman Catholic College—A president, with a salary of 326*l*.; a vice president, who is also bursar, 300*l*.; a senior dean, 122*l*. two junior deans, each 112*l*. There are also eleven professors, with the following salaries—One professor, being also librarian, 142*l*.; four others, each 122*l*.; six others each 112*l*. No master in the College has any emoluments but his salary, board, and apartments.

The professors have only the same emoluments with the other masters—salaries, board, and apartments.—MICHAEL MONTAGUE, President.—May 6, 1843.

RIGHT REV. DR. CROTTY.—This prelate has commenced the annual visitation of his extensive diocese. The first parish visited by him was Youghal, where, on the 17th and 18th inst, he administered the sacrament of Confirmation to 1,400 persons, young and old, of both sexes, all well instructed in the principles of religion, and of whom a large number were converts.—Correspondent.

STOCKTON.—On Sunday, the 23*d*, at Stockton-on-Tees, the sacrament of confirmation was administered by the Right Rev. Dr. Mostyn, Bishop of the North, to seventy-seven persons, forty-two of whom were converts from Protestantism returning to the bosom of the Catholic Church, which is making great progress in this town. On the same evening the members of the Holy Gild of St. Joseph met in the school room, and walked in procession to the church, headed by the Rev. Joseph Dugdallé, their chaplain, carrying staves with crosses, or white wands, and wearing the cloaks, collars, and shields of the order. After prayers and a short exhortation, with an explanation of the rules of the Gild, each member was invested at the altar with his collar and shield by the hand of the bishop. The very solemn ceremony excited great curiosity, for such a procession has not taken place here since the Reformation. The society is in a very flourishing state, and seven new members joined the same evening.

On Friday and Saturday last, his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam conferred the order of Sub-deacon and Deaconship on the Rev. Messrs. M'Girr, O'Malley and O'Reilly;—and on Sunday last the order of Priesthood on the Rev. Messrs. M'Girr and O'Reilly—the former for Calcutta, and the latter for the Diocese of Kilmore.

At a late meeting of the Augustinian Order, in Dublin, the Rev. Mr. Page was elected Superior of the Convent belonging to that Body, in College-street, in this town—Athlone Sentinel.

Mrs. A. Murphy thankfully acknowledges having received from the Rev. Mr. Sheridan, P.P. of Kingstown, the sum of one pound, restitution money.

Sir Charles Metcalfe, among innumerable charities, has given 50*l* to the Roman Catholic Church at Toronto.

DUNDEE.—On Sunday, the 5th of June, the Right Rev. Dr. Andrew Carruthers, Lord Bishop of Edinburgh and the eastern district of Scotland, administered in this town the sacrament of Confirmation to upwards of two hundred persons, thirty of whom were recent converts to the Catholic faith. His lordship has now confirmed in Dundee, during the last four years, 1,000 individuals, about 100 of whom had been converted from various Protestant sects. As his lordship's intended visit had been previously made known, the extensive Catholic Church of Dundee was crowded during the service; not fewer than 5,000 persons must have visited the House of Solemnity on that day. The persons to be confirmed assembled at eight o'clock, A. M., in the two large school rooms attached to the church, and after performing the morning devotions, walked in procession thence to the church, where, as soon as they were arranged, they sang beautifully the hymn, Jesu dulcis memoria. The communion mass then commenced, and the communion was administered by the Rev. Stephen Keenaw, of Dundee, and the Rev. John M'Corry, from Braemar; after which the young people spent some time in prayer, and then retired to prepare themselves for confirmation in the afternoon. A solemn high mass was celebrated at eleven o'clock by the Rev. John M'Pherson, attended by deacon and sub-deacon. After the gospel, the Rev. John M'Corry preached a most eloquent sermon from the gospel of the day. His picture of the good shepherd—of the perpetual struggles and perpetual triumphs of the Church, as well as his description of her present prospects, when Church of Englandism and Covenanting John Knoxism are crumbling into ruins, were particularly vivid and powerful. When we looked around us on the spacious and elegant church, the beautifully chaste white marble altar, surrounded by every suitable decoration, the solemnity of the service—the grave dignity of the prelate seated on his throne and surrounded by his clergy—the dense mass of human beings who thronged to assist at the holy sacrifice—the powerful energetic bursts of the impassioned speaker, and the notes of heavenly music which stole along the vaulted ceiling and seemed to soften down into a harmony like that of heaven; we fancied for a moment we were carried back to the days of the martyred Beaton, and were assisting at a solemn service in the once grand, now ruined cathedral of St. Andrew's. The afternoon service commenced at two, when the persons to be confirmed again entered the church in procession, and sang in the most earnest and pious manner the Veni Creator; and the effect of this hymn, sung by many young soft and clear voices, was quite wonderful; many of them, as well of the congregation, shed tears of holy joy. Precisely at half-past two the bishop, preceded by his clergy, entered the sanctuary, and proceeded to address those upon whom he was about to impose his hands. At all times remarkable for the solemnity and dignity of his manner, he was on this occasion peculiarly so. The occasional raising of his eyes to heaven marked how earnestly he sought from heaven what he was about to bestow upon his children. His address was, what it always is, remarkable for depth of thought, elegance of language, and refinement of taste. When he turned to the converts who were presented to him first, he was particularly happy in the blessed invitation which he gave them to enter the fold of Christ, and to become one people with the children of God. When the confirmation was over, the venerable prelate, after having rested for a few moments, addressed again in beautiful and feeling language his newly confirmed children, impressing upon their minds the necessity of persevering in the service of God, and in order to do this, the necessity of co-operating at all times with the graces and inspirations of the Holy Spirit whom they had received. He concluded by delicately complimenting the pastors of the place, and in a very particular manner the lady who had spent so much of her time gratuitously in giving such admirable instruction to the female portion of the congregation. In the evening the church was again crowded for benediction, which, after the reciting of the prayers for the indulgence, was, in full pontificals, given by his lordship. Previous to benediction the bishop had visited the Sunday schools, which he found filled by about 700 children, at which he expressed his great delight. Thus closed a day which will be long and gratefully remembered by all who were happy enough to share in its benedictions.—Correspondent.

LISBON.

We are indebted to a correspondent for the following paragraph:—"In the course of a short time the Portuguese Church will again appear before Christendom with renewed lustre, for the honest materials are here in extensive abundance. The new establishment for the propagation of the faith and missions is hourly progressing, and could not possibly be in better hands. The enthusiasm of the people in its behalf is lively and universal. Church persecution appears to have come to a full halt, and the good old-fashioned Christians are beginning to breathe more freely and confidently, with all in good humour, and all symptomatic of a favourable future. Protestantism, with all her busy offspring, may, bid a long farewell to their inroads on the Catholicity of the Portuguese people, who never at any period felt a great relish for religious, or even other novelties. They are just to-day the same people I first found them twenty-five years ago, with the exception of a few Anglicanly educated petit-maitres and sensual philosophers. Few nations, or better perhaps, none, can equal the Portuguese in the rectitude and urbanity which they have had long the happiness to imbibe from the dogmas and doctrines of true religion, rendered solid by the good example of parental tradition. This proves your proposition, "that no people can appear properly cultivated, or of honourable and dignified principles, without Catholicity." Mr. Joyce, the rector of St. Patrick's College, is at present on a visit to his friends in Ireland. Previous to his departure, arrangements were made to open the halls of that old college for the general education of youth, in order to enable the reverend occupiers to keep this ancient establishment, hitherto devoted to clerical education, from falling into utter dilapidation. The late change of government under Don Pedro deprived this college, as well as others, of several sources of revenue, leaving it scarcely sufficient to give foot to three old priests. The King's father and brother, with the Princess Clementine of France, have recently arrived here from Brest. They have already commenced dispensing many municipal donations to various public charitable establishments. They attended at the Chapel Royal on the solemn festival of Pentecost."

MALTA.

CATHOLIC MISSIONS IN THE MALTA PRISON.

—We were much gratified to read in the last Osservatore Maltese (22nd inst.) that his lordship Bishop Sant had visited the Malta prison, and had administered the consolations of religion to its unhappy inmates. We think this an admirable example to the clergy of all Christian denominations. At the same time our satisfaction, as Protestants, was considerably lessened at perceiving that the Roman Catholic clergy did not confine their administrations of comfort to their own flock, and that three Protestants are reported as having become Roman Catholics. The poor men may however, perhaps plead neglect on the part of their own clergy, and really we do think that there is a want of zeal in some of our clergy. There can be no solid objection to a man's changing his religion from conviction. It is also of the nature of the human mind to change one's religious convictions. Besides, our fathers have all done so. Our observations, we wish it to be understood, merely extend to what is considered fair and right in the efforts of the various clergy to convert those of another faith. Has Bishop Sant taken advantage of the circumstances of the Protestant prisoners? Man is a miserable being. He is, if he thinks on his real state, daily and hourly unhappy. We should not then be surprised to find prisoners, who are additionally oppressed with misery, embracing the very first opportunities of relief—and ever accepting of the consolations of religion from strangers. We may still expect that some of the Malta Protestant clergy will now take an interest in what is going on in the prison as to these missions.—Malta Times.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

In the fourteenth number of our Journal, we lately offered some remarks on the assertion contained in Mangnall's Question, that in the sixth century, "unlimited temporal as well as spiritual authority was assumed by the Popes." It would have given great weight to this statement, especially in what regards the assumption of unlimited temporal power by the Popes, if the writer had illustrated it, by quoting even one historical authentic fact of the sixth century, in support of so serious an accusation against the most ancient and illustrious See in Christendom. To try and supply the omission, we have turned over with attention, the ecclesiastical annals of the sixth century, but all in vain, not a vestige could we discover of any event in that century, from which ingenuity, however great, or bigotry, however gross, could deduce any inference to sustain the assertion we complain of. But, besides the negative testimony thus supplied, we have also to produce in our favor, the glorious evidence which a summary of the history of the sixth century furnishes. From that summary, we are enabled to state, that perhaps, at no period, since the foundation of the Christian Church did there flourish, in one century, so many Popes, as in the sixth century, whose names have been enrolled in the calendar of saints. Not less than about fourteen of the Popes of that age were thus distinguished for eminent sanctity, and of that number, three endured a painful persecution from the Emperor Justinian. One of the three, St. Sylvester, was banished into the barren island of Palmaria, where in a short time he died for want of food. At the close of the catalogue of the illustrious pontiffs of the sixth century, the name of St. Gregory the Great occurs. In the annals of the biography of that exalted personage, no prejudice, however keen or envenomed, could discover aught, except what must be pronounced entitled to the highest admiration and praise. His instructions to St. Augustine, when sending him to labor for the conversion of England, breathe a saintly charity and zeal for the salvation of his neighbour, whilst, at the same time, they exhibit conspicuous proofs of his Christian moderation and prudence. When speaking of the sainted characters of the sixth century, the name of St. Benedict should not be forgotten. Born of noble parents, he, from his youth, devoted himself to the assiduous study of Christian perfection, and when mature in virtue, he sought by his example and instructions to allure others to regulate their lives by the rules, by which his own was always governed. These rules enjoined perpetual abstinence from flesh-meat, they set apart seven hours for manual labour and two for pious reading, besides a considerable portion of the night, for meditation on the Divine law. In Aikins Annual Review for 1802, we read the following splendid testimony of Gibbon in favor of the literary benefits conferred by the Benedictine Order on society.

"A single Benedictine Monastery, has produced more valuable works than both our Universities." "Notwithstanding the Codex of Dr. Kiplin, and the Septuagint of Dr. Holmes, notwithstanding Bampton Lectures and Seaton Prize poems; notwithstanding even the Strabo with which the Clarendon press has been thirty years parturient, the assertion of Gibbon remains true." Among the chief ecclesiastical events of the sixth century, the conversion of the Franks and that also of the Saxons are to be enumerated. In Africa, the Arian persecution which had raged for so long a time, was terminated, by the reduction of that territory by force of arms to the authority of Justinian. In Spain also, Arianism began to decay, in consequence of the conversion of King Leovigild to the Catholic Faith. Thus, in a few lines, we have briefly given an outline of the history of the leading personages and events of the sixth century, and in these, or in any other, which occurred at that period, not a vestige is to be found of the assumption of unlimited temporal authority by the Roman Pontiffs. Notwithstanding, we have seen how dogmatically, and as if it were one of those statements the truth of which was universally recognised, the assertion is advanced in Mangnall's Questions, that among the principal events of the sixth century, is to be numbered the assumption by the Popes, of unlimited temporal as well as spiritual authority.

We shall now adduce evidence to establish, that both previously and subsequently to the sixth century, the Roman Pontiffs often solemnly proclaimed, that, as successors of St. Peter, not only their power was purely spiritual, but also that the temporal power of Sovereigns was wholly independent of, and by no means subordinate to theirs. Before we proceed further, we may however remark, that, in the course of some centuries after the establishment of the Christian Church, and in consequence of the social and political state of the nations of Europe at that period, temporal power and possessions of great importance were, if we may so speak, superadded, by the concessions of states and Sovereigns, to the spiritual authority of the Roman Pontiff. The rights thus acquired, in some instances, rendered the Pope Lord Paramount of other Princes, and subjected these and their dominions, in various ways, to the interference of the accessory authority accidentally annexed to the dignity of the Pontiff. We have called the temporal power of the Pope accessory and accidental, because in reality, according to Catholic faith, it is wholly separable and distinct from the spiritual authority, which essentially belongs, in virtue of the institution of Christ, to the chief pastoral office confided to him. Like every thing of human origin, the Pope's temporal power is subject to unceasing fluctuation, and may in the course of events, altogether pass away; whilst the authority conferred on him, as the successor of Peter, will be ever the same, on account of the Divine source, whence it emanates. But as the right to temporal authority or possessions, when once acquired, is recognised and sanctioned by religion, the censures of the Church have been sometimes resorted to in order either to punish the unjust violator of such right, or to deter from the consummation of his crime the man, who openly threatened to perpetrate an injustice of that description. As the Pontiff deemed it due to society and justice to sustain in this way, from time to time, the rights of other Princes when wrongfully invaded, so he occasionally employed similar means to vindicate his own claims and prerogatives. If, in any particular instances, the bounds of moderation were hence transgressed, it may be stated in reply, that nothing can be deduced from such an occurrence, except, what experience shows to be very generally true with regard to human nature, viz., that in the hands of men, the abuse of power is too often found annexed to its rightful possession. We shall now refer to a portion of the positive and express evidence, which the history of the Pontiffs in the sixth, seventh and eighth centuries affords, in order to disprove conclusively the assertion, that the Popes, in the sixth century, assumed unlimited temporal power. The first authority, we shall quote, is that of Pope Gregory the Great, who, as he flourished at the close of the sixth century and in the early part of the seventh must be deemed a most important witness on the present occasion. During the Pontificate of Gregory, the Emperor Maurice enacted a law, which the Holy Pope judged to be grievously injurious to the free and perfect observance of the Gospel counsels. The Emperor sent a copy of the obnoxious enactment to Pope Gregory, with orders, that the Pontiff should have it duly promulgated. In answer to these instructions, the Pope thus replies to the letter of the Emperor "Being subject to your orders, I have caused the law to be transmitted to the different parts of the Empire; and as that law is by no means agreeable to the dictates of the law of God, I have also taken care to inform the most serene Lords of this circumstance. Thus in both ways have I fulfilled my duty, to the Emperor, by obeying his orders, and to God, by announcing the truth, which ought not to be concealed." Assuredly, these sentiments of the Holy and illustrious Pontiff are very unlike those, to which one who affected unlimited temporal power would give expression. In the eighth century, Pope Gregory the second, thus writes to the Iconoclast Emperor, Leo, who had issued an edict, ordering all the sacred images to be carried from the Churches to the market place, and there burnt, and all the paintings in the Churches to be effaced. "Our Churches" says the Holy Pontiff, "in their rude state are but the work of the builders, a rough fabric of stone, of wood, of brick, of lime and mortar. But within, they are adorned with rich paintings, with historical representations of Jesus Christ and his Saints. On these, the converted gentiles, the Neophytes, and children of the faithful, gaze with no less profit than delight. In these, they behold the mysteries of our religion displayed before their eyes; by these they are animated to the practice of virtue, and silently taught to raise their hearts and affections to God. But of these external helps to virtue and religious information, you have deprived the faithful, you have profanely stript the Churches of their sacred ornaments, which so much contributed to edify, to instruct and animate. In doing this, you have usurped a power, which God has not given to the sceptre. The Empire and the Priesthood have their respective powers, differing from each other in their use and object. As it belongs not to the Bishop to govern within the palace, and to distribute civil dignities, so it does not belong to the Emperor to command within the Church, or to assume a spiritual jurisdiction, which Christ has left solely to the ministers of his altar. Let each one of us move, and remain within the sphere, to which he is called as the Apostle admonishes."

PERSEVERANCE.

We are not virtuous by a few transitory acts of virtue. A man of blood may sometimes say, like Nero when signing a death-warrant; 'Would to God that I knew not how to write!'—and yet be far from being humane. An epicurean, like Mæcenas, might dine one day on a handful of figs and a morsel of bread, without being, therefore, temperate; in fine, an infidel, like Voltaire, may build a church and put his name on the front of it, without being more pious on that account! All these isolated actions do not constitute virtue, for virtue implies perseverance.

Perseverance is a chain which binds earth to heaven, and all whose links are gold. This chain must commence from the earliest youth.

Youth, indeed, is the season for laying the foundation of virtue; for then religion strikes deep root in the soul, and the Gospel seed produces a hundred fold. It is in the spring-time of life that we must plant good habits, that thus they may bear flowers in summer, and fruit in autumn.

Youth are naturally affectionate and sincere: they have a tear for suffering, and an alms for distress; they willingly bend before the altar, where their mothers pray; and when they hear tell of a good action, their heart beats at the sound of a trumpet. Yes, youth is good, and it is an awful thing to pervert it: it is the hope of religion and of our country.

It was by a youth spent in the practice of virtue and constant submission to duty, that St. Gregory of Nazianzum and St. Basil began their glorious career. They lived in Athens, that celebrated rendezvous of the students of the empire, like two swans, keeping themselves apart lest the snowy plumage of their wings should be sullied by contact with others. The hearts of these two young Christians were knit together by holy friendship; they lived, studied and prayed together. The same temperance, the same modesty, the same charity, the same ardent love for study, the same prudence in the arrangement of their time and in the selection of friends, distinguished them. Close by them would sometimes pass a young man of a sarcastic expression of countenance, with black and flowing hair, and precipitate step; he also frequented the church, but his disdainful lips moved not while he knelt. Gregory and Basil avoided him, although he made advances to them, and was surrounded by a court at Athens. "His smile is deceitful," Gregory would mournfully say to Basil; "his humour inconstant, his conversation loose, his friends dissolute; and I dread lest he conceal the heart of an apostate under the cloak of a philosopher. Wo to us, wo to the Holy Church, if ever he becomes emperor!" Such, however, was the case. The captious, capricious and fantastic student, subsequently reigned like a madman, and is known to posterity as Julian the apostate. Gregory and Basil, who persevered even unto death in the practice of the sublimest virtues, were two men of upright heart, two lights of the church; they are now honoured on our altars as friends of God.

All the great results of human art, which excite the wonder and admiration of men, are so many proofs of the irresistible power of perseverance. It was this that built the famous wall of China, hollowed Lake Mœris, raised the pyramids of Egypt, and hung the gardens of Babylon in the air:—it also, now-a-days, scoops out the canals which facilitate commerce, and traces the highways on the flattened summits of the mountains. A stone is little when compared to a cathedral; and yet this enormous mass, whose spires shoot up to the clouds, was constructed by hands which only put one stone at a time, but which continued this operation during ages. It is the same with the sciences; it is by perseveringly adding discovery, to discovery, that we have at length been enabled to measure the distance of the stars, and to sail, against wind and tide, on the moving surface of the ocean. Perseverance alone makes great things, great men, and great saints.

ABBE ORSINI.

MADRAS.—At Secunderabad, in the Apostolic Vicariate of Madras, five Heathens were recently instructed and baptized.

AVA MISSION.—Besides the ordination held as we have stated at Amarapoorah, the solemn ceremony of blessing the Church of St. Peter lately erected there also was celebrated. A Church was first built at Amarapoorah about three years ago, but the building was destroyed by an Earthquake. The edifice raised in its stead was last year destroyed by fire. For the present structure the Catholics of that city are indebted to the generosity of a great benefactor, to the Mission of Ava and Pegu. Besides the four Priests and two clerics who assisted at the ordination already described, there was also present the eldest son of the King of Birmah. It is stated, that the Prince was much pleased with the solemnity and grandeur of the Catholic worship. Bishop Ceretti confirmed several children of both sexes.

HYDERABAD.—In Hyderabad there are about five hundred Catholics. The city was lately visited for the first time, it was ever entered, if we so speak officially, by European Priests the Rev. Messrs. Murphy and Egan. These Clergymen were received with every demonstration of joy and gratitude by the resident Catholics.

I should suppose, Mr. Editor, that the perusal of the last quoted passage of St. Cyrill of Jerusalem, is sufficient to convince any sincere, unprejudiced mind, if he be a Protestant, that the Catholic tenet of Transubstantiation, was well known and professed in the fourth century, and consequently, was not introduced in the 9th or 12th, if he be a Catholic, if anxious to follow in matters of faith the beaten track of a venerable antiquity, that the sacred dogma under present discussion enjoys the most unexceptionable authority of the ancient Church to establish its truth. Hence I would certainly not be guilty of injustice to our adversaries, were I to content myself with this single testimony of the great Patriarch of Jerusalem to prove, that four hundred years after Christ the Church of God was, in matters relating to the Blessed Eucharist, quite as Catholic as undoubtedly she was at the time of the 4th Lateran Council, at the time of the Council of Trent, or in fact, as she is in our own days, during the happy reign of Gregory XVI. However, in order to shew, that St. Cyrill was in his times not the only advocate of Transubstantiation; to prove that the Churches of the West were as far from Calvinistic notions as those of the East, I will bring forward some more of the holy writers in those remote days, and among them first St. Hilary, the fervent and learned Bishop of Poitiers, the terror of the Arian heretics. Yet nobody need expect anything stronger, anything more convincing, anything more unexceptionable than the testimony of St. Cyrill. To wish for more would be indulging desires for things unreasonable, if not altogether impossible. The passage, Mr. Editor, to which I wish to call your readers attention occurs in St. Hilary's VIII. book de Trinitate. n. 13. Confuting the Arians, who in the spirit of modern Sacramentarians argued away the unity of nature, of substance between the Father and the Son, and substituted in its stead the mere union of will, he says: "Eos, qui inter Patrem et Filium voluntatis ingerunt unitatum, interrogo utrum ne per naturæ veritatem hodie Christus in nobis sit, an per concordiam voluntatis? Si enim vere Verbum caro factum est, et nos vere Verbum carnem cibo Dominico sumimus, quomodo non naturaliter manere in nobis existimandus est, qui et naturam carnis nostræ jam insepabilem sibi homo natus, assumpsit, et naturam carnis sic ad naturam æternitatis sub Sacramento communicandæ nobis carnis admiscuit? Which means: "I ask those, who assert, that between the Father and the Son there exists an unity (only) of the will, whether now a days Christ be within us by means of his true substance or by the concordance of his will? For if the Word truly has become flesh, and if in the Lord's Supper (cibo Dominico,) we receive truly the Word (made) flesh, how shall we not deem him to dwell in us substantially (naturaliter) who by being born man, has taken upon himself inseparably the substance (naturam) of our flesh, and who in the Sacrament of his body to be communicated to us, has in such a manner mingled the nature of flesh with the nature of eternity?" (viz. with his divine, eternal nature.) I am confident, Mr. Editor, you and any sensible person will agree with me in saying, that these few sentences of St. Hilary give John Calvin and our modern Sacramentarians the lie as flatly as it can be done. The latter assert, that Christ is in the Sacrament by faith, in the goodness and power of God I should suppose (which by the way seems as efficacious a means of bringing Christ into the Blessed Eucharist as an act of faith in the great resources and riches of the Indies made by the Governor General would prove for the filling up instantly of an empty treasury); on the contrary St. Hilary teaches that He is there by means of His true substance. Aye, he asserts this in such a manner as to shew at once, that the whole Christian world, even his adversaries not excepted, were aware of it, and believed it. Calvin and his adherents give out that the only good Christ does in their figurative Eucharist, consists in His bestowing graces and favours upon the consumers of commemorative bread and wine, or to speak in the terms of the Holy Bishop of Poitiers, in His according his good will to them; but the latter denies this positively, and insists upon what every school-boy in those days seems to have been aware of, viz. that Christ is in the Sacrament not by His good will towards the communicant, but by the true and natural substance of His flesh and blood. Indeed after this testimony of St. Hilary, I also may be allowed to ask our modern Church and faith-menders, those who assert that between Christ and the Blessed Sacrament there exists merely a sham-unity; what they think of the faith and teaching of ecclesiastical antiquity? St. Hilary and the fourth age were evidently not embued with the new-fangled notions of Geneva! They fought for the substance not for the figure, for the kernel, not for the shell. The very tendency of St. Hilary's argument against the Arians is convincing, that he and his times were as staunch believers in transubstantiation as I am, and the holy Catholic Church in our days. For by a comparison with the Blessed Eucharist he endeavours to shew his adversaries, that in the God-head there exists a union of substance between the Father and the Son. But how could he have succeeded in his attempt, nay, how could he have had the hardihood of venturing upon an attempt at exploding their figurative union in the God-head, with such a simile, in case he professed Calvin's figurative doctrines anent the Eucharist? Verily hereby he himself would have furnished his adversaries with arms against his own cause. They might have immediately retorted by saying, that as in the Eucharist Christ was only in figure, came to the Communicant only by faith; so His union to the Father was only a union in figure, by a concordance of His will. But the aim of the holy Father is higher. He evidently argues, that in the God-head there exists an unity of substance, because he says the only true substance in the Lord's Supper, is the Word made flesh, and thus He comes to unite Himself to us, to dwell within us substantially, (not by figure, not in emblem, not merely by His good will and favor). If this be not Transubstantiation, I wish to know, what is. The holy Father's intentions become yet more evident from what follows. "Quisquis ergo naturaliter Patrem in Christo negabit, neget prius naturaliter vel se in Christo, vel Christum sibi inesse." That is: "Whoever then will deny that the Father is substantially (natu- raliter) in Christ, must first deny that either he himself is substantially in Christ, or Christ in him." The which sentence being adapted to the different state of our present controversy, means as much as if he had said: "Whoever will deny Transubstantiation viz. that the true, substantial flesh and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ constitute the real substance of the Blessed Eucharist; must first deny, that God the Father is substantially in Christ, and Christ in the Father." This shews evidently, it was St. Hilary's opinion, that he who denied Transubstantiation, would very soon, and might as well deny the substantial unity in the Blessed Trinity. For, after having quoted those words of our Saviour: "I live by the Father; and who eats My flesh, the same also shall live by Me;" the Saint argues thus: "He lives then by the Father: and in the same manner in which He lives by the Father, we live by His flesh." Now if the Calvinistic notions about the Lord's Supper were true, it would, according to St. Hilary's reasoning, follow that as the supernatural life within us is not, in consequence of a substantial union of Christ's body with us in the Sacrament; so the divine life in Christ was within Him not by a substantial but a mere figurative unity with the Father; an assertion so heretical and damnable, as to contain the whole poison of Arianism. All this shews clearly, that were the adversaries of Transubstantiation, the defenders of a figurative Eucharist close reasoners, they would very soon become fervent Anti-Trinitarians, moving in the tracks of Arius and Socini.

Poona, September 8th, 1843.

The Right Rev. Doctor Whelan has returned to Bombay after having paid a visit to this large and interesting portion of the Diocese. It was the first time the Catholics of this district had the happiness of seeing amongst them a Roman Catholic Bishop, and the Irish Catholic Soldiers who amount to 700 besides their families, hailed with delight the presence of their Prelate who was also their countryman. On Sunday the 13th of August, his Lordship commenced Mass at 6½ o'clock. After the Gospel he preached an excellent and feeling Sermon to a crowded audience. The very earnest and effective manner in which his Lordship exhorted his Flock impressed his hearers with a high sense of the acquisition they have gained in his Lordship being placed over them. At the close of the Sermon his Lordship announced that he would be in attendance each day during the week to administer the Sacrament of Penance to all those who were anxious to receive the holy Sacrament of confirmation. On Tuesday morning, 22nd ult. at ¼ past 9 o'clock, the Bishop attired in his Pontificals with Mitre and Crozier, having taken his seat in front of the Altar, delivered an impressive address to those about to be confirmed, on the nature of the Sacrament and its effects upon those who receive it with the requisite dispositions. During the administration of the Sacrament, his Lordship was assisted by an Irish Clergyman, Rev. John Walsh, and the Rev. Mr. Lithos, the zealous pastor of the district. At the conclusion of the ceremony, those who had been confirmed were again addressed by his Lordship from the Altar seated as before, in a most solemn and dignified manner, on the duties and obligations of a Christian life. One hundred and seven, mostly adults, received confirmation the first day. It was truly edifying to witness the religious demeanour of the Native Christians, and the cleanly appearance of their children, who presented themselves for the reception of that sacred rite.

It is much to be regretted, that the military Chapel in Poona, in its present state, is entirely too small. The Catholic Soldiers who form a large portion of the congregation, are frequently obliged to march back to the barrack in the warm and monsoon season, as the Chapel is not sufficiently capacious to afford them shelter from the sun and rain. The Government, it is hoped, will take into consideration the indispensable necessity of a more extensive place of worship for the accommodation of those brave men who have gallantly fought the battles of their country.

On Wednesday morning 23rd ult. his Lordship accompanied by the Rev. John Walsh and Lieutenant Brennan, (under whose hospitable roof he has been staying since his arrival) proceeded to Kirkee, a military station seven miles from Poona, to dedicate a new Chapel, which, to the honour of the Catholic Soldiers be it recorded, was repaired and enlarged by their own voluntary contributions. At 10 o'clock the ceremony commenced by the Bishop presenting himself at the principal door of the edifice, vested in Pontificals, with his Mitre and Crozier. Having recited a prayer, he walked round the exterior of the Chapel, preceded by the clergy (and a number of young men of the Dragoon Regiment, the boys in surplices, the Cross and Acolythes) who chanted the Psalm 50th "Have mercy on me O God," while he sprinkled the outer walls of the building with holy water. Returning to the same entrance, the gates were thrown open, and his Lordship with the clergy entered the Church in solemn procession, singing the Litanies. At the conclusion of the Litany the Bishop and the Clergy walked round the interior of the building, sprinkling the walls both above and below with holy water, during which time the Choir chanted three beautiful Psalms, the 119th, 120th and 121st, after which the Bishop concluded the Dedication Service with a short Collect. The High Mass followed. After the Gospel his Lordship ascended the steps of the Altar, and preached on the respect due to places of worship, and alluded in beautiful and touching language to the nature of the ceremonies which had just been witnessed, and concluded the duties of the day by administering the Sacrament of Confirmation to some adults and children.

The consecration of a new Cemetery, (which is to be the future place of sepulture of the British Roman Catholics) took place on Tuesday Evening 29th ult. The Right Rev. Dr. Whelan was, on this occasion also, richly robed in his pontificals and assisted by his Chaplain; the Ceremony was of the most solemn and imposing nature, and excited the deepest interest among the hundreds of Soldiers and their wives, as well as Civilians assembled to witness it. The respected Prelate delivered a short but appropriate discourse on the Doctrine of Purgatory. During the delivery, a solemn stillness was observed to pervade the assembled hearers, glancing towards the conclusion of his address, at the occasion which had called them together.

It was a source of great edification to all, to witness the numbers who approached Holy Communion, on each of the four Sundays his Lordship celebrated Mass and exhorted his flock; and it is no less gratifying to know his Lordship had the consolation to receive some Protestants into the bosom of the Catholic Church, and these before he left were confirmed in their faith by administering to them the Sacrament of confirmation.

On Sunday the 3rd Sept. the venerable Prelate made his farewell sermon. The tender and heartfelt discourse delivered on this occasion by his Lordship elicited from a respectable Protestant the frank avowal that it was the best discourse which he had ever heard. His Lordship promised to repeat his visit in a short time, unless his health and other circumstances over which he had no control would oblige him to proceed to Europe. We trust his Lordship will be able to fulfill his promise, as his people will be ever glad to hear from him those instructions which were indeed highly creditable to him and of singular advantage to them.—Gentleman's Gazette, Sept. 14.

MOULMEIN.—A Catholic Priest, we have been informed, has been forbidden visiting the barracks where his flock is nearly half the number of the Regiment, while the American Baptist Ministers are publicly allowed, although they have not more than fifty or sixty disciples. We think that each sect ought to have fair play.—Chronicle, September 6.

But we have been hurried away from the subject more immediately before us, from that "ingenious device," which the right reverend prelate, maugre his love of truth and justice, has not scrupled to employ against us.

The society of the Jesuits, like all other institutions, is matter of history, and is a fair and open field for investigation. But when the most sweeping and crushing accusations are levelled against its members and its system, without even the ordeal of enquiry, and are presumed to be triumphantly established by the mere assertion, under the sanction of a great name, backed, it is true, by some long-exploded historical evidence, in the form of a very scanty appendix, we, whose peculiar and proper province it is to investigate before we pronounce, may perhaps find it more difficult than others quietly and confidently to acquiesce in the verdict, or rather to suppress our astonishment at such a course. Neither are we quite sure that in yielding to the temptation, the bishop's zeal has not outstripped his judgment; his object runs no small chance, we deem it of being frustrated in the outset—the fury of the blow often warps the aim—for the haste and heat with which the sentence of condemnation is here pronounced against the whole Society, savours too much of human passion not to lack somewhat of holy wisdom.

It is therefore much more to mark the character of the charge, than from any necessity of defending the Society from such attacks as these (to which indeed they must be as callous as they are familiar), that we have noted the circumstance at all; and by way of recommending to the learned prelate to be a little more cautious in future how he assails, with old rusty weapons, long since laid up in ordinary, and excluded from all legitimate warfare, men who are as much his superiors in Christian charity, as they are in theological learning; a society which alone has gained more converts to the faith of Christ than all the Protestant missionaries together; which has added so many illustrious saints to the calendar, whom Protestantism may emulate in vain; and which has given so many sons to science, and so many martyrs to the Church. It is indeed, to all intents and purposes, useless, as far as the generality of our readers are concerned, to say one word upon the matter. For others, the most lengthened disquisition that our space could afford would not suffice for the purpose. We shall therefore merely put it to the common sense of mankind, to say whether they deem it possible, that this celebrated society—consisting at its dissolution of twenty thousand individuals, certainly above the ordinary level in natural abilities, and very far indeed superior to it in moral and intellectual attainments, actively occupied in every portion of the world in the interests of science, religion, and humanity—could have been composed of materials such as the right rev. prelate has described? or, having been so constituted, and having consequently fallen under the weight of its own iniquity, and been utterly crushed and annihilated beneath the scorn, contempt, and indignation of outraged virtue, it should within the short space of a few years (its crimes still fresh in our memories) have again risen from its ashes, and already, in part, regained its former ascendancy in the religious and literary world?

That they who were regicides by principle should be again the fostered children of kings! that they whose moral code undermined morality, should be again the favourite directors of tender consciences, and the trustworthy instructors of youth! and that they who have once let in a flood of iniquity upon the world, should now be employed to stem it! All this is too monstrous for belief, unless it fall upon a true Bœotian intellect (which we cannot reconcile with the Attic sprightliness of the right rev. prelate's), or unless it find its sustenance amongst the dark but luxuriant shades of bigotry. Yet that such notions do now and then spring up innocently enough in the minds of some, from mere stupidity, or indifference to their truth, we will proceed to show, by an instance from which indeed the right rev. prelate may himself have taken example, and which deserves to be exposed and refuted, both on account of the better company in which it has chanced to find itself, and from the influence which, upon that title, it may exert over the ignorant or unwary. Even the respectable Ranke, a man who frequently sins through ignorance, but never, we verily believe, through malice, in his interesting History of the Popes of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries, has been strangely led into the expression of sentiments, relative to the Society, nearly approaching to those of the learned author of the charge. It may serve also as a warning even to the best of us, not to be carried away by hasty and superficial judgments, and as an example of how huge a superstructure may be raised upon the most flimsy foundation.

WEST INDIES.—Trinidad, March 1.—A splendid cathedral, of the second order of Gothic, has been lately erected. It is 240 feet in length, 120 feet in width in the transepts, and 80 feet in height to the ridge of the roof. It has cost about 50,000*l.* sterling, 16,000*l.* of which were munificently contributed by the Government, besides granting the permission to take, from the Government quarry, all the stones necessary for the walls; and to cut, on crown lands, all the cedar and other timber required for the roof and the interior decorations of the sacred edifice. A suitable college and a large and commodious convent have been established, which are doing incalculable good. The religious ladies are now educating about 250 pupils in their boarding-school, day-school, and poor-school; there is nearly an equal number in the college and poor boy's school. Since 1828, 19 new churches, 22 new chapels, and several new school-houses have been built; there are, at present, six new churches and chapels building. The progress made, in a spiritual point of view, on the Trinidad mission is still far more consolatory.

On Friday and Saturday last, his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam conferred the order of Sub-deacon and Deaconship on Rev. Messrs. M'Girr, O'Malley and O'Reilly;—and on Sunday last the order of Priesthood on the Rev. Messrs. M'Girr and O'Reilly—the former for Calcutta, and the latter for the Diocese of Kilmore.

THE IRISH PROTESTANT CHURCH.

The old fable of the Sibyl's leaves conveys a deep lesson of political wisdom which our modern statesmen would do well to remember. It is dangerous to deny a just demand. When an applicant comes to you with a claim founded in God's eternal justice, you may put him off, you may bully him into reluctant silence, you may baffle him by a special pleading chicanery, but as surely as you do so, so surely have you, in the long run, to pay him with accumulating interest and full costs of suit.

These reflections are forcibly suggested to our mind by the present position of the Protestant Church establishment in Ireland. The attempt to thrust the Protestant religion down the throats of Catholic Ireland at the point of the bayonet, is a crying injustice. Argue about it as you like, the plain positive precept "Do unto others as you would be done by" brands with condemnation the attempt to devote the whole revenues of a country applicable to religious purposes, to the exclusive support of the religion of the minority of 800,000 out of 8,000,000. Nor are the reasons assigned for the perpetuation of this injustice in less obvious and glaring contradiction with the first principles of Protestantism and with the genuine spirit of Christianity. We are told that the Protestant church must be maintained in Ireland, as a citadel in the midst of a disaffected population—as a political instrument—like the police, the yeomanry, or the fortifications of Dublin Castle, to forward a political end—the forcible maintenance of the Orange aristocracy and the repression of the Catholics. The ministers of peace are degraded into special constables, and the propagation of the reformed faith is advocated on precisely the same grounds as the passing of an Arms Act, or the despatch of a squadron of observation to the Cove of Cork. The whole thing is too scandalous, too completely indefensible to admit of argument, and least of all to claim support from the true friends and members of the Church of England—a church whose honourable distinction it has always been to repudiate all high Romish ideas of infallibility, all puritanical excesses of fanaticism, and to unite, in a special degree, the mild, tolerant and comprehensive maxims of Christianity, with the precepts of common sense, humanity and moderation.

Accordingly, when Catholicism had practically ceased to be a badge of attachment to the Stuarts and of hostility to the reigning family and institutions of England, the only reasonable, because the only right course, would have been to proclaim frankly the civil equality of the Irish Catholics. Had this been done, even so late as at the period of the union, it is probable that the Catholics would have accepted the concession gratefully, and would not have been disposed to give a hard bargain at the expense of the Irish Church. But, no! the concession of Catholic emancipation was delayed until it had ceased to be a concession, until it was obviously, in the eyes of the poorest peasant of Connaught or Clare, a measure extorted from the fears of the British Government by the menace of insurrection. Even then, however, it is probable that Catholic Ireland would have been contented if some provision had been made for the priests, and if a few more glaring abuses connected with the Protestant establishment had been gradually suppressed. But, no! the Sibyl's leaf was again rejected.

Then came the appropriation clause. The Sibyl had now raised her price, and the suppression of all savings which did not afford a sufficient Protestant congregation was the return demanded for Catholic allegiance. Once more the Parliament of England, in its infatuation, rejected the proffered terms. And, now! what will be the Sibyl's next offer? We do not ask you to read it in O'Connell's speeches, in the demands of the repeal agitation, but look at the parliamentary debates of the last week—look at the language of such a moderate aristocratic whig as Lord Howick—of such an honest, plain-spoken Conservative as Captain Rous, and then tell us how many years' purchase you think the life of the Protestant Church Establishment of Ireland is, at this moment, worth? Do you believe the faint assertion with which the trembling occupiers of the Treasury benches try to keep up their spirits—that the people of England will never allow the Irish Church to be touched—that the people of England will fight rather than allow an unhallowed hand to be stretched out against the ark of the establishment? We tell you, no! they will not fight in any such quarrel; and you, yes, you, Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, who make this assertion, know this in your inmost hearts as well as we do. They would fight if any one attacked their own church, the venerable, time honoured, Church of England, but they will not fight, and, what is more, they will not allow you to fight, to support a thing so revolting to their Christian feelings, their sense of justice, and their common sense, as the system which disgraces the name of Protestant ascendancy in Ireland.

It is a libel on the people of England to say that it is their bigotry which insists on thrusting the creed of 800,000 upon the consciences of the 8,000,000. It is a still greater libel on the Church of England to say, as the Tories have dared to say, that her existence depends on bayonets, that her existence hangs by the precarious thread of the maintenance of the Irish establishment, that her existence has so little root in the affections of the people of England that she will be blown over by the mere concussion of the air caused by the fall of the rotten tree of injustice and oppression in Ireland.—Atlas, July 15.

A MODERN MARTYR.

The Universe gives the following account of the martyrdom of Mr. Borie, the missionary at Tongking, in China:—"When surprised by the soldiers who went to arrest him he rose, and, like the Saviour, asked them, 'Whom seek ye?' They were for the moment struck dumb by his majestic countenance and stature. When put in iron the confessor took advantage of the eagerness shown by the people to visit him to deliver freely to them the words of eternal life. This he did with so much mildness, that the Pagans said one to another, 'This master has truly a heart made to teach religion; if hereafter he is willing to instruct us we will embrace his doctrine.' His execution was horrifying. The executioner, who was half drunk, scarcely knew what he was about. It required seven strokes before the sanguinary work was finished, during which the priest did not utter a single cry. It is said that the Pagans went to his grave and offered victims upon it, as if he were a tutelary genius. Six months after his interment his body was found entire and fresh, without the least cadaverous odour."—Examiner, July 20.

THE DEATH OF BISHOP BAINES.

We can hardly tell how to express the feelings of dismay and sorrow with which, only two or three hours after the dismal tidings have reached us, we sit down to write these almost shocking words—"the death of Bishop Baines." The simple fact, and all the material circumstances immediately attending it, as they have yet reached us, are communicated in a few words. The good bishop appeared on Wednesday in his ordinary health, which, however, has been—as is well known—a good deal shaken of late. On the day previous he had presided at the annual exhibition of studies at Prior Park College. On Wednesday he was at Bristol, presiding at the opening of the new church. On that day, according to our informant, he "delivered a magnificent sermon." The next morning he was found in his bed a corpse, and had then apparently been dead some hours. These are all the particulars that have yet reached us with any certainty.

Such is the sad fact; what can we add in the way of comment? Alas, our poor language is powerless at any time, and at the present moment we feel too oppressed by the severity of the blow to know how to add anything. The lips that could speak are still, and the eloquent tongue is now silent for ever. God has visited him; has seen his works; has numbered his days; has closed his account; has ended his earthly toils; has called him to the reward of his labours. The hand of God has done it. It is not for us to complain, but to profit by the awful lesson. God took him suddenly, but not, we reverently and (if we may say so) affectionately trust, unprepared or unrepentant. Which of us can be fit to stand before God if we is weighed in the balance and found wanting? Which of us dare hope for good if HIS name is not written in the book of life? He has been taken, not full of years, but full of labours. The Master who hired him has come into the field, and has seen His servant not loitering, nor withdrawing himself from the scorching heat of the noon-day sun, nor leaving his work to be performed by others. He has found him with the sickle in his hand among the reapers, labouring stroke for stroke with the young men over whom he was appointed keeper, and cheering them with his voice and by his deeds. He was found not trimly fashioned for the feast, but with his loins girt up to toil, and the sweat of labour upon his brow. He had not wrapped up his talent in a napkin, nor had he buried it in the earth; but he was busy in the haunts of spiritual industry, putting out his ten talents to an effective usury, and bending all the powers of his soul to increase the profits of the capital with which his God had entrusted him. In one sense he was not full of years, that is, he did not reach to old age; but worn with toil, harassed with disappointment, and shaken by disease, his soul was as full as ever of the generous impulses which in the life of the wicked are confined to youth, but in that of the good are in youth only in their youth, swell more lustily as the soul grows older, and attain their full vigor only when the heart of the worldling has become dead, callous, and hard as the sea-worn rock. With the prospect of death imminent before him, with the sanguine temperament of genius, as of Faith, he was planning new schemes for the management of his diocese, and entering upon a new sphere of labour and of perseverance which would have dismayed men of a less ripe age, and with prospects of a far longer life. In mercy God permitted him the merit of spending himself to the last in His service, and of generously undertaking what for our sins He would not allow him to bring to a conclusion. He has sown the seed; to whom will the Almighty give it to come after him and water, so that the bounty of Heaven may give an increase? Quid est homo quia magnificas eum? Aut quid apponis erga eum cor tuum? Visitas eum diluculo et subito probus eum. "What is a man that thou shouldest magnify him? or why dost thou set thy heart upon him? Thou visitest him early in morning, and thou provest him suddenly."

We have said above, that to record the death of Bishop Baines is "almost shocking." Perhaps the phrase is one not very fit to be used when speaking of any of God's merciful dispensations; but, indeed, we used it as the only phrase that occurred to us adequately expressive of our first feeling on this sad occasion. There are many hundreds, we dare say, who knew the deceased prelate far better than we did. There must be hundreds, not to say thousands, of our readers who are far better qualified to speak of his public career. To those who knew him intimately, to those who have had better opportunities of knowing and have better capacities of judging him, we leave it to speak more fittingly than we can do, both of his public and his private character. But even we have our humble department in this matter. We, too, know something of this most lamented prelate's excellencies, and, well or ill, we have presumed to form some opinion of the nature of the loss we have just sustained. It needs no very profound acquaintance with the religious condition of this country, the state of the Catholic body, its defects and its merits, to understand how completely Bishop Baines was adapted to encounter the present exigencies. We say, then, that the news of his death was shocking, because, speaking only on public grounds, we could not have been more deeply wounded or shocked by the announcement of hundreds of common deaths. There are times—nay, it is true in all times—that when great things are to be achieved the man outweighs the million in importance. No one could be in Bishop Baines's company for a quarter of an hour without seeing that he was emphatically "A MAN;" a man of high heart, robust and masculine understanding; a dignity at once majestic and homely—that is, wholly free from the least shadow of littleness or affectation—full of good sense, directness of purpose, lofty courage, a penetration before which meaner natures quailed, and a cheerful and sportive humour, which often in words seemingly unstudied, half jest and half earnest, sent forth utterances of singular and profound wisdom. His manner, like his mind, was peculiarly artless. In his most careless conversation, as well as in his more studied discourses and in his writings, his words dropped from him sweet as honey, and soft as a stream of oil; and yet nothing that he said or wrote ever smelt of the lamp. He was graceful and beautiful in discourse, because it was his nature to be so, and he could only, have become otherwise by affectation and effort; and yet this grace was rendered even more piquant and attractive by a certain genial homeliness, which took from it every appearance of effeminacy; and woe to those, who, mistaking the glass-like smoothness of his weapon, presumed to trifle with its edge. It was essentially a manly grace; not an outward trick of manner, but the unstudied effusion of the heart; and accompanied by a certain child-like simplicity, and unpretending wisdom, that made honest men, even if they were at odds with him, to reverence him, and pay him the tribute of their unsuspected praise. His disposition was kindness itself;—ardent and occasionally hasty, but placable at a word, without a trace of malice or ill-will. He was prompt, as most of our readers know—and as we know in particular—to administer reproof where it was deserved and needed. But as he gave his advice and admonition with the frankness of one who means well and fears no misconstruction, so he was ready to receive with a like frankness, and an unconscious humility, all suggestions and advice that seemed to issue from a good, even if an ill-placed, intention. To come back to our old expression, he was essentially a “man”—well-proportioned, great, active, and born for high achievements. It may seem presumptuous in us to pretend to describe this illustrious person's character, however clumsily, yet with any pretension to precision; but, with one or two exceptions, in which we have been guided by what we consider sure authority, we have here set down nothing which is not drawn from the image of him in our own minds conveyed there in a very brief and compendious manner. There are some persons whom you seem to know more intimately in a quarter of an hour than you do others after years of acquaintance. And so it was with Dr. Baines. Great as he was, an humble visitor seemed to see him and understand him at once, and that precisely because he was great, simple, natural. We leave it to those who had better opportunities to reprove us if we have at all overstepped the mark, or dishonoured his memory by painting from fancy, while we intended to sketch from our recollection of nature.

But all this while, the pleasure of dwelling upon the lights of so great a character, has withdrawn us from our main topic, which is the public reason we have to lament his loss. That loss, if we may speak of such a matter after the manner of men, seems at first sight almost irreparable. It is not, to be sure, for us to take upon us to decide on the comparative merits of dignitaries of the Church, nor are we going to provoke comparisons of any kind. We speak of Dr. Baines in his own sphere only, and we say that, whoever his colleagues, at no time could such a man be let go without a loss. Of him it may emphatically be said that he understood the time and the men by whom he was surrounded. Few men had a deeper insight than he into the miseries of our present social state, into the causes of this corruption, and into the true methods of its removal. In our humble judgment, too, he well understood the Catholic body, and was admirably fitted to be their leader, because while he was sanguine as to the success of great designs well conceived, no one was a more determined enemy of that shallow prattling enthusiasm, which in a sickly imagination seizes hold of results before it has thought of the means by which they are to be realized. He was confident, but wary and wise at the same time. He was learned, but not a pedant; and he saw more deeply into men than any pedant ever saw into his books. Judge whether we can do otherwise than sorrow for the loss of such a prelate. His very last days, perhaps his last moments, were spent in devising means for placing his Western Vicariate on a sounder basis than ever. His lordship condescended to put himself into communication with us on the subject in accordance with the views stated in his last published letter. We were honoured with a private letter from him written on Sunday, and we were to receive for this week's TABLET, a second letter in continuation of the one published last week. The private letter, connected as it is with those views to which we have ventured to attach so much importance, and for the success of which we dared to form such large hopes from his lordship's earnest and energetic support, we consider as a most valuable relic. Oh, would that he had lived! With his influence, courage, zeal, wisdom, what might he not have accomplished! It is idle to talk about what one would do, or be willing to do; but it is not idle as expressing the honest feelings of our heart and understanding at this moment to say, with tears in our eyes, that we feel as if it would have been a joy and a delight to die ten times over so that he might have lived for ten years more. But, alas! God has otherwise decreed by a wisdom at which it would be profane to murmur. And for us the survivors, standing here disconsolate on the banks of a mighty river which we know not how to cross, and of which we have as yet been unable to part the waters—what remains but to watch him in imagination as he is carried upwards by the chariot of fire and horses of fire, and, with a deep feeling of gratitude, and an earnest hope that upon some one of our priesthood along with his mantle a double portion of his spirit may have fallen, to cry aloud, like the servant of the prophet Elias, “my Father, my Father the Chariot of Israel and the Driver thereof.”

We can say nothing, in conclusion, more fitting than to beseech “by the bowels of Christ,” all those who may hear of his lamented death, and have at heart the conversion of England, to offer up, at the very least, a short prayer for the soul of Peter Augustine Baines. May God have mercy on his soul; and may he not forget us when he comes to the perfect fruition of everlasting bliss—Tablet, July 8.

CAN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH CREATE NEW ARTICLES OF FAITH?

To the Honorable W. H. G.

DEAR SIR,—You need not, I assure you, offer the smallest apology for intruding on me (as you express it), as it affords me infinite pleasure at all times to impart to you any little information which I may possess on a subject which you seem to have so much at heart, viz:—the doctrines of the Catholic Church. No man admires these noble feelings which actuate you more than I do. You ask me, “Can the Catholic Church create new articles of faith?” To which I answer, most assuredly not. The ministry of the church does not invent her articles of belief, for articles of faith rest upon infallibility; we ought steadfastly to adhere to the church “the ground and pillar of truth.” The church has the power to propose all articles of faith. She could not uphold her authority without the exercise of this right; therefore, when she proposes them, we are bound to submit and to believe; and our obedience is reasonable, for an article of faith is a manifestation of a verity which Jesus Christ has revealed, and which the Church, by means of her infallibility, proposes to our credence, informing us, at the same time, that obstinacy in resisting it places us out of the way of salvation. The Catholic and apostolic church does not create at her pleasure new dogmas of faith, she proposes nothing new, she cannot do it; her sacred mission is no more extended than that of the apostles, who were sent for no other purpose than to propagate throughout the whole world the great truths of the Gospel, and what they had learned from Jesus Christ. The church is not the author, of them; she propagates religion and transmits it. It is, therefore, requisite that the dogmas which she proposes must ever have been taught by the church, and that we can trace them up through every century, even to the very time of the apostles. It may sometimes happen that many dogmas have been less developed than others: according to circumstances: for example,—a dogma which is attacked by an heretic must be explained in a more lengthened manner than other verities which have never been openly assailed; the church, consequently, is obliged, in order to extirpate this error, to propose and explain more clearly the dogmas connected with that one which they wish to destroy. But, once more,—the church only explains and develops the verities which she has received as a sacred deposit from God; and I assert here, without fear of contradiction, that the church only can make us acquainted with the revealed dogmas, and thus give to our belief a motive as certain as the word of God itself, viz:—that of her infallibility. If the church should say, believe because reason establishes those dogmas which I propose to you, faith here would be as changeable as the foundation on which it would rest; we never could be certain of what we ought to believe, and this uncertainty would completely destroy faith which is a firm assent to a revealed verity. It is requisite, therefore, that the motive of this assent should be the absolute certainty that God has spoken it. And this certainty, which cannot have reason for the motive, must rest on infallibility. In determining an article of faith the church distinguishes that which is only of opinion and which may be defended and attacked at pleasure, without contradicting the church, and even that which is certain, but not defined. We call defined all the dogmas which the church proposes to our credence under the penalty of anathema. We ought to believe all the dogmas of religion, although they be not all recommended to the explicit belief of Christians. We make a general act or profession of faith that we believe all that has been revealed, but the church alone can distinguish what has been revealed from what has not, and she alone has the right to propose to our belief particular dogmas. An eminent French theologian truly says:—Il n'y a pour loys d'articles de foi que ceux que l'Eglise presente comme tels. Il n'est permis a qui ce soit d'aller plus loin; all should rest with perfect confidence on her infallibility. But if we must consider only as articles of faith those which are proposed by the church as such, we cannot refuse believing those which she presents us without bringing down on our heads her anathemas, with which she strikes all heretics and schismatics. Those who brave these anathemas have always been looked on as schismatics and heretics: schismatics when they refuse to submit to the pope, the successor of St. Peter, and to acknowledge him as the head of the church; heretics when they refuse to believe any dogma which has been proposed by the church as an article of faith. Lastly, heresy is always joined to schism, and vice versâ.* In my next letter I will point out to your consideration those dogmas which the church presents to our belief under the penalty of anathema, if refused to be believed by any of her children. In fine, my dear friend, if you will permit me to address you in these familiar terms, I shall clearly show you in the course of the letters which I shall have the honour of addressing to you, and at your earnest request (as I have been the humble instrument in the hands of God of bringing your excellent uncle into the bosom of the Catholic church), that, take away the infallibility of the church and the supremacy of the pope, the Christian religion has not a leg to stand on. As to the church of England, I have clearly shewn in my letters to the Rev. Mr. Palmer, of Worcester College, Oxford, that she is nothing more nor less than an heretical and schismatical church, the mere creature of human invention. As to the infallibility of the church, I refer you to my fifth letter addressed to the same reverend gentlemen, and to my forthcoming work on the supremacy of the popes, dedicated to the present illustrious pontiff who occupies the chair of St. Peter. I have demonstratively shewn that the whole foundation of the Christian religion rests upon these two great dogmas of faith, viz:—the infallibility of the church, and the supremacy of the popes.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours most truly,
VERAX,
A CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

CHARNWOOD FOREST, LEICESTERSHIRE.

On last Tuesday week was celebrated the feast of our glorious Protomartyr of the British Church, St. Alban, his festival having been this year transferred to that day in consequence of a higher festival falling upon the one which is otherwise set apart by the Church of England for that sacred purpose. A more auspicious one could hardly have been selected for the solemn service, of which we now lay before our readers a slight sketch; for it is with deep and mysterious reason that the Church connects the memory of her triumphs with that of her trials: from the day on which our Lord purchased the redemption of His people by the death of the Cross, every local and partial blessing communicated to His Church may, in a secondary sense at least, be attributed to the sufferings and deaths of His Holy Martyrs, by means of which (that is, through their intercessory efficacy) the all-availing merits of Christ's atonement are applied for the special wants of his Spouse, the Church. Thus, in early times, devout men attributed the conversion of Constantine, and the cessation of fierce persecution on the part of the Secular Roman Empire, to the prayers and sufferings of the martyrs in the tenth general persecution, under Dioclesian, and especially to those of that illustrious Martyr,

* He who denies the pope to be the head of the Church, denies an article of faith; and he who denies any one article of faith, denies consequently the authority of the pope and of the ministry of the Church.

St. Laurence, the famous Archdeacon of the Roman Church. It was, then, a thought full of sweet consolation, that on Tuesday last, when we celebrated the memory of St. Alban's Passion, we should be employed likewise in laying the foundation-stone of the first Abbey Church built in England since the sacrilege of Henry VIII. May that blessed Martyr of our English Church, amid all the glory and the joys which he now unceasingly possesses before the throne of God, be mindful of his fellow-servants here on earth, who are still struggling in behalf of that same undying cause for which he shed his blood, and for the triumphs of which he doubtless now prays in Heaven! St. Bernard's Abbey is situated in a retired valley, almost entirely surrounded by rocks, in the heart of the Charnwood hills, in Leicestershire. The Abbey itself was finished last year, and on Tuesday last the foundation-stone was solemnly laid by the Prior, according to the form prescribed in the Cistercian Ritual. There was a vast concourse of people who had come thither from the neighbouring villages at the foot of the hills: their number was variously estimated, between two and three thousand. The ceremony commenced with a procession from the chapel of the present dwelling of the Monks: at the head of it walked the cross-bearer of St. Mary's, Grace-Dieu Manor, bearing the processional cross of that parish, with acolythes carrying lighted tapers on each side, all three in surplices; then the children of St. Aloysius' school, Grace-Dieu, dressed in uniform, both boys and girls, to the number of 110; after them followed a man in a surplice, carrying a banner, on which were embroidered the images of the Apostles SS. Peter and Paul; then the boys belonging to the schools at Loughborough and Sheppeshed, dressed in black cassocks, with red sashes and caps; then the girls of the same schools, dressed also in uniform; next, a man belonging to the Catholic Guild of Loughborough, dressed in the white Italian Guild dress, with a blue tippet, carrying a large crucifix, and followed by the Brethren of the Guild, in the same dress, two and two; then the choirs of St. Mary's, Grace-Dieu Manor, of Holy Cross Chapel, Whitwick, and of St. Winefride's Chapel at Sheppeshed, in surplices, each choir being preceded by a processional cross, borne between acolythes carrying lighted tapers; after these followed the Cistercian monks, two and two—first, the lay brethren in brown habits, and then the choir monks in white habits; the ecclesiastical part of the procession was closed by several priests in surplices and copes; and last of all, the Father Prior, in his white habit, over which he wore an alb and cope. A great body of Catholics followed the procession in a similar order. The distance from the old building to the new abbey is nearly half a mile, and as the procession moved from the old chapel to the site of the new one, the Litany of Jesus was solemnly sung. Nothing could be more striking or devotional than the effect of that solemn chaunt, in which were blended together the voices of so many hundreds both of old and young, echoing amongst those wild granite rocks. A wooden cross had been erected on the spot where the stone was to be laid, and as soon as the clergy reached it the service commenced. It was chaunted throughout by the Cistercians, who stood in a group round a large wooden lectern, which was placed to support the ritual, from which they intoned the various psalms and antiphons prescribed for the occasion. The service was very nearly the same as that ordered in the Roman Pontifical, prayers, psalms, and antiphons being precisely similar, and the only difference consisting in the Litany of the Saints, in which many Saints of the Cistercian order, illustrious in the calendars both of the Gallican and English Churches, were invoked. Towards the conclusion of the service the sublime hymn of the Holy Ghost, the "Veni Creator," was most delightfully sung, the monks following the exquisite old Gregorian melody in the eighth tone, which we may say has never been rivalled in point of majesty and sweetness by any other composition. After this, Father Bernard, the Prior, chaunted the concluding collects and prayers. The solemn service finished, a most powerful and eloquent sermon was preached by the Honourable and Rev. George Spencer, Dean of Oscott. We never heard a sermon which more completely thrilled through our whole soul. The preacher took for his text the description of the foundation of the Second Temple, given in the book of Esdras, drawing a beautiful picture between the condition of our English Catholic Church just emerging from a persecution of three centuries, and that of that ancient people of God when restored to, the promised land after the Babylonian captivity. He showed, however, and with great force and justice, that though the parallel was distinct and clear in the great fact of the rebuilding of God's House in both cases, yet we were to look forwards, in the case of England's return to Catholic unity, to a still grander development of our holy religion amongst us than had ever been witnessed by our forefathers: so that in laying here and there up and down the country, the foundations of our churches, we need not, like the Jews, weep in comparing their smaller dimensions with those of the old cathedrals and abbeys, but rather looking forwards to the bright prospect held out to the Church's view in the prophecies of Holy Writ, we should console ourselves with the anticipation that one day England would do far more for God's glory than she had ever before done even in the brightest period of her past Catholic history. The preacher adverted in glowing and eloquent language, which appeared as though kindled by an Angel of God, to the glorious fact that all Christendom was now praying for England; and he called upon his Catholic hearers to join in this universal prayer. He further encouraged us by describing the triumphant progress of our Holy Catholic Faith all over the world at the present day; and he urged us by a holy and blameless life, united with much mortification and constant prayer, to hasten the blessed period, which it appeared that the Almighty held in store for His Church. After the sermon, the procession returned as it had come, singing devout chaunts until it reached the old church, where we all returned thanks to God for the mercies of that happy day. The Cistercians then dispensed, with liberality worthy of their famous order, plenty of good cheer to the numerous poor who had come to the abbey, and the more distinguished portion of their guests were hospitably entertained in the guest apartment; after which all returned home deeply animated by a holy scene, which no one who witnessed it can ever forget.—A. L. P.—Grace-Dieu Manor, Feast of the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.—Tablet, July 15.

AN ORANGEMAN BUYING A HORSE.

Rapturous applause followed this, and sundry loyal speeches, toasts, and songs; till the harmony of the night was disturbed by loud and angry words, portentous of a brawl, at the lower end of the table, which was principally occupied by yeomanry and fox-hunters in full costume; a certain Lieutenant Droughtnot, of the Yeoman Guard, and Buck Mahone, of sporting notoriety, having differed in opinion concerning the qualifications of their horses. But peace being restored by the timely interference of our host, Buck Mahone was heard to declare, that, upon his veracity, there was no speaking to Lieutenant Droughtnot ever since he took the priest's horse: and this sally really recalled Droughtnot's complacency.

"I bought the horse fairly on the high-way."

"You brought him with the penal code in your fist," replied Mahone. "Come, tell us how you served the priest."

"I served him as he ought to be served," replied Droughtnot. "I meet him returning from the fair on the black horse. 'Good evening, your reverence,' said I; 'that's a good beast you have under you.' 'He is not indifferent,' said he. 'Where did you get him?' said I. 'Up the country,' said he. 'I'll warrant he has a leap in him,' said I; 'try him at this wall by the roadside.' 'I am not inclined,' said he, 'though they say he has followed the hounds before now.' 'Let me try him for your reverence,' said I. 'And welcome,' said he. Down he got, and up I got on the black horse; leaped him over the wall, gave him the heels, and galloped him round the fields till I found he was all right, and then rode back to the priest again. 'Well, how do you like him?' said he. 'Will you sell him?' said I. 'Indeed I will not,' said he; 'I refused fifty pounds twice this blessed day for him; so cross the wall again, and let me be going home.' 'You are at the wrong side of the wall,' said I. 'How is that?' said he. 'Hold out your hand,' said I, 'here is five pounds for your horse.' Well, he refused to take the money; till I told him I had the law upon my side. 'You may have the law,' said he, 'but you have not the equity.' But to put an end to this talk, I dismounted, ungirthed the saddle, put five pounds under the skirt, and threw it over the wall into his face. 'There, Father Toole,' says I, 'you have both the law and equity, and plain dealing into the bargain: so good night to your reverence.'"

"Bravo! well done, Droughtnot!" echoed on every side; while his quondam companions drank his health amidst cheers and laughter.—Oak Leigh.

MISCELLANEA.

RETURNS FROM ROME—The Rev. John Ferrell, C. C., of SS Michael and John's, Dublin, who had been for the preceding eleven months from Dublin, on a visit to the Eternal City, returned on Saturday morning last in improved health.

CATHOLIC ITALIAN SCHOOL.—Last week a dinner, in aid of the above excellent establishment, at Hatton-wall, took place at the Globe, Hatton-garden. Mr. Della Torre, of Lamb's Conduit-street, was in the chair. After the usual loyal toasts had been respectfully received, the Chairman stated that the King of Sardinia had sent a check for 20*l.* for the school, through the Rev. Dr. Baldaconi. (Loud cheers). He begged, therefore, to propose "the health of his Majesty." (Drunk with enthusiasm). The chairman next observed, that the absence from London of the Rev. Dr. Baldaconi was a matter of deep regret to his Italian and other friends. (Hear, hear) That rev. gentleman was the founder and patron of the Italian school, and he had always taken a lively interest in its welfare. He (the chairman) was happy to be able to state that the Rev. Dr. Baldaconi would shortly return to London. He begged to propose the "health of Dr. Baldaconi, and success to the Italian schools of Hatton-wall." The toast was most cordially responded to. Mr. White (the son of Dr. White, of Lamb's Conduit-street) then rose to make an appeal on behalf of the charity. He dilated on the importance of having a school for the numerous poor Catholic Italians in London; on the great exertions of Dr. Baldaconi, of the committee, and of its worthy president (Mr. Della Torre), in behalf of that establishment, and, as a proof of the progress of its pupils, stated that one Italian boy, who could not write when he entered the school, was able, after two months, to send home a letter to his parents in Italy. Mr. White concluded a very neat and appropriate address (which want of space compels us to abridge) amidst general cheers. The collection, including annual subscriptions, amounted to nearly 40*l.* The next toast was, "Our Protestant friends," which was acknowledged by Mr. Moore in a feeling address. Mr. J. Keane, in deservedly complimentary terms, proposed "the health of the Chairman," which was drunk with all the honours. "The Catholic Press," and other toasts followed. Several Italian and English songs were admirably sung during the evening, by M. Negriti, &c. The company separated highly delighted with the proceedings of the evening.

BELGIUM.

CHILDREN OF CHINA.—The following is from the Journal de Bruxelles of the 8th:—Yesterday (Friday) Mgr. Forbin-Janson, Bishop of Nancy, preached again in the church of the Friars Minors, as he had promised on the previous day; the auditory was still more numerous than before. The venerable prelate showed how much Christianity has ameliorated the lot of children. Among the greater number of the nations of antiquity, the father had the power of life and death over his offspring; in some cases the law ordained the death of those who were born with weak constitutions. Among the modern nations whom the Gospel has not yet enlightened, the same barbarism still prevails. Law, manners, customs, even the very hearts of parents are pitiless of the life of infancy. Thus, in China, at the present moment, thousands of innocent creatures perish every year in the waters, or by exposure where they become the prey of beasts. For a long period has Christian charity been struggling to soften this odious barbarism, or to neutralize its effects; and never has opportunity presented itself so favourable as at present—the coasts of China are no longer closed against Europeans. A project has been formed to collect, or to purchase up all the infants whom the indifference of families would sacrifice, to educate them in the neighbourhood of that vast empire, and at length to send them back into their own land Christians, missionaries, the friends of European civilization. Mgr. Fobin-Janson is the zealous propagator of this noble work. Since May last, an association for the purpose has existed in France, and the pious prelate expressed his hopes that the Belgians, renowned for their attachment of the faith, would gather in crowds to labour in the work of the "Holy Infancy." A spirited subscription of one sou will form a collection large enough to pay the emissaries, Christian and Chinese, who are to gather up and purchase these poor infant outcasts, and to deposit them safely in the arms of Christian charity, which will watch over them night and day.

CHINA.

Three priests of the Society of Foreign Missions embarked at Bordeaux on the 1st of July, two for Cochin-China, and the third for Macao, thence to be dispatched where most needed.

ALGIERS.

In the States of Algiers are forty-two churches or chapels, three convents of the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, two of the Trinitarians, two of the Sacred Heart, one of the Good Shepherd, one of the Sisters of Providence, of the Lazarists, one of the Auxiliary Priests, an orphan house, another directed by the Brothers of the Christian Doctrine, other two houses of the same brethren, a society of charity for orphans, and a seminary.—From the Catholic of the 30th June.

GERMANY.

BISHOPS OF THE RHINE.—The Provincial States of the Lower Rhine received, on the 23d of June, the report of the committee on the endowment of the Rhenish Bishops. The reporter began by reminding the States that the late King William III. gave, on the 23d of August, 1821, his assent to the Bull De Salute Animarum, and caused it to be published in the Bulletin des Lois. That Bull takes place in Prussia of the Concordat, and is obligatory on the Government. It was in this view that the late King regarded it, and he had promised to endow the Rhenish Bishops in 1833 at the latest, yet up to the present moment nothing of the kind had been done. It continues, nevertheless, to be a duty of obligation on the Government. All that is required is that the property of these bishops, which was sequestrated during the French revolution, should be restored. It was stated, in reply to the motion, that the Government was waiting the answer of the Holy See to a proposition on the subject. It was finally agreed that the petition should be adopted by the States and forwarded to Berlin.—Abridged from the Journal de Bruxelles.

DR. PUSEY.—The Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford is the second son of the late Hon. Philip Bouverie (who assumed the name of Pusey), by Lady Lucy Sherard, eldest daughter of Robert, fourth Earl of Harborough, and widow of Sir Thomas Cave, Bart. Dr. Pusey's eldest brother is Philip Pusey, Esq. of Pusey, M. P. for Berkshire, the eminent agriculturist. Dr. Pusey was born in June, 1800, and married June 12, 1828, Maria Catherine, youngest daughter of the late John Raynard Barker, Esq. Mrs. Pusey died May 26, 1839, leaving an only daughter. Dr. Pusey entered at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1818, and took a first class degree in litteris humanioribus, Easter Term, 1822; he was afterwards elected a Fellow of Oriel College. In 1828 Dr. Pusey was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew in that University, to which office is attached a canonry in the Cathedral Church of Christ, Oxford. In 1824 Dr. Pusey obtained the Chancellor's prize for Latin prose composition, the subject being Coloniarum apud Græcos et Romanos inter se comparatio. The family of Pusey is of great antiquity, having been settled at Pusey, in the county of Berks, prior to the Conquest. The family estate is held by copyhold under a grant by Canute, and mentioned both by Camden and Fuller. The horn is that of an ox, of a dark-brown colour, and by its production the manor was recovered in the reign of James II.

DR. PUSEY'S SERMON.—So great has been the demand for Dr. Pusey's sermon, that the Puseyite printer, Mr. Baxter, could not work them off fast enough; and Mr. Parker, the publisher, was obliged to avail himself of the services of Mr. Shrimpton to assist. Upwards of 3,000 copies have been sent to Ireland. Two editions, of 6,000 each, have been printed; and a third edition, it is expected, will be published next week.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

A Catholic people may be vanquished; but under its conquerors, be they whom they may, if that people remain Catholic, it preserves its nationality, whence liberty and independence will sooner or later spring up again. Thus feeble Italy, so often subjugated, has never been reduced to the rank of a province by any one of the many conquerors who have by turns subdued her; so Ireland has triumphed over unexampled oppression; so will Poland triumph, in spite of the infamy and violence of her execrable tyrant. In Belgium it was the Catholic element that conquered Holland; on the banks of the Rhine it opposes invincible obstacles to equivocating Prussia, and holds him in check from making that conquest to which he aspires, but which remains unaccomplished. It is the same in Canada: in that remote land the Catholic religion has preserved the language and the sympathies together with the recollections of France. England can never assimilate to herself this unarmed people, whose only means of resisting her is by prostrating themselves before the altars of their religion.—Union Catholique

The Melanges Religieux, of Montreal, in its number for April 28, alluding to the remarkable revival of religious feeling in that diocese, says, "at the bishop's last visitation were reckoned 23,000 Canadian Catholics, in 4,200 families, giving 14,500 communicants, not reckoning the Canadian servants engaged in the houses of the Irish and Protestant families, that could not be visited."

In Kingston, the number of abjurations of the errors of Protestantism in the course of the year up to Easter was 192, and 7 new converts received their first communion on Easter-day. A small town is named wherein all the population are ready to embrace Christianity. All that is wanted to the gathering in of this goodly harvest is the labourer, ready to put his holy hand to the ripe corn.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1843.

[Vol. V.]

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER'S AND SEAL'S COLLEGES.

We have great pleasure in announcing to the well wishers of St. F. Xavier's and of Seal's College that the Bentinck Steamer, which sailed on the 24th of August, has on board seven Gentlemen from Stonyhurst College, Lancashire, who are coming to join their brethren in their labours at St. Xavier's and Seal's College. The Bentinck is expected to arrive in November. On the arrival of this reinforcement the community of St. F. Xavier's will consist of twenty-one. Of these eleven are Englishmen, two Irishmen, three Frenchmen, two Belgians, one Italian and one East Indian.

The splendid suite of school-rooms now erecting at St. F. Xavier's College will be in all probability ready for use in December. We are informed that the subscription opened for their completion already amounts to fourteen thousand Rupees; a noble testimony of the liberality of the Calcutta community and of the general esteem in which St. F. Xavier's College is held.

We are assured on good authority that Baboo Mutiloll Seal has purchased, about four big-gas of ground opposite his splendid mansion in Colootollah for the erection of his College. We trust that the building will be worthy of the noble establishment for which it is intended, and of the noble mind which has begun it.

We have been favoured with the names of the Gentlemen who will form the community of St. F. Xavier's and of the offices in which they will be employed in the ensuing scholastic year.

CHASTITY.

Modesty, gentleness, and humility, are, doubtless, excellent virtues, and rank first among the daughters of moderation: but there is a virtue, which shines among them, as the diamond does among the pearls: and that is—chastity. "Chastity is the lily of virtues," says St. Francis of Sales: "it renders men almost equal to the angels. Nothing is beautiful that is not pure, and chastity is the purity of men. Chastity is called 'virtue,' and its profession 'honour;' it is named 'integrity,' and the opposite vice, 'corruption.' In a word, it is its peculiar glory to be the beauty and ornament of soul and body."

The world has been no less edified by the chastity of Christian women, than by the constancy of martyrs: it caused the regeneration of public morals, for if the men make laws, women form the morals. As virgins, wives, or widows, the Christian females of the primitive church present themselves to us with the chastity of angels. Their fame was stainless as the ermine: and the grace of God descended into their souls like the dew of Shinar* into a golden vase.

St. Cyprian calls virgins the perfume flowers of the church, the most beautiful work of Divine grace, the image which most faithfully reflects the sanctity of God, the most illustrious portion of the flock of Jesus Christ. "After the martyrs," says he, "virgins hold the next rank: if the martyrs received a hundred for one, the virgins received sixty†."

The chastity of widows was no less admired by the pagan world than that of virgins. St. John Chrysostom relates that the rhetorician Libanius, learning from him that his mother had remained a widow more than twenty years, and that she had never taken a second husband, exclaimed, as he turned round to his idolatrous audience: "O gods of Greece! what women are found among the Christians!"‡

Although our morals have sadly degenerated since that time, the world has preserved a profound respect for chastity. This virtue knits together the dearest and closest bonds of family; it gives the great ones of the earth illustrious ancestors, and princes a right to the throne; the mutual love of father for child, and of child for father, are based upon it; and on it depend the honour, and, not unfrequently, the life of the husband.

Nothing exalts a woman higher in the esteem of the other sex, than chastity. The most licentious man involuntarily respects a chaste woman; his eyes refuse to meet her's, and his language is purified when he addresses her. When seated at eve near his domestic hearth, he will cite her as a model to his sister: for, however abandoned he himself may be, he desires that his wife, his daughter, and his sister, be chaste. Cæsar was not as famous for his continence as Scipio: but the wife of Cæsar was obliged to be above suspicion.

Napoleon, who esteemed courage above everything else, said one day—"Chastity is for woman what bravery is for man: I have the same contempt for a coward-man and an unchaste woman."

The Scripture recommends no less strongly chastity to man than to woman. Job bears to himself this testimony before God, that he had never fixed his eyes on a virgin*. "If my heart," says he, "hath been deceived upon a woman, and if I have laid wait at my friend's door.—For this is a heinous crime, and a most grievous iniquity. It is a fire that devoureth even to destruction, and rooteth up all things that spring†." "Mind not," says the inspired author of the Proverbs, "the deceit of a woman; for the lips of a harlot are like a honeycomb dropping, and her throat is smoother than oil. But her end is bitter as wormwood, and sharp as a two-edged sword. Her feet go down into death, and her steps as far as hell‡."

Continence has never shone with a purer lustre than in the beautiful history of Joseph, which extorted tears from Voltaire, the most heartless infidel that ever polluted earth with his tread. Son of the Assyrian Rachel, whose beauty is yet famous throughout the East, the young shepherd of Chaldea had an eye, like the gazelle of Hermon, with the lofty bearing of an Arabian chief. His appearance was but too attractive for the loved, but unfaithful wife of his master; and this shameless woman was not afraid to disclose to him her bad desires. An ordinary man would have profited by this violent passion, and made of it a stepping-stone to fortune, as is the practice of our days. But Joseph was no ordinary man: the words of the Egyptian woman filled his cheeks with blushes, and his soul with sorrow. To betray a good and confiding master, who loved him as his own son, appeared to him horrible. His answer was resolute, cautious, and affecting: "You see that my master has confided to me all that he possesses—that he does not even know what is in his house—and that, having placed all in my hands, he has reserved for himself you, who are his wife." Thus the blind confidence of Potiphar, which facilitated the crime, and seemed to afford the hope of impunity, was precisely the very motive which determined this noble youth from the foul deed. What would have encouraged a voluptuary to inflict an injury, was precisely the very thing that made an honourable man immediately reject it.

ABBE ORSINI.

MADRAS.—Eight members of the Oblati B. V. M., some of them in Priests Orders, the rest lay brothers have arrived at Madras per Hindustan. The Priests will devote themselves to the duties of the Sacred Ministry; the lay brothers will teach the orphans of the Catholic Orphanage some useful trades, to enable them to support themselves, after they shall leave the Orphanage.

DR. OLLIFFE.—The Very Rev. the Vicar General of Bengal, Dr. Olliffe, has, we rejoice to state, arrived safely in Ireland, where he has already received much encouragement in his important undertaking for the Bengal Mission.

CEYLON.—The Bishop elect of Ceylon Dr. Antonio, left that island on the 14th ult., for Pondicherry for consecration.

AGRA MISSION.

(From a Correspondent.)

CONVENT OF JESUS AND MARY.

An accession to the above Convent took place at our city Chapel on Sunday last, (1st instant.) The young Postulant was a Miss Murphy, who arrived here from Calcutta some months ago, but now that she has become a Novice of the above order has taken the name of Mary of St. Ignatius. The young Novice being accomplished, will be an acquisition to the Convent School, which by the bye, is greatly improved and augmented; moreover, her piety and love of her profession has endeared her to her reverend mother and sisters, as well as to her God. I am not capable of giving a detailed description of the ceremony, but will endeavour to give you a brief outline of it, the ceremony (as is usual on such occasions) was at once solemn and sublime. The Chapel was decorated with its richest ornaments, the altar, and all within the sanctuary were particularly grand, and looked (as all our Chapels and Churches do, when arranged for the adoration of Him, for whose glory they were built) like what it really was, a House of the Almighty God. The congregation appeared in their gayest attire, and the Postulant herself, (to make the contrast more beautiful) was dressed like an English Princess; but in a few brief moments, she appeared in the habit of her order: then indeed, she looked the pious and devoted Nun. It really was an interesting and imposing sight to see a creature of this world make such sacrifices for her God, the whole congregation, (and there were many Protestants present) appeared highly edified with the ceremony, all the Nuns, with the Lady Superioress and the pupils of the Convent were present, during the service, in front of the sanctuary, which added to the solemnity and grandeur of the ceremony. The Right Rev. Dr. Borghi officiated, assisted by the Rev. F. Caffarel and Mr. Keegan, and the Acolytes of the Chapel. Prior to the Postulant making her vows, our beloved Bishop delivered a sublime and appropriate Sermon, with his wonted eloquence. The text was taken from first epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians Chap. 4, v. 9, during the ceremony, several Psalms and Hymns were sung, among which I noticed our beautiful "Magnificat" and "Veni Creator Spiritus."—Immediately after the ceremony, high mass commenced, and was sung by Dr. Borghi, the Band of the 2nd Grenadier performing the Sacred Music. I must not omit the "Te Deum" which was sung with fine effect, by Dr. Borghi, the officiating Priests, and the Nuns, whose dulcet notes added much to its richness.

RIGHT REVEREND DR. BORGI.—Yesterday morning (5th October) our beloved Bishop, Dr. Borghi took his departure for Calcutta, on his way to Europe. His Lordship though much shattered in constitution from the effects of his great and laborious exertions for this Mission, since taking charge of it, was in his usual cheerful spirits. The heavens appeared to be weeping for his departure, for it was raining all the day. His Lordship will visit the different stations on his way down, and will, in all probability, reach Calcutta some time in December.

A FIRE AND WATER, PIPE AND LOTA, PERSECUTION OF THE BAPTIST CATECHUMENS IN CHITTAGONG

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I do not know whether or not you coincide with me in thinking, that edifying deeds should be cherished, and their fame be spread by us, even though they happen to have been performed in the ranks of our enemies. If on this subject you are of the same opinion with me then I need not make any further apology for troubling you with the following extract from a Protestant paper, (the EVANGELIST!! printed at Serampore, at the rate of four annas a number; quite a hidden treasure!); but in case you differ from me, I beg of you to remember, that even Christ took occasion to eulogize the faith and charity of heathens, and Samaritans, in order to edify his own hearers. The religious intelligence, to which I intend drawing your own as well as your readers pious attention was extracted by the Serampore Evangelist from the Baptist Missionary Herald for July, the which Baptist Missionary Herald extracted it from a letter of a certain J. Johannes, who, it appears, is a Baptist preacher in Chittagong. That this intelligence is no less important, than edifying, you may conclude from the fact, that the Editor of the said EVANGELIST kept back other items of news, to make room for it in its pages. Now then for this news of Christian edification!

May 18th. You will no doubt be happy to learn that our labours among the weavers have not proved altogether unsuccessful. Not long ago I mentioned our prospects as bright and cheering, and so we were warranted to conclude from hopeful and encouraging appearances. But our horizon was soon overcast for a time. Our books—our conversations and instructions wrought no small change in their minds. This was apparent to all. As long as they did not publicly declare themselves for Christ and Christianity, hostility was asleep. But when a course of vigorous efforts was adopted—when five heralds of the Gospel—three not unlike them (save in their religious views) were sent, prejudice took alarm. The poor simple weavers, who knew not what persecution was, began to feel the effects of it. Their Zemindars, relatives, friends, neighbours and gurus, all rose against them. Accustomed to visit their heathen neighbours, to eat and drink with them, now they were forbidden, their pipes' fire was not given them. They were not allowed to drink water out of the same lota. The barbers objected to shave them. Their children were not allowed to mingle with them, or play. They were viewed as pests in the community. Under circumstances of so trying a nature almost all deserted us; but one man stood firm in his adherence."

What do you, Mr. Editor, say to such an appalling persecution of the catechumens of the Baptist Church!! Why, before these Chittagong Zemindars, gurus, and barbers, old Nero, Domitian, and the Virgin Queen Bess, were complete bunglers! These latter tried to make the people abandon Christ and Christianity by means of confiscations, stripes, hunger and thirst, by tortures and the rock, by nakedness and prisons, by banishment and death, by getting them roasted, burned, impaled and tipping up their bellies; by throwing them to wild beasts, or quartering their bodies, &c. &c. What a number of useless labours they might have saved themselves and their executioners, had they hit upon the expedient of the Chittagong persecutors!! If the force of a measure is to be tried by its effects, we may safely pronounce the mode of persecution pursued in Chittagong, "probatum est." Now, you perceive, Mr. Editor, that had the Jewish Sanhedrim, or Nero, or Domitian, or the Virgin Queen, in short the whole of the persecuting brother and sisterhood since the days of the Saviour, instead of treating their Christian subjects worse than assassins and traitors, published an edict, forbidding all Christians and abettors of Christianity to eat and drink with any body else except with themselves; if they had made it a misdemeanour to visit any one of their heathen or Protestant neighbours, if they had declared it a guilt punishable, say, with transportation for life to drink water out of a heathen or protestant bowl, pot or tumbler; if they had sent secret instructions to all the barbers in their dominions not to shave the followers of Christ, but let their beards, mustachios and whiskers grow wild and uncultivated; if they had given strict orders to all the police-men on duty to bring to the work-house all Christian urchins seen by them playing and frolicking about with pagan brats; if, Mr. Editor, they had done only this you or I, would perhaps this day worship Jupiter and Cybele, and Juno, and Neptune, and Bacchus, and Hercules, or Brumhà, or Vishnool, or Seeva, &c. &c. But fortunately for us, they only made a roast of the Christians themselves instead of confining them to eat their roast beef or mutton with such a one, or in such a place; and as they themselves had perhaps a mortal aversion to bushy beards they, in order not to burden the state with a preventive service against clean Christian chins, only chopped off the Christians' heads altogether. Of course, under a persecution of so trying a nature as that which raged against the poor weavers in Chittagong, what else could reasonably be expected but that they almost all, though the books and conversations and instructions &c. of the Rev. preacher J. Johannes had wrought such a considerable, such an apparent change in their minds, that they almost all I say should have turned their backs to Christ, abandoned His cause, and deserted both the preachers, and the heralds of the Gospel too! I know, St. Paul, who also experienced a little bit of persecution, managed matters differently. As he himself informs us, he run his race, yet he kept his faith. But then you see, Mr. Editor, his career was play-work in comparison with that of the Baptist Catechumens of Chittagong. The Apostle, unquestionable was, in order to keep inviolate his faith, in many labours, in prisons frequently, in stripes above measure, in deaths often. Of the Jews he received one hundred and ninety-five lashes, thrice he was beaten with rods, once he was stoned, thrice he suffered shipwreck; a night and a day he was in the depth of the sea. In journeying often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils from his own nation, in perils from the gentiles, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils from false brethren, in labour and painfulness, in much watchings, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. It is certain, that to crown such a life of truly Apostolic sufferings he was beheaded in Rome during the reign of Nero. All this, aye, and more than this, Mr. Editor, is a well-known fact. Still I maintain, he was out of the brunt of the battle; inasmuch, as they never forbade him to eat and drink, wherever and with whomsoever he had a mind; as they never interfered with his toilette, by procuring him the ill-will of the barbers. I conjecture, (in the absence of any decisive documents on this score) that St. Paul never smoked the hubble-bubble, (as the Chittagong weavers do at present.) So you see, he was not exposed to the dreadful, maddening, mortification of having the pipe's fire refused him, and being obliged to fetch a burning coal for himself. Last, not least; having never rightly understood the injunction of Genesis: "Grow and multiply," and consequently always remained a bachelor, he had no children, and was thus fortunately spared the dangerous temptation (too natural for an affectionate parent) of turning his back to Christ and his cause, in order that his little girls or boys, might enjoy the pleasure of playing with little Hebrews or Heathens! St. Paul kept his faith, and after what I have said, it is no wonder; the Baptist Catechumens of Chittagong lost all the Christianity that was within them by the books—and the conversations and the instructions of the Rev. Mr. J. Johannes, and, everything considered, it was neither surprising, nor unnatural.... But now, Mr. Editor, we come to the marrow of Mr. Johannes's letter. You remember it was stated that in the general overthrow of Christianity among the Chittagong weavers, one man stood firm, Ramchuran, (it is the man's name) a middle-aged man who had heard the Gospel for three years, and had profited thereby, came forward, and declared his renunciation of ALL his former sinful ways and pursuits, and avowed his attachment to Christ. Do not the tears of consolation start into your eyes, Mr. Editor, at the intelligence of such heroic fortitude? O! noble-minded Ramchuran! in spite of thy heathen neighbours, Zemindars, relatives and friends, in spite of barbers and infidel children, thou comest forward, and takest Christ, and for ought I know, the coffers of his Saints for thy portion!! Could any body raise an objection against such a worthy disciple being canonized by the Baptists? Verily, the Rev. preacher Johannes must be right, when he declares, he knew it was the Lord's doing; indeed the pious missionary may well exclaim, "such an open account of his belief in Christ, in the teeth of PERSECUTION AND HOSTILITY (!!) could never originate with man!!" O! Mr. Johannes, well may you pride yourself upon such a convert, well may you rejoice at this happy juncture! Now, Mr. Editor, lest you might confound this bold convert of Baptist zeal in Chittagong with the common herd of converts, whom you might call the rice and curry-converts, who understand the beauty of Christianity by being made acquainted practically, that Christ pays his followers a hundred per one; you must know that this weaver Ramchuran was by no means mercenary. Listen then to what Mr. Johannes tells us of him: "We welcomed him, quoting the heart-rending words of Jesus: 'Every one that hath forsaken house or brethren or sisters, or father or mother, or wife or children, or LANDS, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall enter into everlasting life.'" Is not the Rev. Baptist preacher a pious man, quoting Scripture like an Angel? At any rate he is a smart fellow, and the last man in the world, to let the iron cool, before he hammers it. The missionaries of New Zealand have set him a good example, and he is determined upon profiting by it. And in fact, St. Paul's principle is but very fair; who lives for the pulpit, must live by the pulpit. You will not be surprised then to learn that a spot of ground within Ramchuran's boundary was measured by him, whilst the fervor of the poor convert was yet warm. And this was quite natural enough, as otherwise the above fine quotation from the heart cheering words of Jesus might have remained a dead letter. You may ask me, why did he measure the ground? Perhaps for the exercise of his surveying accomplishments? Not he. What then for? Why, Sir, for missionary purposes, to be sure! Somebody of his wicked neighbours called poor Ramchuran a fool, and thought him a gull, prophesying to him the loss of his land, (which, by the bye, it is ten to one, but he will lose) but I say only, Dear me, what a pious, generous man this Chittagong weaver must be! Well then, Mr. Editor, Ramchuran was very soon joined by his wife (I should think this a matter of course) and a namesake, and near relative of his with his wife and daughter too, who all declared for Christ and the Baptists; who alter the customary examination after singing (?) and praying, gave them the right hand of fellowship, (among the Saints.) But now, Mr. Editor, for a pathetic description! The five Baptist converts are to be regenerated the following Sunday. But whilst in the preceding Saturday they are leaving their village to proceed to town, Mr. Johannes's letter causes them to be met by a whole host of their neighbours, relatives and friends in procession. Ah! how did they entreat them with sobs and tears to desist from becoming Feringhees; how many opposed their intentions with worldly counsels, how many did cruelly mock them, and I dare say call them bad names; Ramchuran's brother is brought on the stage and offers his converted brother fifty Rupees buxsheesh, if he will remain a heathen; the Roman Catholics (and what Protestant scene of this sort is complete without a goodly sprinkling of Popery and Papists) are crowding round and tempting them with promises (of what? I am curious to know) to join the Romish Church. Even the Mahomedans are made to obstruct their passage to town by praising up to them Islamism! But all this was of no avail. Ramchuran and his pious suite broke through the snares of Satan, the Mussulmans and Papists, and on the following morning (Sabbath) in the presence of a numerous congregation of Hindús, Mohammedans and Roman Catholics (what an extraordinary curiosity these people must be possessed of in Chittagong!) these five souls fulfilled an act of righteousness, by putting on the Lord Jesus Christ by baptism." Now is 'nt this very edifying, Mr. Editor? Well, in the afternoon they took the Sacrament, and at night they slept at the house of one of the native preachers. Is not all this very edifying? But still more. At night the daughter of the second Ramchuran was observed to repeat these words "Good God, was I in darkness all this while? then how happy am I, that I have discovered the true way of salvation!" Is not this glorious! I have often read advertisements of Monsieur So and So, who undertook to teach any man woman or child good French in six lessons; or of Mr. What's his name, who promised a good handwriting in no more than a half dozen hours of instructions. I always thought them mere braggadocios, until now. Goodness gracious! what prodigious progress people make under Baptist tuition! Yesterday a girl is an ignorant weaver's ignorant daughter, and to-day she is capable of uttering the essence of refined, theatrical devotion. In good sooth, had I a daughter, she should go to school at Mr. Johannes's or at least some Baptist schoolmaster. Well then, Mr. Editor, don't you think, that these five souls, who have so nobly braved the sweeping storm of persecution, which quite silenced the Baptist hymns at the doors of Chittagong, are worthy of some distinguished consideration? Yes indeed, and Mr. Johannes may well conclude his letter as he does, by saying: "And, now that the Lord has opened a bright prospect before us, I again invite your kind attention to the demands of this people. Some one must be stationed among them, but where are the means to erect a place to answer every purpose?" On account of such Missionary reports always finishing with a strong appeal to the purse, in order to enable the missionaries to keep up their bright prospects, and their encouraging hopes, I have heard them compared with comedies, which always wind up with a marriage. But in our case, poor Mr. Johannes, could not help it. For how could his bowels of compassion remain unmoved in seeing a whole congregation of five Baptists without a Church and a Missionary with 100 or 200 Rs. a month with an extra for the contingency of wife and each additional child. Well, I hope, even in this matter, brighter prospects will soon cheer him. Adieu, Mr. Editor! My letter is long, but then the matter is so edifying, so interesting!!

Your's very obediently,

RAM BHOSÉ.

CONVERSIONS.

ANOTHER CONVERSION TO CATHOLICITY.—Died at Mountmusic, in the parish of Kilmichael, in this county, on Monday, the 14th instant, William Wolfe, Esq., aged 32 years. Mr. Wolfe, who had been a Protestant, and a gentleman of excellent education, became a convert to the Catholic faith some days previous to his dissolution, and received the rites of the Catholic Church, at the hands of one of the clergymen of the parish, with the most edifying and exemplary piety. He did not fail to give, during his illness, the most unequivocal proofs of the sincerity of his conversion. He was much respected through life, and died universally regretted. His remains were accompanied to the family place of interment by a numerous and respectable assemblage of persons.—Cork Examiner.

CATHOLIC CONVERT.—Richard Muns, of Royal Oak-lane, in this city, was, on the 15th instant, received into the Roman Catholic Church, by the Rev. Patrick Cantwell, C.C., of St. Patrick's.—Waterford Chronicle.

On the 16th, at Loughrea, Thomas Grier renounced the errors of Protestantism, and was received into the bosom of the Catholic Church, by the Rev. J. Moloney, assisted by the Rev. J. H. Wheelan, under the authority and power of the Bishop of Clonfert.

SAVOY.

Miss Jane Whellier, daughter of the late Thomas Whellier, Esq., of Exeter, made public renunciation of the errors of Anglicanism and profession of the Catholic faith, on the 26th June last, in the parish church of Six, in Savoy. The ceremony was assisted by three priests, and the Baroness—(sister of the Baron de Louche) as godmother; the new convert, according to the custom of the place, being clothed in violet-coloured silk, white veil, &c., and kneeling in the middle of the church. Miss Whellier left England a few years ago a very zealous member of the Church of England, has since resided with her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Glover, of the Abbaye de Sixt—both Protestants—and has been exposed to no human influence that could shake her faith, other than that of the example of the people of Savoy, amongst whom, as acknowledged by Protestant residents, crime is unknown.

FRANCE.

Mademoiselle de Liaber, a Jewess, and the granddaughter of M. Worms de Romilly, President of the Central Consistory of the Israelites in France, has been converted and was married the other day says L'Ami de la Region, to M. Groncy. The marriage took place, with all the Catholic rites, in the church of Notre Dame de Loretta.

IMPORTANT PROSELYTE.—The curé of the Hay, in the diocese of Paris, M. L'Abbé Vacher, had the happiness, on Saturday, the 30th of July, to baptize in his church a Protestant lady, descended from one of the noblest and most ancient families of Switzerland. The conversion of this neophyte will, it is to be hoped, produce the happiest results among her numerous friends and relatives. She was prepared by the edifying instruction of the zealous pastor himself, for her abjuration and baptism. Her sponsors were of Paris, persons eminent by their social position and of distinguished piety.

BELGIUM.

In the church of the Madeleine, at Brussels, on the 15th ult., at seven o'clock in the morning, an entire family of Protestants abjured their heresy, and were received into the Catholic church by the hands of the Dean. They consisted of six persons—a widow, four daughters, a son.—Tablet, August 5.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

THE HONOURABLE AND REVEREND GEORGE SPENCER.—This gentleman, on the evening of Wednesday last, delivered an eloquent discourse in St. Augustin's Church, "On the present State and future Prospects of England," deducing his text from the first part of the 37th chapter of Ezekiel. He preached an hour and a half, and the church was crowded to excess. On the following morning, he again preached to a numerous congregation.—Preston Chronicle.

IRELAND.

RATHFARNHAM CONVENT.—On Wednesday last eight young ladies made their solemn vows of consecration to the service of religion in that interesting order; at the same time three more were received and entered on their novitiate, in all eleven in number. His Grace the most Rev. Dr. Murray officiated on the occasion. A numerous circle of the particular friends of the religious were present at the ceremony.

TESTIMONIAL TO THE LATE RIGHT REV. DR. ENGLAND.—The Catholic clergy of Cork have nobly shown their piety and patriotism, in coming forward to record their unanimous desire to erect an unfading monument to the virtues, talents, and apostolic efforts of the late illustrious Bishop of Charleston, Right Rev. Dr. England, who was born in the city of Cork, in 1786, and whose fame and merits are esteemed by the best and brightest men of the new and old world.

Our countryman the Right Rev. Dr. Purcell, Bishop of Cincinnati, has arrived in Paris, where he ordained three Irish students on Wednesday, for his own diocese.—Freeman.

The amiable, learned, and patriotic prefect of the Dunboynes establishment at Maynooth the Rev. Dr. Charles M'Nally, has been selected by his Holiness as coadjutor to the Right Rev. Dr. Kernan, the venerable Bishop of Clogher.—Ibid.

The Right Rev. Dr. Barron, Catholic Bishop of Liberia, after a short visit to his friends in Waterford, left that city for Bristol on Friday, on his way to take charge of the distant and laborious mission assigned to him by the Holy See. His lordship, we are happy to say, is in good health. He was accompanied to Bristol by the Rev. John Sheehan, P.P., St. Patrick's; Rev. Martin Flynn, P.P., Trinity Without; and Rev. J. P. Cooke, of St. John's College.—Cork Examiner.

At a meeting of the Augustine order, in Dublin, the Rev. Mr. Page was elected superior of the convent in Athlone. At that meeting letters from Rome were read, appointing the Rev. John Furlong, of Ross, President of the Provincial Chapter. The solemn mass of the Holy Ghost was then sung, and they proceeded to the election of a superior, when the Very Rev. Charles Stuart was (for the second time) elected to the high and important office of Provincial of the Order. The Very Rev. B. O'Neill was appointed Prior of John-street, and the Very Rev. John A. Cronin A. G. P. of the Cork House. The provincial and some others were pupils of the immortal Dr. Doyle, who was a most distinguished member of the holy order of St. Augustine. The reverend president was tutor to this illustrious prelate previous to his entering the ecclesiastical state.—Freeman.

We are sorry to learn that the venerable and learned Dr. Fletcher, author of "The comparative View," and many other useful works of Catholic controversy, is in a very feeble state of health. Dr. Fletcher was O'Connell's tutor at St. Omers.

INFLUENCE OF CATHOLIC CLERGY.—A striking illustration of the judicious exercise of the influence possessed by the Catholic clergy over the members of their church occurred on Monday afternoon last, in a field in the vicinity of Mr. Dixon's iron works, Hutchison town, and gave much satisfaction to hundreds of spectators. One of those brutal and disgusting exhibitions called a "pitched battle" would seem to have been resolved upon by two stout Irishmen, denizens of Bridgegate, which their respective friends and supporters agreed should come off in the field in question, which is supposed to be out of the jurisdiction of the police. Accordingly, at the hour appointed, the boys who, it seemed, had no real object in fighting but to give satisfaction to their mutual friends, set out for "the ground," about six o'clock, followed by an immense concourse of labourers, masons, and other tradesmen, principally from Saltmarket, Bridgegate, and the region round about. As the fighters and the intended spectators made their way by Crown-street, their numbers were swelled considerably, and by the time of reaching the field, what with colliers, miners, and others, the turn-out was really formidable. Just as the combatants were preparing for the work of blackguardism, the Rev. Mr. O'Ryan, Catholic priest, was observed making his way through the crowd. On this a buzzing noise was heard, and in two minutes afterwards the immense throng of people, bent on gratifying the worst of feelings, were off the ground, and on their way back to the city. It was truly a gratifying incident, and seemed to give much pleasure to a number of respectable people who chanced to witness it. We understand that, on getting access to the combatants, the rev. gentleman, after a short address on the folly of such proceedings, extracted a promise that they would not fight, and this we doubt not will be religiously kept.—Scotch Reformers' Gazette.

GERMANY.

We quote the Univers:—

While, on the one side, the Rationalism of the day; engendered by the theory of individual interpretation in matters of faith and revelation, says, with indefatigable effort, the German Protestantism, there is manifested, on the other hand, among the theologians of this communion (the German Lutheran), who would maintain the fundamental principles of Christianity, a tendency which has some analogy to the primary notions which, in England, gave birth to Puseyism. Thus the Danish doctor, Claus Hauma, a pastor at Kiel, has declared as the logical result of his reasoning on the relation between the Bible and the Church, that "the Church possesses and preserves the true understanding of the Scriptures." Speaking of the Protestant sects with which he comes in contact, and of their pastors, he says, "I would undertake to write upon one of my nails all that at this day remains of their belief." Again, the Prussian pastor, Sintenis, of Magdeburg, preaching with indomitable zeal against the theory and practice of divorce, says, "Oh! it does little honour to our Protestant Church to enter on a controversy in this matter with the Catholic Church, which, upon this point, does much more than ourselves maintain the original holiness of the conjugal tie; for, when the thing becomes inevitable, it pronounces the separation of the married, but it never permits the repetition of the sacrament of marriage to either. How can we Protestants, with any right or reason, demand for ourselves, and against the Catholic Church, the honour of admitting the sacred Scriptures only as the measure of our faith and morals, since in the matter of divorce at least, it is they, and not we, who hold fast by the written word of Jesus Christ and his disciples." This striking homage to the true evangelism of the Catholic faith was delivered in the ancient cathedral of Magdeburg, and opposite to the well-remembered inscription:—

Expulso Antichristo, 1567.

BAVARIA.

They write from Wurtzburg on the 8th July as follows:—"Yesterday, at half-past twelve, all the bells of the town announced the anniversary of the 1,100th Jubilee of our diocese. At four o'clock a solemn procession took place, at which Monsignore Vialepola, the apostolic nuncio at Munich, bore the holy sacrament. He was followed by the Lord Bishops of Fulda and Wurtzburg. The clergy of the town, the authorities, civil and military, and the professors of the university formed part of the procession. 20,000 strangers were assembled at the ceremony. On the previous day the Nuncio went in person to the house of M. Gœries, and presented to him, in the name of His Holiness the cross of a commander of the order of St. Gregory.

SYRIA.

Under the auspices and by the labours of the Vicomte Ouffroy an establishment is about to be formed on Mount Lebanon; a hospitem, which will contain an asylum for the orphan children of the Maronites, an hospital for the sick, a resting place for travellers, and a school for the education and instruction of the native youth of that part of Syria. The establishment will enjoy the supervision of the Maronite patriarch, and in virtue of established custom and well known treaties will be under the natural protection of the French Consul. When the edifice is erected there will be appointed a council of direction, holding of the Superior council established in Paris, and both will find auxiliaries in general councils to be founded in the different states of Europe, which will be represented in the superior council by the foreign members of that body. The names given as forming the nucleus of the superior council are a guarantee for the success of this most Catholic work.

LIVERPOOL.—Dr. Sharples is the Coadjutor Bishop of the Lancashire district. He had to be consecrated upon the assumption in Rome, and will be very shortly in England.—Tablet Augt.

THE FUNERAL OF BISHOP BAINES.

Nothing could equal the grief and dismay felt, not only in the College, but in Bath, throughout all the neighbourhood of Prior Park, and, indeed, through the whole district and diocese, when the decease of this great prelate became known. The rev. principal of St. Paul's College, Mr. Shattock, was in Bath at the time, and on his arrival at the College he could with difficulty find any one to speak to, and to ask about the particulars of the mournful event. All the inmates, almost without exception, had retired to their rooms, or to some corner out of sight, to hide or to give vent to their emotion. After a delay as brief as possible, those priests who were at home contrived, as well as their feelings would allow them, to offer up the Holy Sacrifice for the soul of their departed prelate and father; all the while the very boys who served their masses could hardly tell how, for their tears and grief, to make the necessary responses. The particulars of the bishop's death we give below in the most authentic form, namely, in the shape of a report of the evidence on the coroner's inquest, which we extract from the Bath Herald.

The time of the funeral had at first been talked of for an earlier day, but it was at length fixed for Thursday, the 13th instant, and at the earnest request of the most respectable Protestant inhabitants, it was determined that the corpse should lie in state on the Tuesday and Wednesday previous, to allow his Lordship's numerous admirers and friends to pay a last tribute of respect to his memory. Accordingly, on those two days, between the hours of eleven and six, the great hall at the Mansion House was thrown open to the public, who were admitted in parties of a hundred or a hundred and fifty at a time, and allowed to contemplate for a moment the sad spectacle, and then to pass out at another door. The entrance door was attended by four policemen, whose services were hardly ever more needed than on the latter of the two days. On Tuesday the crowd was not trifling, upwards of three thousand persons having been present. But on Wednesday, when the fact of the lying in state was more generally known, the number of visitors was more than tripled. It is calculated that near ten thousand persons passed through the hall on Wednesday. The crowding at the entrance was excessive. Fashionably-dressed ladies struggled for admission with the utmost earnestness, and with the most perfect indifference, not only as to their dresses, but even as to the safety of their persons; and when, at length, the doors were finally closed, they shut out at least two or three thousand disappointed visitors, some of whom had come from as far as Nottingham, and who remained in attendance for hours, continuing still to hope for admission.

On Thursday morning, at nine o'clock, the Office, for the Dead commenced. Matins and Lauds were chanted in the Great Hall, which presented the same appearance that it had done during the two previous days. Under a canopy was laid the coffin, upon which, on a brass plate in the shape of a mitre, was the following inscription:—

PETRUS AUGUSTINUS BAINES,
EPISCOPUS SIGENSIS, V. A. D. O.
OBIIIT ANNO DOMINI MDCCCLIII.

PRID. NOM. JULII. VIXIT AN. LVII. DIES XII.

Upon the coffin were laid an episcopal crook, mitre, and hat, a chalice, paten, and ciborium.

Around at the corners of the coffin the episcopal vestments were tastefully arranged. At the head was the Bishop's throne, about which were disposed another mitre, processional cross, vestments &c. &c.

The office was performed in private. There were present four bishops—Dr. Griffiths, Dr. Briggs, Dr. Gillies, and Dr. Morris—and about forty priests; among whom, besides the gentlemen of the establishment, Dr. Brindle, &c. &c., we noticed Dr. Rooker, Mr. Metcalfe, Dr. Coombes, Mr. M'Donnell, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Williams, Mr. O'Farrall, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Barber, Mr. Kendal, Mr. Doyle, and several others.

Among the visitors were Lord Clifford, the Hon. Miss Crewe, General Maully, Mr. King, &c. &c. There were also present those few students whom the vacation that has just commenced had not summoned home. When the chanting of Lauds was finished the company passed in procession to the chapel, where a High Mass was offered up by Bishop Griffiths for his departed colleague. The Rev. Mr. Shattock officiated as arch-priest, the Rev. Mr. Illingworth as deacon, and Rev. Mr. Woollett as sub-deacon. During the greater part of this most impressive funeral service, there was, so far as we could observe, hardly a dry eye, and the deep grief of those who had known the good Bishop most intimately, and who had indeed loved him like a father, was, at times, almost painfully discernible. After mass a touching and most appropriate discourse was pronounced by Bishop Briggs, of which we regret that neither time nor space will allow us to give more than an outline; and even that we fear but too imperfect. His Lordship took for his text this verse of the 14th chapter of the Apocalypse: "I heard a voice saying, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord. They shall rest from their labours; for their works follow them." He then said, "We are here assembled on a very mournful occasion, and the numerous attendance convinces me how deeply you have at heart the interests of religion. We are assembled to pay the last tribute of respect, and the last office of charity, for a most illustrious prelate. Religion weeps for his corpse. You, I see, are deeply moved, and shall I then endeavour to open and make wider the wound, and add to your grief by throwing my affliction into the same bitter cup? However, there is something in grief that will not suffer us to be silent. Grief will seek for utterance, and it is a relief, though a painful one, when we are able to give vent to the overflowings of sorrow. Therefore it is, that, though wholly unprepared, I could not hesitate, when called upon, to say a few words on this occasion. We could not be silent in our mourning for so severe a loss to our religion, so great and so illustrious a prelate. Who has not admired the greatness of his genius, and not only this, but also the mildness of his disposition, and that perfect sincerity which enabled us to see, as through a window, every thought of his bosom. His devotion to the cause of religion was unbounded, and he lived only for his clergy and his flock. Is it not something worthy of admiration to see a great mind stoop to all the low and harassing drudgery of the commonest duties of an usher, day by day; laying aside his exalted dignity of Bishop, and pursuing that lowly path in which there was nothing whatever of outward sublimity? And why did he do this? I turn to you, rev. gentlemen, and you, the students of this Institution, and I will tell you why. It was, that he might establish these Colleges, which were so dear to his heart. It was to give the students of these Colleges a superior education; and not only to you, but to the Catholic body in England, and to aid them in their efforts to rise from the low and degraded state into which they were cast by the penal laws, to enable them to assume their proper position in society, and to cause the Catholic religion to be respected, and by this means to be propagated throughout the land. This he determined to effect, and therefore he stooped to the drudgery of an usher of a school for years; and to this end were for years devoted all the energies of so great a mind. But occasionally, as it were, the greatness of his mind could not be confined within the littleness of a College. He then came forth in those pastorals which he addressed to his district—and not to his district alone, but to the Catholics of all England, who looked to him with the highest interest for instruction. Upon some of these pastorals there have been differences of opinion, and it would therefore be unbecoming in me to discuss them now. Standing as I do at the altar of my God, it is not for me to disturb the peace produced by the calming ceremony of this morning. But yet it is in the presence of that Omnipotent Being before whom I am soon to be answerable, that I speak of him who is now no more, and whose most intimate friendship I enjoyed. I hesitate not to say that whether he were mistaken or not mistaken in these addresses, he had no other view in them than the Glory of God, the promulgation of His truth, and the cause of our most Holy Faith; and he never wished to wound the feelings of any member of the household of Christ. Great were his sacrifices and labours. Indeed, he never hesitated to sacrifice himself when the cause of religion required it. He fell on the field of battle; prematurely cut off, but yet his days were full of anxious labours, and he is gone now to receive everlasting blessings and the reward of all his toils. 'Blessed is the dead who dieth in the Lord; he shall rest from his labours, and his works shall follow him.' In what I have now said I have spoken what should add to rather than diminish your sorrow. But I must not forget to tell you to moderate your grief by the hope of future immortality. I have drawn only a faint outline of his character, which you can yourselves fill up; we should not forget his meritorious actions; and if you believe that the Lord Jesus Christ has risen again from the dead, then may you comfort one another with the thought that those who have earned His grace will rise again even as He has risen; and we may piously and confidently hope that our departed Bishop's good works have followed him to the throne of God. Why should we not imagine him going to the throne of God as St. Gregory represents the twelve apostles, taking with them the various nations they had converted to Christianity? Why should not he take with him to the judgment seat of God the many illustrious converts, the students, &c., whom he has educated, the clergyman whom these colleges have sent forth to diffuse religion throughout the world? This day the cries of all those whom he has benefitted ascend for mercy, and their guardian angels will carry up these cries to the throne of Divine mercy. I beg that during the remainder of this awful ceremony you will bear in mind that God's judgments are not like those of men; and therefore, if this illustrious man has, through human frailty, and unknown to us, contracted some stains, send up your supplications with united voice and heart, and beg God to have mercy on his soul. His sudden death speaks most forcibly to us 'to watch,' for we know not how soon death may come upon us. Be ye always ready, and take warning by his death. Your hopes and prospects in this establishment were so intimately connected with him that they almost seem to be entombed with him; but let us not forget that we are all children of a Heavenly Father who cares for us. Let us remember that when Job suffered afflictions, more numerous than ours, and received the news of his affliction at one blow, he was yet able to say 'The Lord has given, and the Lord has taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord.' Let us then see in God our father, and endure his Holy will, whatever it may be, and say with Job 'The Lord has given,' &c. If you do this, then you have the sweet consolations of religion to comfort you. Oh, I loved him and will never abandon him; but will accompany him with my thoughts and prayers until he reaches the tabernacles of eternal bliss."

After the delivery of this sermon the burial service was chanted, and the mournful ceremony soon closed.

PRIOR PARK COLLEGE.

We are very happy to be able to allay the doubts that have been expressed as to the stability of this most magnificent and admirable college being affected by the decease of the lamented Bishop. It is a fact that there never has been a year since the college was opened so successful either in a pecuniary point of view, or in point of instruction, as shown in the recent Annual Exhibition. Now, it is a fact which ought to be known that the whole of this success has been the result of working upon Dr. Baines's plan, but without his personal interference. For the last year and a half Dr. Baines has had no more to do with the active management of this establishment than a perfect stranger. This fact ought to be known in justice to the college itself, in the permanent stability of which Dr. Baines took so deep an interest, and to the rev. gentlemen who for the last year and a half have had the real management of it. Dr. Baines's death will make not the slightest change whatever in the management of the college.

THE CORONER'S INQUEST.

(From the Bath Herald.)

The following are the particulars connected with this lamentable occurrence, as far as could be gathered at the inquest upon the body, which was held at Prior Park on Thursday evening, at seven o'clock, before A. H. English, Esq., coroner.

Previous to calling the witnesses, the coroner observed that he had no doubt it was with the same painful feelings as those with which he was himself actuated, that they were assembled to ascertain by what means the deceased, Peter Augustine Baines, came by his death. Their first duty would be to ascertain what was the state of health of the deceased previous to his death, for the purpose of coming to a fair inference as to whether it was the result of natural causes, and if so, they would return a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God," or, if they thought it was produced by violence, they would of course return a verdict to that effect.

It was not usual in such cases as the present to have recourse to a post mortem examination, unless the appearances presented by the body should seem to the jury to require it. They would, doubtless, feel with himself the most painful interest in the case they were about to investigate—the cause of the death of the esteemed, the excellent, and respected founder of the Prior Park Establishment; and, as a personal friend of the deceased, he would say, that those who knew him had now only to regret that they had ever had the pleasure of his acquaintance, so deeply would they be impressed with the removal of one, whose courtesy and high qualities had rendered him an ornament to society. It was with these feelings that he was impressed while making the present inquiry; he was aware that the deceased had been for some considerable time in an infirm state of health, and which had continued up to the latest period of his life. They would now proceed to examine the body, and if they discovered any marks of violence, they would direct a post mortem examination to be made.

The jury then proceeded to view the body. The countenance presented a perfectly calm and placid appearance, as if in sleep; evidently betokening that death had been unattended by any pain, and had taken place while the rev. doctor was in a state of unconsciousness; as the slightest motion of the hand would have been sufficient to have reached the bell-rope, had he been sufficiently aroused, by pain or convulsion, to have been sensible of danger, or of his approaching end.

The jury having returned, the first witness called was Charles Fisher, who deposed as follows:—I am a servant to Dr. Baines, and have been in his service for thirteen years. I saw the deceased for the last time alive about ten o'clock last night, in his sitting-room adjoining his bed-room, and he told me he should retire to rest immediately—ten o'clock was his usual time of retiring for the night; I took his supper to his room about nine. He had not complained more than usual, yesterday, of his illness, for which Mr. Church had been attending him; he complained of weakness yesterday; Mr. Church saw him on Monday afternoon; he left home for Bristol the day before yesterday, and I followed him in the evening of the same day. He preached a sermon at the opening of a chapel in Bristol yesterday, which lasted more than an hour; he also officiated at the service, which lasted from eleven to two o'clock. He had never had any fits to my knowledge; he did not complain of being fatigued; he has taken medicine every day, but I am not quite certain if he took any yesterday; he did the two days previously. The deceased had company to dine yesterday, but was not well enough to join them; while they were at dinner, about five o'clock, he went to bed, after his return from Bristol. He was in the habit of doing so after any very great exertion; I went to his room about seven o'clock the next morning; I am accustomed to do so; I lock the door of the sitting-room, which communicates with his lordship's bed-room, myself, and take away the key at night; the Bishop has a key which opens both doors; when I opened the sitting-room door in the morning, I found the bed-room door open, and on entering the room I found his lordship in the same position, as usual, lying upon his back, his head a little off the pillow, and slightly leaning on his right-arm, the other outside the clothes; I observed a change of countenance; I went out of the room, but returned immediately, and I felt his hand and his face, and then went and fetched Dr. Brindle; I went back with him; the deceased was to all appearance dead; his face and hands were cold; Dr. Brindle immediately sent me for Mr. Bampton, who lives in the house, and was formerly a surgeon. He followed me directly.

The Rev. George Bampton examined—I arrived at Prior Park on Tuesday night from Plymouth. I am a clergyman. About a quarter-past seven o'clock this morning the last witness came to inform me that the Bishop was taken suddenly ill, and that my immediate presence was requested; I followed him, and when I entered the room I observed his lordship lying in the position just mentioned, his countenance was perfectly bloodless and pale, and I found that he was dead, and must have been so for two or three hours. The pupils of the eyes were insensible to the influence of light; and the only part warm was near the region of the heart, which would naturally retain the heat longer than any other part of the body. Before I left Prior Park last October, his lordship had a severe illness, when I attended him. He sent for me about half-past seven last evening, during the desert; he complained of being much exhausted, and also of a feeling of uncomfortableness, a peculiar sensation of numbness, which he has complained of every day for years. He never had any fits. I think his death proceeded from a low kind of apoplexy, which not unfrequently supervenes upon paralysis, to attacks of which he had been subject, and which Mr. Church and Mr. Hay pronounced them to be when they attended him some time ago. He appeared to have died without a struggle; the hands were not clenched. I saw deceased last about half-past seven last night. I was surprised when I heard of his death, but had before thought it not unlikely he might die suddenly. I was present at the service in Bristol yesterday, and immediately the Bishop appeared at the altar I observed a great appearance of weakness, both in his voice and countenance. I am a member of the College of Surgeons, and also of Apothecaries' Hall.

W. J. Church, Esq., surgeon, deposed:—I have attended the Bishop professionally for some time. About two years ago I was called in to attend him for paralytic affection, from which he soon recovered: upon that occasion he lost his speech, and also the use of his arm and leg; since then I have been in daily attendance upon him, when at home. He has never had any serious illness since that time. I saw him for the last time alive on Monday, previous to his going to Bristol; he complained of no pain whatever in his head, though he said he was not well. I think any unusual exertion likely to have been attended with danger to his life, and have advised him to keep himself more quiet, and he has expressed his sorrow that he was obliged to exert himself so much. I saw him this morning about seven o'clock, when he appeared to have been dead about three or four hours. I think the cause of his death was apoplexy, united with his previous attack. On Monday he seemed in his usual health, except that he complained a little more. I never entertained an idea of his dying so suddenly; he has been keeping himself more quiet of late in accordance with my advice. I should think him about fifty-eight years of age.

The Rev. Dr. Brindle was next examined, and deposed as follows:—When the Bishop's servant came to me this morning, I was in my room dressing, he said he was afraid the Bishop was dead; I went up and felt his hand and face; they were perfectly cold; one hand was upon the bed, the other under the clothes, and he appeared to be resting a little upon one side. He had complained of numbness; he did so previous to his paralytic seizure. I did not see him after half-past eight o'clock last night. About five o'clock last evening he sent for me, and said that he felt too unwell to attend the party invited here, and begged me to take his place, and excuse him to the company. He said if he could he would come down after dinner. I dissuaded him from doing so, he being in a very exhausted state. After dinner he sent to say he could not come down, being too much fatigued; but about ten minutes afterwards he came down, which I was very sorry to see him do; he staid about a quarter of an hour. I was at Bristol yesterday; the Bishop was very much exhausted while performing the service there; his articulation, which is naturally very distinct, was not so clear as usual, nor his voice so loud as it ordinarily is. On the journey home I was in the same carriage with him, in the train; he remained quiet, but was cheerful and joked a little, but still seemed much exhausted.

This being the whole of the evidence, the Jury expressed themselves perfectly satisfied as to the cause of death, and immediately returned a verdict of "Died by the visitation of God."—Tablet.

AMERICA.

PASTORAL LETTER OF THE MOST REV., THE ARCH-BISHOP, AND THE RIGHT REV., THE BISHOPS, OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ASSEMBLED IN PROVINCIAL COUNCIL AT BALTIMORE, IN MAY, 1843, TO THE CLERGY AND LAITY OF THEIR CHARGE.

Venerable Brethren of the Clergy and Beloved Brethren of the Laity: Grace to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. * * * * *

It is our duty to make public profession of the faith, whenever the Divine honour, or the edification of your neighbour is in question, for, "with the heart we believe unto justice, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Public worship and private devotion must be regulated by the revealed law of God, as declared by his Church; for God must be worshipped in spirit and in truth. You should, therefore, never make acts of religion mere matters of courtesy, wherein the good pleasure of your fellow-men might be regarded, rather than the sovereign will of God. It is on this account, and to avoid all participation in error, that the Church commands her children not to communicate in spiritual things with those who are out of her fold. It has nevertheless come to our knowledge that the consciences of many in dependent situations are aggrieved by vexatious measures adopted to coerce them into conformity, under the penalty of wanting bread, and that in various public institutions attendance at Protestant worship is in many instances exacted of Catholics, notwithstanding the liberty of conscience which is guaranteed by the constitution to all citizens. We are aware that mere considerations of order have induced this custom, but as it is repugnant to the genius of our institutions, as well as to the spirit of our religion, we trust that the proper authorities on respectful remonstrance, will afford relief to afflicted consciences. We have seen with serious alarm, efforts made to poison the fountains of public education, by giving it a sectarian hue; accustoming children to the use of a version of the Bible made under sectarian bias, and placing in their hands books of various kinds replete with offensive and dangerous matter. This is plainly opposed to the free genius of our civil institutions. We admonish parents of the awful account they must give at the Divine tribunal, should their children, by their neglect or connivance, be imbued with false principles, and led away from the path of salvation. Parents are strictly bound, like faithful Abraham, to teach their children the truths which God has revealed; and if they suffer them to be led astray, the souls of the children will be required at their hands. Let them, therefore, avail themselves of their natural rights, guaranteed by the laws, and see that no interference with the faith of their children be used in the public schools, and no attempt made to induce conformity in anything contrary to the laws of the Catholic Church.

All societies are to be shunned by whatsoever name they may be called, the objects whereof are not distinctly declared, and wherein the solemnity of an oath, or any corresponding engagement, is employed to veil the ends of the association, or its proceedings, from the public eye. It is plainly a rash use of the name of God when the object for which it is employed is not distinctly understood; and since all just objects may be openly avowed and pursued, the mantle of secrecy is needlessly thrown around them. We would not judge unkindly of any body of men, or of any individuals, professing to have in view objects of philanthropy and mutual aid; but we cannot conceal our apprehensions, that by assuming mere natural principles as their guide, they insensibly prepare themselves for disarding revealed religion, so that some find themselves divested of faith, before they are conscious of the tendency and influence of the society with which they have connected themselves. We, therefore, feel ourselves bound to renew thus solemnly our admonitions to all who claim to be members of the Church, and to remind them of the several decrees of the sovereign pontiffs in regard to secret societies, and to declare anew that sacramental absolution cannot be lawfully or validly imparted to persons continuing to profess themselves members of such societies. We conjure all our children in Christ by his tender mercies, to shun all such associations, and through no consideration of interest or fear, to continue in a connexion so opposed to the positive laws of the Church, and so dangerous to the integrity of faith. The privileges of membership in the great society of the faithful are granted on condition of obedience to the laws of the Church; and are forfeited when acts are done to which the penalty of privation is attached.

* * * The enormous evils of intemperance, which no tongue can pourtray, have given occasion to the adoption of a remedy apparently extreme. Millions in Ireland, and many thousands in this country, have publicly pledged themselves to abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquors. We cannot but approve the determination thus taken by such as have had the misfortune to contract this dreadful vice; for we have rarely seen the drunkard reclaimed, except by the total abandonment of the occasion of his sin: we also highly applaud the generous charity and zeal of such as, through compassion for the unfortunate, have stepped forward to share with them the privation, but we deem it right to guard against the possible abuse of so excellent an institution. It must be distinctly understood and avowed that the moderate use of wine, or any other liquor, is of itself perfectly lawful, since "every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be rejected which is received with thanksgiving, for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." (1 Tim. iv. 4.) It would not be advisable to impose or to assume generally the obligation of total abstinence, since, considering human frailty, it might become a snare of souls, and change a lawful act into sin, and add to the sting of conscience the terror of despair. We will, therefore, that the pledge usually made be regarded as a resolution, which, whilst it affords to those who take it the advantages of mutual examples and prayers, imposes no new moral obligation, so that the person who should fail in its observance, sins only by excess, or by exposing himself to danger in consequence of his peculiar frailty. Let each one at the same time remember that it is only through the grace of Jesus Christ that we can effectually overcome temptation and practise virtue unto salvation. "Unless the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it; unless the Lord keep the city, he watcheth in vain that keepeth it." (Psalm cxxvi.) Let no man presume on the strength of his determination, or on the restraining influence of public opinion. The torrent of passion easily sweeps away these human barriers. Prayer, vigilance, the reception of the sacraments, and flight from the occasions of sin are necessary in order to give effect to our good purposes, which themselves must proceed from the inspiration of Divine grace, for "we are not sufficient to think anything of ourselves, as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God." (2 Cor. iii. 5.) It is on this account we warn you against uniting in societies not based on religious principles, nor directed by the ecclesiastical authority, or otherwise organized in such a way as may suppose mere human influences and means.

We deplore the enormous scandal of some who having already contracted marriage, enter into new engagements during the lifetime of their lawful consorts. Others, though few in number, have sought from the civil authority a divorce from the bond of matrimony, and have ventured to pass to a second marriage, notwithstanding the indissoluble character of the marriage tie—God having prohibited the separation of those whom He has united. We are determined to employ the severest authority of the Church against persons guilty of so heinous a crime, and to cut them off from her communion, delivering them over to Satan, that by humiliation in time, their spirit may be saved in the day of Christ.

We give thanks to God for the wonderful blessing which he has vouchsafed to his Church in these United States, where within half a century the number of bishops has increased from one to seventeen, and the latter appear to advance in piety as well as numbers. One or two painful instances of insubordination to ecclesiastical authority, which have recently occurred, are exceptions to the general docility and obedience of our flock; and we trust that the parties concerned will use all their efforts, by affectionate submission, to cause the scandal of resistance to be forgotten. Our power is given us by the Lord for edification, not for destruction; we lord it not over you, by reason of your faith; we seek your salvation, not the display of authority. The deluded men who occasionally resist the Divine ordinance, and violate the order which God has established, disturb the peace of the faithful, and spread scandal and disorder, under the pretext of defending popular rights, whilst in reality they deprive the faithful of those spiritual privileges which are their most precious inheritance. It has been already declared and defined, in the first provincial council, that the appointment and removal of pastors are the rightful prerogative of the bishop, and that it is the duty of the congregation to make a reasonable and just provision for the support of the pastor so appointed; the resistance to which right would force the bishop to a severe exercise of the ecclesiastical authority.

We cannot withhold the expression of our consolation at the success which has crowned the Apostolic labours of missionaries of the Society of Jesus in the vast regions occupied by Indian tribes, especially in the Oregon territory west of the Rocky mountains. With zeal worthy of the brightest ages of the Church, they have gone to these children of nature to civilize them, and impart to them the knowledge of salvation, and God has confirmed their word, and made it fruitful. "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings and that preacheth peace; of him that showeth forth good, that preacheth salvation, that saith to Sion: Thy God shall reign. The voice of thy watchmen: they have lifted up their voice, they shall praise together; for they shall see eye to eye when the Lord shall convert Sion. Rejoice and give praise together. O ye deserts of Jerusalem; for the Lord hath comforted His people: He hath redeemed Jerusalem. The Lord hath prepared His holy arm in the sight of all the Gentiles and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God." (Isa. lli. 7.) Whilst the sons of Ignatius emulate the Apostolic labours of Xavier, two devoted ecclesiastics from two of our dioceses have generously consecrated themselves to the salvation of the coloured emigrants from the United States in Africa, and the natives of Western Africa. Foregoing all the comforts of civilized life, they have resolutely encountered all the difficulties of an undertaking that presents no flattering prospects of success. Pressed forward by the charity of Christ, they only consider the degraded condition of man in the country marked out for their labours, and they hasten to afford him the succours of religion, content with whatever measure of success it may please God to grant to their efforts. Let us pray, beloved brethren, that a blessing may be given to the apostolic prelate now charged with this mission, and the faithful band associated with him in the arduous undertaking. Your prayers should ascend to God for this end, and your aims cannot be better applied than in enabling ministers of religion to meet the heavy expenses of their journeys and missionary establishments among the Indians and Africans. We recommend both missions to your generous charity and zeal.

Whilst we exhort you to extend your charity to the distant children of our common Father, we would not have you neglect more immediate objects. It is by placing the ecclesiastical institutions in the respective dioceses on solid foundations, that you will secure for yourselves and your children the perpetuity of the blessings wherewith it has pleased God to enrich you in Christ Jesus. Those to whom the wealth of this world has been given, cannot better employ a portion of it than in providing for the education of ministers of the altar. We are far however, from meaning to undervalue the offerings, which faith may inspire for the erection of temples to the glory of God, or charity may present for the clothing and maintenance of the orphan.

We cannot conclude without expressing our gratitude to God for the admirable change which his grace has wrought in the minds of many in England, and the effects whereof are seen even in this country. We are not disposed to exaggerate this moral revolution, or to form sanguine calculations, as to its immediate results. It is not for us to know the times or the moments which the Father has placed in his own power, but we love to hope that the days of perfect unity may be not far distant, when the nations whom the violent passions of men have torn from the bosom of the Church will return repentant, saying to each other, "Come and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us His ways, and we will walk in His paths." (Isaiah ii. 3.) At all events it is our duty to pray for so desirable an object, conformably to the example of our Divine Redeemer, who at his last supper prayed that all who believe in Him might be one, even as He and the Father are one. Brethren, if you ask the Father anything in His name, he will give it you. "If two or three of you agree together on earth concerning anything whatsoever, it shall be granted you." How much more, then, if from the two hemispheres the supplications of fervent faith and charity ascend from innumerable multitudes to obtain light for those who wander amidst errors, that they may see the whole truth, and courage that they may confess it, that with one mind and with one mouth they may with us glorify God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, "We beseech you, brethren, rebuke the unquiet; comfort the feeble-minded; support the weak; be patient towards all men." "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen."

MISCELLANEA.

ROME—At a meeting of the Roman Academy of Archeology, held on the 9th of February, and at which presided the professor Folchi, president of the illustrious academy of St. Luke, the Rev. Father H. di Ferrari, of the Dominican order, and perfect of the Casanatense Library, presented a dissertation on an ancient Latin parchment, whereon are written the fifty apostolical canons and an inedited fragment under the name of the venerable Bede. As regards the canons, Father di Ferrari showed by the characters, by the position of the words, and by other paleographical proofs, that they were written in the seventh century, before the Caroline and Teutonic letters were used, and generally before any of those characters which followed the reform introduced into calligraphy by the celebrated Alcuin in the eighth century. He rested his judgment on the authority of Mabillon de Montfaucon and other learned authors. He called the attention of his auditory to various readings which distinguish this ancient parchment, and which throw much light on several points which have been the subjects of grave discussion. The contents of this old parchment have not, as yet, been cited by any of those writers who have occupied themselves in these matters,

In the second part of his work Father di Ferrari informed the meeting that the fragment mentioned above is written in paleography of the twelfth century. Assisted by the laws of philological criticism, he began to analyze it, comparing it with the authentic works of Bede, and he showed clearly that it is entirely apocryphal, and that we cannot, with any degree of justice attribute to the illustrious similar treatises written on old parchment by the hands of unfaithful persons; yet heretics scruple not to quote them for their own purposes, although they contain erroneous expressions—expressions which Bede himself condemns in his authenticated works. In this manner the learned academician justifies the venerable Bede against the rash and false accusations by which certain men, of modern times, have sought to tarnish the fame of that great writer, who, according to Leland, is the brightest ornament of the English nation. Cardinal Castracani, honorary member of the academy, honoured the meeting with his presence.—Notizie del Giorn.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

In our sixteenth number, we established the falsehood of the assertion, that the Popes, in the sixth century, assumed unlimited temporal power. We proceed now to prove, that, the spiritual power which Catholics recognise in the successor of St. Peter, was acknowledged to belong to the Roman Pontiff from the earliest period of the Christian Church. To persons of even ordinary education, it is unnecessary to remark, that, whilst Catholics revere the spiritual authority annexed to the chair of Peter by the Divine Founder of Christianity, they also know and profess, that that authority is not unlimited, but, on the contrary, is confined within certain salutary limits, which are defined by Apostolical tradition, by ecclesiastical usage, and the received canons of the Catholic Church. In effect, the chief Pastoral authority to govern the Church was established by Christ, in a way similar to that, in which the Decalogue announces and sanctions the authority of the parent, for the government of his family, and the regulation of domestic life. In words which apparently admit of no exception, and which thus leave the power of the parent wholly unrestrained, the fourth commandment enjoins the child to honor and obey his Father and his Mother. The divine wisdom acted thus, in order to guard against the evils of a disputacious obedience, by clothing the parent with the most ample authority, leaving it to the parents own judgment and affection, to the dictates of reason and religion, and to the ordinances of society, to attemper and moderate, when necessary, the exercise of his prerogatives. Experience shows, that the evils, whatever they may be, which may have accidentally arisen from this economy, are far less injurious to the public and private welfare, than those which would inevitably arise from an enactment which, whilst it gave authority to the parent, would excite in the minds of his children distrust and apprehension of the abuse of such prerogative, by having expressly annexed to it the several restrictive clauses, by which the power of the parent ought to be moderated, in order to be salutary to his children. Treating, in his own sublime way, of the glorious prerogatives of the successor of St. Peter, and, as it were, lost in admiration of their amplitude and magnificence, the Illustrious Bossuet assimilates this wonderful institution in the order of Religion, to the stupendous grandeur and immensity of the ocean, which, boundless and unfathomable as it appears to the human eye, has nevertheless traced mysteriously but indelibly on its every shore, "Thus far shalt thou come and no farther, here shalt thou break thy swelling waves."

But to enter more directly on the examination of the statement, put forth in Mangnall's Questions, viz. that in the sixth century, the Popes assumed universal unlimited spiritual power, we may observe, that it suffices to refute the assertion, to repeat, what has been already premised, namely, that Catholics do not recognise any such power in the successor of St. Peter. Assuredly, we cannot admit the absurd hypothesis, that the Popes assumed a power, which neither Catholics nor acatholics acknowledged. For, how, or with regard to whom, could such assumed power be exercised. Not certainly with regard to acatholics, who refused altogether obedience to the Roman Pontiff. Neither, on the other hand, could it be exercised with regard to Catholics, whose principles, whilst they oblige them to reverence and obey the successor of St. Peter, in the exercise of the authority they acknowledge him to possess, equally bind them not to ascribe to him, as of divine origin, any prerogatives, save those conferred by Christ upon St. Peter.

Neither can it be supposed with any, even the least semblance of probability, that the spiritual power, which Catholics really do acknowledge in the Roman Pontiff, was first exercised by that prelate in the sixth century. For from the very fact that such power was then exercised over the universal Church by the Roman Pontiff, peaceably and without opposition, on the part of any national Church then reputed orthodox, it may be satisfactorily deduced, that the same power must have been also exercised in the fifth and in the preceding centuries. For, assuredly, the Bishops, the clergy, and, at least, the educated or well instructed portion of the Laity, who lived in the sixth century, in the several countries where Catholicity prevailed, must have learned from their predecessors in religion, whether, besides their respective, if we may so speak, domestic or national ecclesiastical tribunals, any other supreme authority existed on earth, to which they should have recourse in doubts or difficulties, which related to faith, morality or discipline. The history of the religious troubles which assailed Christianity, almost from its infancy, makes it evident, that if any such tribunal existed, various instances occurred during that period, in which that authority must have interposed, in order to crush the progress of error, and sustain the cause of truth. The very ignorance therefore, of the clergy and laity of the sixth century of the existence of such a tribunal, would, of itself, have supplied conclusive evidence, that no such authority had been established by Christ. Hence, they must have regarded any assumption of spiritual power by it, or its organ the Roman Pontiff, as a sacrilegious usurpation, which, even, at the expense of their lives, they were bound to resist. Their conduct, their writings, their public and private communications on religion would then, undoubtedly, have teemed with indignant invectives against the profane invader of the rights of the sanctuary, and with expressions of their unconquerable determination to repel the impious efforts of the usurper, and fearlessly assert the cause of Catholic truth. Whatever might be the ultimate success of their holy resistance, whether their fidelity were crowned with success, or forced to yield to the superior power of the unjust aggressor, at least, the records of the age should have preserved some vestige of their reclamation, and of all the sufferings they endured for the sake of truth. In the annals of ecclesiastical history, we find, diligently recorded, the rise and progress of the several schisms and heresies, which, for eighteen centuries, disturbed the peace of Christendom together with the names of the principal persons and events connected with these occurrences. How then could the Church history of every country in the sixth century, be wholly silent on so extraordinary an event as the assumption, at that period, of universal unlimited spiritual authority by the Roman Pontiff. Many of the incidents which are recorded in Church history are of a comparatively unimportant uninteresting character, in which neither the feelings, nor the passions or prejudices of human nature seem to have been much concerned. It is obviously quite otherwise with respect to the question of the assumption of unlimited spiritual power by a person, who, in the hypothesis now under investigation, must have been deemed a sacrilegious usurper. In such a question, not only the interests of religious truth were involved, but, moreover, all the feelings of the human breast were deeply engaged. The history of the apostles themselves shows, that the very intimation, that some one among them should preside over the rest, excited murmuring and discontent, until their divine master condescended to reconcile them to submission, by inculcating those holy principles, which moderate authority and sweeten the obligation of obedience..... "whosoever will be greater among you, let him be your minister, and he that will be first amongst you, shall be your servant." If the presence of the Saviour, who declared, that he came to minister, not to be ministered unto, although he was God of God and the Divine head of the Church, could not suppress those feelings of dislike to authority and subjection, which are so imbedded in the human heart, it surely is not too much to admit, that in six centuries after the Saviour's time, when the very diffusion of religion that occasioned, unavoidably, so many weak, not unworthy members, to be united to the mystical body of Christ, his Church, a much stronger and louder reclamation against the assumption of a superior authority by any prelate, would have been inevitably called forth. In every age and clime, the general leading or predominant feelings, passions and prejudices are the same, or rest on a similar principle, and the more degenerate human nature becomes, the more violently will it, in all places, oppose the exercise even of legitimate authority. Because corrupt human nature ever regards obedience as degrading, and authority to rule over others, as something ennobling and exalted. Hence, the greater the degeneracy of the sixth century may have been, the more vehemently would all the passions of the human breast have caused Clergy and Laity to resist any usurpation of spiritual authority by the Popes. As, then, no vestige exists of any such resistance in the Annals of the sixth century, we are warranted in concluding that the power exercised by the Popes, was recognised as just and as Apostolical.

We announce with unfeigned pleasure the gratifying intelligence, that our exemplary and amiable Vicar General has, at the unanimous recommendation of the Sacred College of Cardinals, been elevated by His Holiness to the Episcopal dignity, and appointed Coadjutor to our Venerable Archbishop. The Apostolical letters necessary to enable his Lordship to receive consecration have been forwarded to the Catholic Bishop of Cork, where Dr. Olliffe is now residing with his friends. We have reason to hope, that the interest, which our excellent prelate's consecration will excite in Ireland, and particularly in the vicinity of his native city, will conduce much to the welfare of this mission, and greatly encourage those, who are disposed in that country, to devote themselves to the service of religion in Bengal, to place themselves at once under the direction of a superior, whose piety, prudence and zeal have been so signally honored by the Holy See.

THE LACKERSTEEN FAMILY.

The pleasing duty also devolves on us of announcing, that the Sovereign Pontiff, in consideration of the great services to religion, and unceasing generosity to our several institutions, of the respected family of Messrs. John Lackersteen and Brothers, has been graciously pleased to honor with the title of Count, Mr. J. Lackersteen, and to decorate with the insignia of Chevalier of the Golden Spur. Mr. C. R. Lackersteen, and his brother William, with those of Chevalier of the illustrious order of St. Gregory. His Holiness from a desire to testify how deeply he appreciates the parental virtues of the mother, who, a widow, reared up so many sons, all of whom rival each other in their exertions to advance the great cause of Catholicity, has further conferred on Madame Lackersteen a like dignity to that with which her eldest son has been honored. The title of Count is, according to the patent of His Holiness, to descend in perpetuity to the eldest son of Mr. J. Lackersteen, provided his descendants in that line continue to profess the Catholic faith. Thus, we see, with what parental solicitude the Holy Father watches over all that concerns the welfare of Catholicity in Bengal, and how eagerly he profits of every opportunity to promote the honor of its clergy and people. For the honor thus paid to any individual member of our Clergy or Laity contributes to elevate all the faithful of the Church of Bengal, and supplies a strong incentive to emulate those virtues, which have been thus deservedly rewarded.

SERAMPORE.

We have learnt with much pleasure, that the amiable and accomplished lady of Capt. Henry Fitzsimon, 29th N. I. Barrackpore, has presented the Church of Serampore with a large, fine-toned bell, which the Rev. Mr. Rabascall purchased, at her request, from the Danish Government. Amidst the improvements and embellishments which are at present going on in the Catholic establishments at Serampore, the accession of such a gift is equally valuable and well-timed, and we take this opportunity to acknowledge our sense both of the liberality and good taste evinced in its donation.

CONVERSIONS.

Within the last few days a European woman in Calcutta, a Protestant, was received into the Catholic Church by the Rev. Mr. Cuvelier, S. J.

On last Sunday, at Chandernagore, a native woman was baptized by Rev. Mr. Boulogne, S. J. Her children are all being brought up in the Catholic religion.

Two Protestants at Secunderabad were recently received into the Catholic Church.

ARCHBISHOP OF GOA AND BISHOP OF MACAO.

From a letter lately received from the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, we have been allowed to make the following extract, which, we know, will give great pleasure to many of our readers:—

“Matters have been so far arranged with Portugal, that the Patriarch of Lisbon (in the consistory of the 19th June) has been made Cardinal, a new Archbishop has been appointed for Goa in the person of Father Silva de Torres, a Benedictine, who has made his profession of faith in the hands of Nuncio at Lisbon, and a Bishop has also been named for Macao, viz. Padre Borgia. But the Brief “MULTA PRÆCLARE” remains unaltered.”

To THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa, &c. &c.

Calcutta.

MY LORD.—Since my last, I have seen in the Catholic Herald your elevation to the Archiepiscopacy of Edessa, and I sincerely rejoice, and offer you my felicity on your exaltation. I have been a little late in my offer of congratulation, but circumstances prevented my offering it sooner. Your elevation has, indeed, been very suitable and in good time—your immense labors for the good of religion since your arrival in India, and especially from the period when you took charge of the important Vicariate of Bengal, required that his Holiness should not merely confer on you, marks of his paternal good-will, as such limited favors would not be in conformity with the sentiments of esteem and consideration, which his Holiness entertained for your exertions and the success with which it was crowned. It was necessary, that you should have a more substantial monument, and it has been given, as the world knows, to the true personal merit of him who has obtained it. It was also necessary, that the Metropolitan Government of India should have an Archbishop for its Vicar Apostolic, with a view to prove to the world that his Holiness, in his goodness, knows how to confer dignities agreeably to circumstances and the temper of the times.

I have read in the Catholic Herald of this month, the letter addressed to your Lordship by Monseigneur Cajitano Antonio, with regard to the reception of his brief from Rome. I have also seen in the same number the article extracted from the Ceylon Observer. Monseigneur Cajitano Antonio arrived here on the 20th instant, accompanied by two Chaplains and seven Domesticates. He arrived here in a Brig engaged for his voyage. His Lordship came to receive the Episcopal consecration at my hands—this sacred office was performed yesterday in our Church—the congregation, consisting both of Malabars and Europeans, was great. The Governor assisted, and the ceremony throughout was attended with much piety and devotion. Monseigneur Cajitano has already passed the meridian of life—he spent 32 years of his Mission at Ceylon;—he seems disposed to establish a seminary at Ceylon for the education of young Catholics—he returns to-morrow at 4 p. m.

One of our recently arrived Missionaries from Europe, who assisted at the ceremony of the consecration of his Lordship, having seen an article in the Catholic Herald of the 9th instant on the nomination of his Lordship of Usula, has drawn out a report of the consecration, with a view of sending it to the Editor of the Herald by way of a supplement to the article noticed. I enclose the letter opened, in order that you may see whether it is worthy of being forwarded to its direction.

I take advantage of this opportunity to acquaint your Lordship that the sacred Congregation, in a letter dated the 18th July last, have authorized the exchange hic et nunc of our Mission to the North of Palar, with that of Madras to the South of the said River.

I have written of this to Monseigneur Fennelly—I hope the exchange will not experience any obstacles.

I expect that I shall have an opportunity in 15 or 20 days hence, to forward to your Lordship a copy of the Latin and Tamulic Grammar of Father Beschi, which we have just reprinted with some additions, to simplify the principles laid down by Father Beschi, which had not been sufficiently developed in the work.

I have no doubt, my Lord, that your Lordship, who has so much the good of our religion and the progress of our Institutions at heart, will hear with much satisfaction that we have placed our seminary at Malabar on a better footing. We have drawn out regulations which place it upon as sure foundations as the small seminaries in France; there will be taught in it Latin, French, History, Geography, Arithmetic and Logic. I assembled at my place the principal Malabar Christians, and imparted to them all our designs and expectations to provide for their children an education, which will enable them to occupy situations of respectability and distinction in society and under the Government of India. An education, at the same time, which will develop to them the principles of religion and the means of observing them. We expect that this our new Establishment will be productive of much good in this place. You know, my Lord, that the Malabars of Pondichery are very quick in imbibing knowledge. On the 17th of July last we commenced Instructions in our seminary upon the new regulations. There are 43 students, mostly of distinguished Malabar Christian families. We have also another school for the French language, which boasts of 30 scholars. It is in an apartment contiguous to the seminary.

About two months ago, I forwarded to Monsr. Tesson, one of the Directors of our seminary at Paris and the Procureur of our Mission, the statistics of our Vicariate, together with the particulars of our Administration of 1842. The statistics, which I have forwarded, are not precisely those of the limits of the Vicariate Apostolic of Pondichery, but those of the Mission which we administer since 1838, that is, since the publication of the Bull multa præclare. Your Lordship must know, that actually our administration extends over two large districts, forming a portion of the Vicariate Apostolic of Madras, and that presided over by the Jesuit Fathers which is to be added to the Vicariate of Pondichery—Our Mission, considered as I have stated, consists of 18 districts, which are designated by their chief places—they are the districts of Pondichery, of Tran-quebar, of Karikal, of Negapatam, of Tanjore, of Combaconam, of Solema, of Coimbatie, of Palghat, of Nelherries, of Seringapatam of Bangalore, of Ponganoor, of Guntoor, of Kitchery, of Vellore, of Attupacakam and of Cingleput.—Thus our Mission has actually 18 Districts, and consists of 114,939 Christians. One Vicar Apostolic, one Coadjutor elect, 24 European Priests, 4 Malabar Priests, 113 Churches, 221 Chapels, 102 Catechists, 164 Covilpoulays, 37 Schools, 1 Seminary, 3 Convents, 2 Hospitals, and 47 Catechumens. In 1842, there were 52,408 persons who confessed, 5,981 confirmed, 4,298 Infant Baptisms, and 409 Baptisms of Adults, 36 Gentiles baptized on their death bed, 819 received Extreme Unction, 1213 the Marriage Benediction and 23 abjured heresy. Excuse me, my Lord, for the liberty I have taken in addressing you this long letter upon the affairs of our Mission. The interest you take with regard to us, will I hope admit of some indulgence. Offer, I beg, my sincere respect to those who are with you.

I remain, My Lord,
Your Lordship's Most Obedt. Servt.

CL. BONNAND.

Bishop of Drusipare. V. A.

Pondichery 25th Sept. 1843.

THE CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF USULA.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald

SIR,—I have perused in your esteemed journal of the 9th instant, the edifying details you gave of the nomination of Monsigneur Cajetano Antonio, Vicariate Apostolic of Ceylon, with the title of Bishop of Usula. It will not be, I believe without interest to Catholics to make known the details of the consecration of this venerable prelate, which has taken place this day in the Foreign Missionary Church at Pondichery.

Last Wednesday, on its being announced that the Bng engaged for his Lordship Cajetano Antonio was coming in, with the Rev. Messrs. Mathews and Casimiro of the congregation of St. Philip of Neri, Monsigneur Drusipare, whom the Vicar Apostolic elect had chosen for his consecrator, immediately sent the pro-vicar of the Mission with another Missionary to visit his Lordship. Soon afterwards the tolling of the bells announced his safe arrival, and he was received by the Bishop with the welcome which his dignity deserved, joined with that generous charity which has been always entertained by all the Bishops in the world, especially by Bishops of the same faith. There was something very striking in what had occurred to-day in India, to see a prelate stranger to our body and to our nation, come with a brotherly confidence to ask of our worthy bishop the sacred unction by which our Holy Apostolic Church establishes a prelate a prince of the people of Israel. Various motives would have induced him to apply elsewhere for this consecration, but the recent visit of our respectable pro-vicar to the island of Ceylon had made the clergy of that Island appreciate the spirit with which the conduct of our congregation is every where regulated—a spirit of peace and unity, the sole foundation of actual benefit to the people. It was, doubtless, this, that determined Monsigneur Cajetano Antonio to choose Pondichery for the scene of his consecration; almost the whole of the people of Pondichery witnessed the ceremony—a ceremony so well adapted to reanimate the faith of Christians, and to kindle in the hearts of those less fortunate the desire of belonging to that Church which is at once the Mother and Mistress of all the faithful on earth. There was a great concourse of Christians,—among whom could be seen many persons of distinction of both the Malabars and the European communities. The Malabars came there to offer their homage to a Bishop of their own race, an Indian exalted by the Supreme Pontiff to the rank of judge of the people. The French were there actuated as well by their piety as by a desire to express their obligation to Monsigneur Cajetano Antonio for his choice of this place for his consecration, which must necessarily have gladdened the hearts of the people;—and their gratitude was very sensibly testified by the presence of the Governor General of our possessions in India who made it his particular pleasure in this instance to accept the invitation of our Bishop.

The consecration of the Bishop elect—which was conducted with great solemnity, was a circumstance not only of much gratification to the faithful, but likewise in a great measure tended to their edification; during the ceremony the heart felt itself softened by devotion and drawn to pray for this new Prelate, that he be armed with the zeal and faith which should ever animate an apostle of so important a mission, with the spirit of devotedness to the Holy Roman Catholic Church as the stay of christianity, and the glory of her children, and with the spirit of prudence and moderation which influences the obedience of those presided over—Virtues which now so eminently shine in the person of him who fills the chair of St. Peter, and the prayer was the more earnest in begging the blessing of the almighty on the elect, from the consideration of the state of our Church in India and the circumstances under which we are placed. The consecration of a Bishop, Indian by birth, and Portuguese by education, is of itself a prominent proof of the tenderness with which the Holy Father watches over and recompenses the truly faithful of the Portuguese nation, who have not allowed themselves to be seduced away from the path of obedience. This happy event seems to us as the harbinger of better days,—days of peace and consolation, which we are now called upon to pray for in behalf of that unhappy country where the demon of evil is still paramount—days, the brightest which will scatter the clouds, and shine all refulgent over every region of the earth—days, the happiest which will unite all the nations of the East in the bonds of the same faith, same hope, same charity and which will inspire this union with feelings,—the guiding principles of the primitive Christians,—of Brotherly Love.

Accept, Mr. Editor, the sentiments of my profound respect.

Your most obedient servant,
LUQUET, Apostolic Missionary,

Pondichery, on the day of our Lady of Mercy.

THE GLORY OF THE BLESSED IN HEAVEN.

Oh! ye blest Angels and pure Saints above
Look on me from your realms of light and love,
To which I upward gaze through sorrows tears
With all a mortal's earnest hopes and fears,
With all that sense of wretchedness and sin
Which those must feel who scan the heart within,
And contrast all that was that earth displays
With heaven's bliss Oh! bring celestial rays
From the Almighty's throne in your high sphere
To form a halo round me even here,
To cheer my lonely hours with visions blest
Of endless glory, of eternal rest,
And to dispel the mist of sin and woe,
And make each spot a heaven here below

ST. XAVIER'S AND SEAL'S COLLEGE.

We notice with much interest the completion of the arrangements under which the College of St. Xavier's, and Seal's College, which is conducted by preceptors of the same class as those who preside at the former place of instruction,—will ere long commence the full exercise of that influence, which they are so well calculated to maintain and extend in the matter of moral and scientific education. It is indeed most highly to the credit of the Calcutta community that so marked a success as that which attends the use and progress of St. Xavier's, should have been greatly produced by the pecuniary support afforded by all classes towards the construction of fitting buildings attached to the College itself, and destined to facilitate the business of education.

We have on several occasions noticed the nature and system of the educational course pursued by the brethren of the Fraternity of Jesus. They are all of them men who, undertaking to teach, do not so without having studied the science of tuition. It is in their character of teachers only, that we have to do with them. Their religious opinions, the discipline of their order, the mode of their internal governance, has nothing to do with the view we take of their labours. We look upon them simply in their character of Apostles of secular knowledge, a title which they have by their self-denial in the course of administering it amid all dangers and difficulties, most richly and deservedly earned. Their merit in this respect is most undoubted. They are poor and learned men, not content only with the acquisition of knowledge themselves, but unsatisfied until they have, by study and tuition, obtained acquaintance with the mode in which their knowledge may be best communicated to others. Doubly qualified as scholars and as teachers, these men go forth into all lands, single, careless of worldly goods, looking only to fulfil (in so far as we are concerned with them) the object of their educational mission. They are enthusiasts in the profession they have adopted, and, as is almost always the case with self-denying enthusiasm, are successful to a degree in propagating that first element of civilization, knowledge. The progress of St. Xavier's shows how efficiently their educational system is conducted: the nature of the courses of study laid down there for boys, and adapted to their intellects by a judicious simplification of the sterner portions of elementary drudgery in science, is amply set forth, in the programme of their examinations: their success has been singular without a parallel; and the voice of public opinion is with them, as to the substantial and essential utility of all the branches of instruction to which they have specially applied themselves.

While such is the case with a body of Jesuit teachers, why are we in this colony, where the English Protestant Church is the established one, without evidence of commensurate success in the conduct of general education by the ministers of that Church, or by those secular persons employed under their superintendence? Why is Protestant education costly at once in effectuation, and poor in result? Why is the secular instruction by Catholics cheaply purchased, and excellent when obtained? We have before adverted to this subject, and at some length without hearing a word of comment, reply, or explanation from the parties whose duty it should have been to answer the objective nature of our query. Shall we say that the constitution of our educational Protestant body is defective? If it be not, why should the question we have just put require to be asked? What is there in Protestant education, which renders it requisite that the horn-buck should be taught by persons in the receipt of emoluments which, as compared with the elementary character of their duty, are enormous? The hundred rupees a month which supports a third (uninstructed) teacher in our schools, suffices for the maintenance in the colleges where Catholics are teachers, for the support of four men, whereof one shall lecture in higher branches of mathematics, another in experimental philosophy, a third in metaphysics, a fourth in rhetoric, or the languages of Continental Europe. There is something unsound in this as respects our system. Men may profess to teach as a means whereby they may themselves live; and in the so doing they must look to that by which they live not to that for which they should live. The object of a man highly paid with reference to his employment in education cannot be so much pride in the result of his tuition upon others, as profit in his being able at so small an amount of trivial labour to secure so large a return of personal advantage. He on the other hand, who has no personal stimulus beyond the glory of success with those he teaches, is happier when instructing in the abstruser sciences upon a bare subsistence, than he would be if employed in conducting a subordinate class: the profit in a worldly sense is to him nothing; feeling himself capable to communicate instruction, he seeks to lead his pupils towards the higher branches in which he is conversant, and his reward is their proficiency.

The above considerations are mere casual remarks upon a most grave and important subject, which will day by day assume a higher, and a more important character. The gist of them is the comparison on different systems of the value of knowledge communicated, the cost at which it is obtained, and the educational principle upon which the art of teaching is respectively conducted. We, Tros Tyrinus, submit the question dispassionately to our readers, without a prejudice or a fancy on the abstract point to divert us from the calmest argumentation upon the general subject. We recommend it specially to the notice of our Protestant Clerical readers interested in the progress of education in India, and we trust that it will not be passed over by the contributors to and editors of those graver periodical publications, which make the instruction of youth an incidental subject of their lucubrations. Satisfied with having originated the consideration of the question, we shall for the present abstain from going deeper into it, unless the continued neglect of those by whom it should be rightly and practically discussed, shall oblige us to revert to its notice.

RESTITUTION MONEY.

From the Madras Catholic Expositor, Oct 1843.

We publish the following, at the request of the Right Rev. Doctor Fennelly, who is anxious to convey to the parties concerned, through the most convenient if not the only channel of communication, all reasonable assurances, that His Lordship has fulfilled the trust confided to him.

The publication may perhaps also have the additional advantage of reminding others of their duty, who retain unjustly the property of their neighbour, whether the acquisition was originally lawful or not. In vain has the Saviour died for him, who will not restore what belongs to his neighbour, whether Christian, Jew, Mahomedan or Heathen. In vain does he confess his sins; in vain does he shed tears of repentance, if the determinations still continue in his heart to retain his neighbour's property against the reasonable wishes of the owner, his sins shall not be forgiven.

CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL.

Madras, 15th September, 1843.

To A. I. CHERRY Esq.

Sub-Treasurer to the Government, Fort St. George.

SIR,

I have the honor to forward per bearer the sum of Rupees (500) five hundred "restitution money," which I received through one of the priests under my jurisdiction; and I will feel much obliged, if you will have the kindness to credit the "Honorable Company" for the amount, and, for the satisfaction of the parties concerned, to send me an acknowledgement of your having done so.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,
+ J. FENNELLY.

FORT ST. GEORGE, GENERAL TREASURY, 15th Sept. 1843. Received into the Hon'ble Company's Cash, from the Right Reverend Doctor J. Fennelly, the sum of Company's Rupees (500 0 0) Five hundred, described by his Lordship in his letter to me of this date, as "restitution money," received through one of the Priests under His Lordship's Episcopal Jurisdiction.

Sub-Treasurer.

THE MARQUESS OF TWEEDDALE'S LIBERALITY.

The following correspondence seems to demand no introductory observation from us. It speaks for itself. On the ninth of January last, the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly hearing that the Governor, out of the funds to the credit of the late Mr. Woolley's bequest, had given a donation of 5,000 rupees to the Blacktown Protestant Asylum, to which Lord Elphinstone in 1839 gave 10,000 out of the same funds; and as His Lordship was supporting and educating 30 distressed children of European parents, whilst in the Blacktown school there were only six, he thought he had reasonable grounds to hope, that a mere statement of the fact would be enough to induce the Noble Marquess, in his public and official capacity, if not to render equal justice to Her Majesty's ever loyal though much calumniated Catholic subjects, at least to make some effort to conceal his bigotry by ordering a small donation to the Catholic Orphan asylum. On the same day the bishop made another request. The Catholic Cathedral required some repairs, and his Lordship wishing to know the probable amount of expenses which might be required, thought the Governor would not refuse the services of an engineer to estimate the repairs of a church, in which accommodation was afforded to the British troops: particularly as the favour demanded was not unprecedented.

The Marquess of Tweeddale, in the true spirit of a double-twilled Protestant, who frequents the Kirk in the evening and the High Church in the morning, and combines whatever is anti-catholic in both—rejected both of the Popish petitions, and then bethought himself, that some apology was necessary for so flagrant an outrage against justice in a public personage. Accordingly the Accountant General's office was ransacked for the crumbs which fell off the Hon'ble Company's table into the hands of Catholics from the date of Dr. O'Connor's arrival in India, to the 1st of April, 1842. After some weeks a bulky document issues from the Accountant General's. Every little makes a muckle, and so it was in this instance. The sum total professes to be 37,039 13-3. (They did well to bring in the three pice.) Whether the Noble Marquess was more grieved at so large an expenditure of the public money for Catholic purposes, or whether he wished it to be more, to serve his present purpose, we cannot say. The reader may judge from the following.—

ECCLIASTICAL DEPARTMENT.

No. 39

Extract from the Minutes of Consultation,
Dated 28th February, 1843.

Read the following letters from THE RIGHT REV. DR. J. FENNELLY.

Here enter 9th January, 1843.

Para 1. Adverting to the considerable grants made from time to time for the benefit of the Roman Catholic community under this presidency, as exhibited in the annexed statement, and to the increased allowances permanently granted to clergymen of that persuasion under the orders of Govt. of the 11th January, 1836, the Government has done all that is incumbent on them to perform. Under this view, and in justice to the claims of other classes of the Inhabitants, the Most Honourable the Governor in Council considers himself to be restricted from complying with the Right Reverend Dr. Fennelly's application for public aid in furtherance of the repairs of the Roman Catholic Cathedral.

2 On the same grounds his Lordship in Council is precluded from acceding to the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly's application for a further donation in aid of the Roman Catholic Schools under his charge, in addition to the 5,000 Rupees already granted from the funds of the late Mr. Woolley, at the disposal of Government.

CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL,

MADRAS. 19th April 1843.

TO J. F. THOMAS, Esq.

Acting Chief Secretary to the Government.

SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge extract from the minutes of consultation, dated 28th February last, in reply to my applications of 9th January preceding.

I have the honor to acknowledge a very interesting enclosure, intitled "A statement of the sums disbursed towards the erections and repairs of Roman Catholic churches or chapels, as well as donations from Government, and from the late Mr. Woolley's bequest, to that body, from September, 1835, to April, 1842."

If that statement had been accompanied by a corresponding statement of the sums disbursed by government for the benefit of the Kirk and of the High Church Establishment, the document would be to me still more highly interesting, particularly if the returns were not limited to a period of six years and eight months, but were extended to a remoter date, so as to take in the time, when many things yet remained to be done, which a pious government could not yet do for Protestant Establishments.

Such a document comprising a period of, say, six and forty in stead of six years, might be found not altogether unprofitable to the Most Honorable the Governor in Council himself in determining his judgment as to the decision he should deem it right to give on my respectful and reasonable applications of the 9th of January. And if such a document, reaching back to a remote period, after giving much trouble to the writers in the Accountant General's and other offices, should turn out not over creditable to the Honorable Company or to the Government of former days, I know of no one who would more promptly retrieve the public honor by another and liberal instalment of tardy justice to the poor Catholic Soldiers than the present Governor. But the evidence, it appears, has not been furnished to him. Two important items in the above-mentioned statement, although under the control of government are not properly speaking, derived, from the Honorable Company's revenues. The sum of 2100 Rupees which was paid by the commissioner in Mysore at the rate of 300 Rupees per annum to a certain clergyman in the Mysore territory,—was regularly paid by the Rajah himself for many years before his revenues were handed over to the care of a commissioner. It does not appear therefore quite correct, to claim for the Honorable Company entire credit for this item. The same may be said of the sum of 5000 Rupees granted by the kindness of Lord Elphinstone, from the late Mr. Woolley's bequest for the maintenance and education of distressed children descended of European Parents.

Far be it from me to call in question the correctness of any judgment pronounced by the Governor with the aid and advice of the intelligent, and, I will add, experienced persons who compose his council. Yet I will acknowledge with all due candour, and respect, that when the said statement reached me I doubted for a moment its authenticity, as well as that of the decision of which it is made the basis. Some weeks have since passed over, and in reading the decision of the government afresh, and the statement, which they in their wisdom deemed it necessary to furnish in justification of that decision; my surprise, I confess, remains undiminished, and rather than acknowledge such a justification of such a decision, in refusal of a reasonable request, to have emanated from the governor of this great presidency with the advice of intelligent counsellors, I have imagined various improbable hypothesis.

I will not lose time by dwelling on considerations of comparatively minor importance. I will not complain that the expense of building the partition wall between the Protestant and Catholic Burial ground at Madras is charged in the statement furnished, as if that expense were exclusively incurred for Catholic purposes. Neither will I complain that the enlargement of St. Mary's (Protestant) burial ground is black and white in the same statement; although it ought to be known in the Accountant General's Office, that the enlargement of a Protestant burial ground ought not to be introduced, as an item of charge, in a return professing to be "A statement of donations granted by the Government to the Roman Catholic community."

I will also pass over the sum 91 Rs. 3 as. 11 P. granted by Government for repairing the injuries occasioned to the so-called Roman Catholic church on the summit of St. Thomas' Mount by the falling of the flag staff in a storm. If the government flag staff had been the occasion of injury to a private house or to a Pagan temple compensation for the amount of injury, I presume, would not be withheld, and in my humble opinion, whatever may be thought at the Accountant General's Office, the heathen in such case would be just as well entitled to compensation as the Christian. At all events the expenditure in question was no more for the benefit of the Roman Catholic community than if the same sum of money was expended in repairing Westminster Abbey. Like Westminster Abbey, the little church at the Summit of St. Thomas' Mount was once a Roman Catholic church but—like that stupendous monument of science and of religion in the good old English Catholic times—it has been diverted from its original destination.

I would not advert to these things at all, were it not for the purpose of showing the most honorable the Governor in Council what an effort was made in the Accountant General's Office to rake and scrape together a something, which an Anti-Catholic imagination might mistake for ample compensation to the Roman Catholic Soldiers, after so many years of ignominy, degradation, and apparently unjust neglect. The zealous clerks of the Accountant General were, it would appear, sore pressed to bolster up a good case, when they could not dispense with the amount of compensation made by Government for the injury occasioned by the falling of a flag staff. To charge us with the entire expense of the wall of separation between the Protestant and Catholic burial ground at Madras, was shaving close enough. But there is evidence of ingenuity as well as of industry in bringing into the same account a case in which the honor or the honesty of Government was more or less involved. But the best of all, is to charge us with the enlargement of a Protestant burial ground.

I will now assume every tittle of that return to be correct—which it is not. I will admit, although it is not true, that in six years and eight months, the sum of Rupees 37039, 13, 3 was disbursed from the Honorable Company's treasury for the benefit of the Roman Catholic community. That sum, great as it may appear in Madras currency, is considerably less than the expense of building, in many instances, one Protestant Church, of which we have in this Presidency, upwards of twenty built exclusively at the public expense. The building of the Scotch Kirk alone has cost the government more than eight times 37,000 Rupees, whilst the annual salaries and allowances of the clergymen attached to that one church are nearly three times the amount allowed by Government for the attendance of Catholic clergymen at all the military stations.

There yet remain several military stations at which the Catholic soldier and the civil servant remain deprived of spiritual consolation; although many years have gone by since Protestant churches were built and chaplains appointed at the same Stations. The Catholics at Arcot, and Tanjore, and Ootacamund, and Mangalore, and Quilon, and Palamcottah, and Masulipatam, and Jaulnauth are left unprotected to this day with the consolations of Religion, whilst the same stations have long since been provided with Protestant churches and chaplains. The increased allowances permanently granted to Catholic clergymen under the orders of the government of the 11th January, 1836, if brought into one sum total, will not exceed the salary and allowances of one Protestant chaplain, whilst nearly thirty Protestant chaplains are comfortably located on the Madras Establishment, and there are only twelve military stations at which a Catholic Priest receives an inadequate recompense for his labour and services.

So long as the religious feelings of the Catholic soldiers continue to be underrated, as the document furnished to me on the 23rd February last under-rates them, and so long as the same tender feelings are, in so many places, disregarded; the Most Honorable the Governor in Council must not blame me nor the Catholic community, if we look upon the sum of Rupees 37,000 as an instalment of tardy justice, which never can produce a genial overflow of gratitude, until the remaining instalments are paid up. Justice is yet, in my opinion, but half done, and the Government is more interested than I am in the accomplishment of the other half. The Established Church has every thing to lose and nothing to gain by such comparison as I am here called upon to make. The blood of the Catholic Soldier has been poured out as willing, as copiously and as ruddy as that of the Protestant, the Presbyterian, or the infidel, whenever and wherever the honor of the British crown demanded the greatest earthly sacrifice that man can make—the sacrifice of life. And why should the Catholic alone be kept in disgrace, when the religious feelings of the Heathens are respected? When the British treasury is drawn largely upon, in order to make reparation of honor to a Pagan temple, it is not too much to expect that the living temples of the Holy Ghost be respected. The Glory of British arms would be tarnished, it appears, if the sandalwood gates of Somnauth were not restored even at a great expense to the public; and when the Catholic Soldier is entering the field of death, no accommodation however cheap, however simple, is to be provided to enable him to prepare after his own fashion for his appearance at the bar of divine justice. If a Catholic clergyman volunteer his services and travel a long journey at his own expense for the sake of the poor neglected soldiers, he must sit down under the canopy of Heaven to minister to them the consolations of religion. But this is not all. There is a yet a greater grievance and one which is maintained with the greatest obstinacy. When the brave Catholic Soldier pours out his heart's blood, for the honor of his Queen and his country, his hisping children are invariably kidnapped into the Military Asylums, where they learn to blaspheme the religion of their father without knowing what it was.

Lord Elphinstone, whose benevolence was greater than his power to do good, contributed somewhat to alleviate this last grievance by his kind donation of 5,000 Rupees from the late Mr. Woolley's bequest, which was then at his disposal. There were at that time in our institutions thirty distressed children such as Mr. Woolley contemplated, whilst no more than six were in the Black Town School, to which double that sum was awarded. The Most Honourable the Governor in Council I am informed, has lately given a new donation of 5,000 Rupees to the Protestant asylum of Black Town. The funds of that institution were thus made treble the donation of Lord Elphinstone, from the late Mr. Woolley's bequest, to the Catholic Orphanage. In these circumstances I entertained no doubt of obtaining an additional donation for the Catholic Orphan Asylum. I did not imagine that the Most Honourable the Governor in Council would consider six Protestant children worthy of Rupees 15,000, and thirty Catholic children only worthy of Rupees 5,000, that is to say, one child educated a Protestant is of more importance than fifteen children educated Catholics. I wonder did the Duke of Wellington think so in the Peninsular wars. His Lordship in Council can best tell, and therefore I beg to refer to him the kind re-consideration of my case.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

+ J. FENNELLY.

BAPTIST MINISTERS AND FATHER MATHEW.

At a Meeting in London of several Tee-total Societies the Rev. JABEZ BURNS said that their respected friend, Father Mathew, after procuring five millions of Total Abstiners in Ireland, had kindly come over to England in order to rescue the people of that country from the vice of intemperance. He looked upon that rev. gentleman as the father of the human species; and as a prophet, resembling the one who was sent to Nineveh. He (Mr. Burns) had been a Total Abstainer during six years, but he had taken the pledge again from Father Mathew, although he (Mr. Burns) was a Baptist minister. (Loud cheers.) The Rev. Mr. Moore had got the start of him, but he (Mr. Burns) had been the second to take the pledge publicly from Father Mathew. (Renewed cheers.)

The Rev. JOHN MOORE here most cordially shook hands with the rev. gentleman, exclaiming, "Let no one say for the future that a Catholic priest cannot love and respect Protestant clergyman." (Cheers.)

The Rev. J. BURNS (in continuation): Some persons objected to taking the pledge from Father Mathew, because he was a Catholic priest; but he (Mr. Burns) considered that that rev. gentleman occupied a higher and a prouder position than any other man in the world. Father Mathew was—it was true—a Catholic priest, but he was a priest who would shine like a star for all eternity in Heaven. (Enthusiastic and prolonged applause.) The rev. gentleman, after calling for, and obtaining, three hearty cheers for the "great Apostle of Temperance," retired amidst unequivocal demonstrations of respect and esteem.—Tablet.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH

On Thursday last the sacred and interesting ceremony of the opening of the truly magnificent convent of Loretto, at Dalkey, took place. At half-past 11 o'clock, a solemn high mass commenced, assisted by one of the finest choirs we have heard; it was composed of the sweetest voices, and of a harp, piano, and organ. The Rev. Doctor Gaffney, Dean of Maynooth College, was high priest; Rev. James Cavanagh, deacon; Rev. M. Mullaly, sub-deacon; and Rev. Peter Powell, chaplain to the convent, was master of the ceremonies.

After the first gospel, the Rev. Thomas O'Carroll, of St. Andrew's church, Westland-row, delivered a striking and most apposite discourse. His text was from the 79th psalm, verses 15 and 16—"Turn again, O God of hosts; look down from heaven, and see and visit this vineyard, and perfect the same which the right hand hath planted."

The attendance was not only numerous but highly respectable. Many families of distinction were present, and a considerable number of Protestant gentlemen and ladies also attended.

In addition to the clergymen already named, we noticed the Rev. Dr. Callan, the Rev. Mr. Sheridan, P.P., Rev. Mr. Byrne, Rev. Mr. Hopkins, Rev. Mr. Gordon, of Niagara, Rev. Mr. Scully, and Rev. Mr. McGarry.

This large and massive building commenced on the 20th of May, 1842, and has been thus completed in the unusually short period of fourteen months. It is, beyond all comparison, the finest building of the kind in the three kingdoms.

RECENT CHARGES.

Speaking of the constitution of the society, Ranke says, "But there is yet another constitution (c. vi. 5) by which even the commission of sin may be commanded. 'Visum est nobis in Domino, nullas constitutiones, declarationes, vel ordinem ullum vivendi posse obligationem ad peccatum mortale vel veniale inducere, nisi superior ea in nomine Domini Jesu Christi, vel in virtute obedientie juberet.' One can hardly believe one's eyes when one reads such things!" (Note to p. 298, vol. i. French ed.) But what things are they? Why, simply this, that the ordinary rules of the house were not binding under pain of sin, unless the superior should order it otherwise in virtue of obedience;—that is, the society in its ordinary condition was governed by certain rules and regulations, which there was much merit and advantage in observing, as conducive to good order and regularity, edification, &c. But St. Ignatius, not desiring to impose too heavy a yoke upon his followers, left them free in all matters which did not militate against their three vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience. If they observed the rule and order of living which was prescribed, so much the better; but if not, there was no sin in the infraction, unless the superior stood upon his authority, and enforced it as a duty of obedience. Nothing more reasonable in itself, or more simply or clearly expressed in the constitutions. But Ranke saw through a discoloured medium, misconstrued his Latin, and was perhaps happy in the mistake. Still it was unpardonable in him to make it. For, however it might seem at first sight to the inexperienced and unpracticed eye, yet Ranke, with a mind accustomed to reason, must have seen sufficient in the very constitutions from which he quotes, and in St. Ignatius's letter on obedience, which he quotes also, to have given him a strong suspicion that he was in error. These ought to have convinced him, indeed, that no such interpretation could be put upon the passage, let the words stand as they would, seeing that such interpretation was at direct variance with the context. Among the very rules upon which he grounds this crying accusation, he must have seen, 1°. "But also they must endeavour to be resigned interiorly, and to have a true abnegation of their own will and judgment; conforming their will and judgment wholly to the superior's will and judgment, in all things where there appears no sin." (Rule 31.) 2°. And in St. Ignatius's letter on obedience to the fathers in Portugal, to which he likewise refers, he must have seen also the following quotation from St. Bernard: "Whether God, or man his substitute, command anything, we must obey with equal diligence, and perform it with like reverence, provided man commands nothing that is contrary to God." And 3°. in the same letter: "Wherefore this manner of subjecting our understanding, so as, without questioning, to sanction, and command within ourselves whatsoever the superior commands, is not only a common practice amongst holy men, but also to be imitated by all who are desirous of perfect obedience, in all things where manifestly there appears no sin."

How Ranke could see all this, and yet fall into the egregious blunder he has committed, can, we apprehend, only be accounted for by the blindness of prejudice. And it must indeed have been a strange delusion that could so far rob him of his reason, as to induce him to believe that in constitutions so carefully and cautiously drawn up, one rule should not only so pointedly contradict the other, but should also utterly belie the solemnly-expressed opinions of their author. Could a society so celebrated for its prudence, and, as some would say, for its cunning, so far forget itself as to publish to an inquisitive and censorious world, a code of laws so wholly offensive to religion and morality, which it was their professed object to promote, and which must assuredly and most justly, expose it to the indignation and execration of mankind, and thus damn itself in its very infancy? Is it possible he could have reasoned otherwise? There was more than enough to create suspicion, suspicion demanded inquiry, and inquiry would have corrected his mistake. Why! there was not a child in Rome who would not have told him it was a falsehood. The very stones ought to have risen up in judgment against him, as he beheld before him those splendid monuments wherein the princes, prelates, and people, of that eternal city, have so nobly recorded their sense of the piety, charity, and virtue of the illustrious disciples of the blessed Ignatius of Loyola.

The right rev. prelate may seek his palliation in the pages of Ranke, but he should remember that we expect some better evidence for our conviction, than a mere repetition of the errors which the ignorance or malevolence of others have bequeathed us; and that the justice of one generation may suffice to rectify the slanders of the many which have preceded it.

But we have not yet done with the right reverend prelate and his friends the Jesuits. We have already glanced at the appendix, we must now refer to it in good earnest, for, on a second perusal, we question whether it may not be worth the while. It is, indeed, a precious specimen of historical evidence! After reciting the atrocious calumnies heaped upon the Jesuits by the parliaments of Paris of 1761-2,—and no doubt a short meditation thereon—the right reverend prelate's zeal is so warmed, and his indignation so roused, that he exclaims, "Yet this is the order which was re-established, together with the Inquisition, by Pope Pius VII., whose predecessor Clement XIV. had described them as hostes humani generis: and this is the order which directs the education of a great part of the people of Ireland, and of many of the sons, of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry in England. For fuller information respecting the Jesuits the reader may consult Les Jésuits tels qu'ils ont été or the Collectio Opusculorum, Brenæ, 1798, tom 1, p 677."

As a set-off against these arrets of the Parliaments of Paris, we must refer the right reverend prelate to a short but highly interesting defence of the order, entitled A New Disquisition, Philosophical and Political concerning the Society of the Jesuits, &c. where he will see a long list of historical testimonies in favour of the society, "from Henry IV. of France, Louis XIV., Catherine II., Richelieu, Cardinal de Fleury, Bossuet, Bacon, Leibnitz, several parliaments, who took up the defence of the Jesuits about the time of their suppression, Clement XIII., and the French clergy, who vehemently protested against the suppression of the order," &c.; and if this do not convince him that he has relied too much upon the ex parte statements of others, we would strongly recommend to his perusal The New Conspiracy by Dallas, and even a still more extended defence of the order*.

It becomes, indeed, the duty of rational beings, who have adopted erroneous impressions, upon which they act in their conduct towards their neighbour (indeed it is due to themselves,) to erase such impressions by the substitution of others more conformable to truth and justice; and where a man has studied but one side, and that one side guided, as he must necessarily feel, by no very impartial mind, he may be morally certain that, however strong his convictions, he is positively and radically wrong.

Such, then, and we state it with unwavering confidence, is the character of those premises, and, consequently, of the convictions flowing from them, which have drawn forth the energetic and opportune denunciations which we have already quoted. Let us consider them a little nearer still. "Yet this is the order which Clement XIV. had described as hostes humani generis!" enemies of the human race! It is certainly rather a harsh expression from the common father of the faithful towards any indeed of the children confided to his paternal solicitude, when exhorting them in accents of friendly admonition, in the cause of peace and charity, but more especially towards a body of men very peculiarly subject to, and devoted to the Holy See,—lending all their energies, in whatever direction he chose to employ them, for the extension of the kingdom of Christ, of which he was the supreme head upon earth, which was so solemnly entrusted to his charge, and of which so awful an account would one day be demanded of him. Being, therefore, somewhat incredulous as to the fact, we gave ourselves the trouble of running through the brief of Clement, decreeing the immediate extinction of the order, and from which alone, of course, we could imagine the right rev. prelate to have selected the passage. The expression, indeed, is there, though very differently applied. Will the reader believe that, instead of the Jesuits, the pope refers to his Satanic majesty, whom he very properly designates by that significant and well merited term—the ancient enemy of the human race!!

The only ground upon which the Pontiff rests the extreme exercise of his sovereign spiritual authority over the institute of St. Ignatius, is the prudence which it became necessary for him to employ towards the various states of Europe, which had solicited the suppression of the order at his hands. The violent contests between the enemies and the friends of the society, in which, as a matter of course, the society must needs, more or less, take part, together with the imprudent conduct of some few individual members, had created so high an excitement, that it seemed to many, and, amongst others, to Clement XIV., that their extinction was a necessary sacrifice to the peace of the Church. The brief is altogether silent upon the merits, and nearly so upon the demerits of the order; but in the particular passage which contains the fatal and deliberative judgment of Clement, which (according to the right reverend prelate) was to consign them to posterity, covered with infamy to the latest generation, and for ever bow them down to the earth with the weight of their own dishonour, the sovereign pontiff is actually giving the world a lecture upon CHARITY towards them; illustrating it with that apt and beautiful text from St. James: “Who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge among you? Let him show by a good conversation his work in the meekness of wisdom. But if you have bitter zeal, and there be contentions in your hearts: glory not, and be not liars against the truth. For this is not wisdom, descending from above: but earthly, sensual, diabolical*.” And calling upon all mankind to cease their troubles, contentions, and divisions, “He who loves his neighbour,” says he, “has fulfilled the law. Let him, then, avoid and hold in detestation all UNJUST REPROACHES, hatred, quarrels, craftiness, and such like expedients, by which THE ANCIENT ENEMY OF THE HUMAN RACE is wont to trouble the peace of the household of God, and to hinder the eternal salvation of the faithful,” &c.†

The holy father had just before forbidden all, under pain of excommunication, to injure, by any means whatever, but more particularly by contumacious invective, either by word of mouth or in writing, in public or private, any one whomsoever, UNDER COVER OF THIS BRIEF OF SUPPRESSION, but more especially all members of the said society! Thus, so far from giving any countenance whatsoever to the conduct of the right reverend prelate, placing him under his high displeasure for offending against the injunctions he had laid down in the name of charity*.

Verily, we cannot but marvel with what ingenious facility these teachers, par excellence, of that good and wholesome doctrine, that the end doth not justify the means, do devise their means of carrying out their ends. More especially have we observed this, when the design has not been in the most strict accordance with the injunctions of the apostle, “Let not, then, our good be evil spoken of;” while men seem driven to seek their own reputations in the ruin of others; and when one really might find occasion to suspect that the arch inventor and instigator of evil might not be wholly a stranger to the scheme. However strong the provocation, we cannot nevertheless work up our minds to believe that the right reverend prelate has, in this instance, fallen under the temptation, wisfully to corrupt and misapply his quotation: we must charitably presume that he has only decked himself with borrowed plumes, and fights with weapons provided by another. Has he not incautiously relied upon some enemy less scrupulous than himself, and who was bold in his imposture, in proportion as the public mind was credulous, and as his victim was friendless and unprotected? But the star of justice has its orbit, as well as less benignant constellations, and the sentence which one generation may pronounce almost by acclamation, another may rescind upon a fuller hearing; and we fondly hope that the right reverend prelate will be more just as well as more cautious for the future. But, as he has made his extract from the brief of their suppression, it is but fair that we should make ours from the bull of their restoration.

* It is said in the brief, that certain germs of discord were observable in the Society which began to excite dissensions amongst its own members, and troubles between them and other religious orders, &c. but where the accusations against them are mentioned, they are only referred to as matters of past history, or as certain things laid to their charge now, which are pretended or asserted to be; or at most, disapprobation is pronounced against individual members, and even this in vague and general terms, without any specification of persons or places; while nothing is brought forward to compromise the principals of the Society, or to show that they had departed from their original institute. He, Clement, is evidently seeking an excuse for complying with what was demanded of him and takes especial care to state nothing in their favour; which clearly shows also, that he was not casting up a balance sheet, and giving the verdict against them, but merely enumerating some few of the accusations, admitting the troubles which they occasioned, and coming to the resolution that, under existing circumstances, they were no longer in a situation to render any service to religion in their capacity of members of the Society of St. Ignatius. But, to prove that he had no just ground of complaint against the Society in general, or its principle, he says, “But that the world may know that our only object is, the advantage of the Church and the peace of Christendom, we desire to give some consolation in their sorrows to every member of the Society, each individual of which is most dear to us in Jesus Christ, and that all troubles and contentions being at an end, they may apply with more success, to cultivate the vineyard of the Lord, and to procure the salvation of souls, we decree” that “they either enter other religious communities, as their inclination may direct them, or place themselves as secular clergy under the immediate jurisdiction of their ordinary,” &c. Was this treating them as hostes humani generis?

* Chap. iii. 13, 14, 15.

After reciting that the emperor Paul "had warmly recommended the said priests to the Holy See, in his most gracious despatches of the 11th of August, 1800, in which, after having expressed his special regard for them, he declared that it would be gratifying to him for the good of the Catholics of his empire, that the said company of Jesus should be established in his empire under that authority;" Pius VII. proceeds to say:

"We, therefore, considering attentively the great advantages which these vast regions, almost destitute of evangelical workmen, might thence derive, and weighing in our mind the great increase which these clergymen, whose morals and doctrines were holden in such high estimation, would, by their unabated labours, their intense zeal for the good of souls, and their indefatigable preaching of the Word of God, occasion to the Catholic religion, have thought fit to second the wish of so great and beneficent a prince."

"A short time after," he continues, "we had ordained the restoration of the order of Jesuits in Russia, we thought it our duty to grant the same favour to the kingdom of Sicily, on the earnest request of our dear son in Jesus Christ, Ferdinand, who entreated that the company of Jesus might be re-established in his dominions and states, as it was in Russia, from a conviction that, in these deplorable times, the Jesuits were the teachers the most capable of forming youth to Christian piety, and to the fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdom, and to instruct them in literature and science in the colleges and public schools under the direction of these regular clergymen....."

"Almost the whole Catholic world demands, with unanimous voice, the re-establishment of the Society of Jesus. We daily receive to this effect the most pressing petitions from our venerable brethren the archbishops and bishops, and the most distinguished characters of every degree and order, more especially since the abundant fruits produced in every country in which this Society has had a footing, have been publicly known."—Bull of Pius VII. See Appendix to the Disquisition.

The bull, at the same time, extends the re-establishment of the order to all the states and dominions of the world, and revokes in toto the brief of Clement XIV.

But let us now take a leaf from the ordinance of the king of Spain for the revival of the institute within his dominions.

"Since," says his majesty, "by the effect of the infinite and special mercy of our blessed Lord, for me and my faithful subjects, I have found myself in the midst of them, seated upon the glorious throne of my ancestors, I have received, and continue daily to receive, a number of representations made to me from the provinces, towns, villages, and boroughs of my kingdom, from the archbishops, bishops, clergy, and even the laity, all of whom have laid before me proofs of the loyalty and attachment, and of the warm interest they take in the temporal and spiritual welfare of my subjects, most earnestly supplicating and imploring me to re-establish, throughout every part of my dominions, the society of Jesus, inviting me in that to follow the example of the other sovereigns of Europe, and especially that of his holiness, who has thought proper to repeal the brief of Clement XIV., bearing date the 21st day of July, 1773, which extinguished the religious regular order of the Society of Jesus by the publication of the famous constitution of the 7th day of last August; Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum. After such respectable precedents, I did whatever lay in my power to ascertain, in the most positive manner, the falsity of the criminal charges laid to the account of the society of Jesus, by their rivals and enemies, who were at the same time the enemies of the most holy religion of Jesus Christ, which is the first fundamental law of my monarchy and that which my glorious predecessors ever protected and defended, with heroic firmness and constancy, thereby fulfilling the obligation, which the title of most Catholic, which has ever been allowed them up to this day by all other sovereigns, imposed upon them, and that zeal and example which, with the help of God, I wish and hope to follow. I have at length brought myself to the thorough conviction that the real enemies of religion and kingly government were the very persons who had laboured, with the most earnestness, at rendering the society of Jesus odious, at dissolving it, at persecuting its unoffending members, by employing against it the vilest intrigues, the foulest calumny, and the most ridiculous imputations."—Ibid.

LONDON

BERMONDSEY.—The interesting ceremony, which we announced last week as in preparation, was perfected on Thursday, when the four young ladies to whom we then alluded Misses Beaucham, Pellatt, Savage, and Dawson, received, at the hands of the Right Rev. Bishop, the Vicar Apostolic of the London District, Dr. Griffiths, the white veil and religious habit of the order of our Lady of Mercy. The church was crowded with members of the leading Catholic families, and a complete concourse of curious strangers.

GRANTHAM.—On Sunday last, the 20th inst., Bishop Wareing gave Confirmation in this town to sixty-seven of the congregation, nearly all of whom are converts. The progress which our holy religion is making here is indeed most cheering. As we may easily imagine, the bigotry of many has been excited, especially amongst the Protestant clergy. They seem evidently aware that the "Establishment" is fast tottering to its fall, and therefore their zeal is at last awakened to prop it up by every means within their power. Tracts and pamphlets issue forth—as is the case in Grantham, full of the most unfounded statements, prejudice, and bigotry. But happily they have tended to advance our cause tenfold. People have now learned to judge for themselves, and to hear both sides of a question; and thus all the unchristian and uncharitable attacks of our enemies have ended only in their own defeat and disgrace. The people of Grantham know this well. In the evening vespers was sung, and benediction given by the bishop. The Rev. John Dalton, of Lynn, preached on the occasion in behalf of his intended new church, towards the erection of which he has been struggling for some time to raise subscriptions. We heartily wish him every possible success in so sacred a work, that tends to the honour and glory of God, and the advancement of religion amongst those who know it not.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1843.

[Vol. V.]

THE LATE VERY REV. H. MORE,
RECTOR OF ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

The very kind and comprehensive notice of the late Very Rev. H. Moré taken by our respected Contemporary the Englishman leaves it to us merely to add, that at about 3 o'clock P. M. on Sunday, the remains of the lamented Rector of St. Xavier's were privately conveyed to the Cathedral, where they were received by the Archbishop and Clergy with those solemnities which the Catholic Ritual prescribes for such an occasion. At quarter to five on the same evening, agreeably to the notice contained in the printed circular, the Archbishop together with the Clergy of the Cathedral and of St. Xavier's College proceeded in order to the Bier on which the Corpse was deposited; a portion of the appointed prayers having been recited, the Archbishop addressed the assembled multitude on the melancholy event, which brought them then together. His Grace opened his discourse with the awful words of the Psalmist "Thy judgments, O Lord, are a great abyss," and illustrated the truth of them by referring to the severe dispensation which had so suddenly deprived St. Xavier's College of a Head so well qualified to conduct that important Institution, and the Church of Bengal of a Priest, who for so many years had laboured with zeal combined with apostolic meekness and humility for the faithful and most especially for the poor. If, continued the Archbishop, there be any here present, who during this holy Pastor's life time, disregarded his sweet and salutary admonitions, let them now not any longer harden their hearts; let them listen to the voice of warning already issuing from the grave, which is to receive the venerated remains of their late pastor, "yesterday for me, today for thee." To all assembled, Religion proclaims, said his Lordship, that they are congregated here, not to gratify a vain curiosity, not to pay an empty tribute of respect, but for the far more solemn and sacred purpose of giving effect to the admonition of the Holy Scriptures, "It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead, that they may be loosed from their sins."

We regret we can supply only the above imperfect outline of the Archbishop's discourse. As soon as his Grace concluded, the rest of the grand and imposing ceremonies of the Church were completed, and the body consigned amidst the tears and lamentations of the numerous assemblage, to the grave prepared for it within the sanctuary, at the Gospel side of the altar. On Monday morning a Solemn Office and High Mass were celebrated for the eternal repose of Father Moré's soul; the Archbishop, assisted by all the Clergy who had been present at the interment, officiating. On this occasion also the congregation was very numerous, several being in attendance who could not be present the evening before, on account of the unavoidably short notice which was given of the funeral. In the depth of our unfeigned sorrow for the loss we have sustained, we are consoled by the reflection that the great worth of the lamented subject of the Memoir was duly appreciated not only by the Catholics but also by a large number of our Protestant Fellow Citizens.

The following is the Memoir referred to above, but we hope to give in our next a more full biography of the lamented Rector.

It is with deep concern we have to record the death of the Rev. H. Moré, S. J., late Rector of St. F. Xavier's College. But having been obligingly furnished with a brief, though imperfect outline of the life of Mr. Moré, which we give below, we shall content ourselves by observing that, the loss occasioned by his death, which took place yesterday morning, will he deeply felt by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and especially so by the College, to which his talents and indefatigable labours have for some time past been devoted.

The Gentleman who has favored us with the memoir, says:—

“The Revd. Hippolyte Moré, late Rector of St. Xavier's College, was a native of Bordeaux, where he was born on 23d March, in the year 1800. Whilst he was yet a student he conceived an ardent desire to devote himself to the conversion of the Natives of India, and was accustomed to spend many of his leisure hours in praying in a Chapel dedicated to God in honor of St. F. Xavier, that he might be chosen as a Missionary to that country. Having finished his studies, he applied for admission into a religious order in hopes of being sent out to carry the tidings of the Gospel to India, but being assured by the superiors of that order, that he would more surely obtain his end by entering the Society of Jesus, he enrolled himself among its members on the 4th of Sept. 1823.

During the succeeding years of his life, he filled in succession various offices in the Colleges of the Society in France, Spain and Portugal. He was in Lisbon at the time of the revolution in favor of Don Pedro, and like many of his Brethren, had Bishopricks and other distinctions and emoluments offered to him provided he would exercise his influence to support Don Pedro, but like the rest of them he answered that he was a minister of the Gospel and not the agent of a political party. Soon after the College was surrounded by an armed multitude, and he and the other members of his order escaped with difficulty, and in disguise to an English ship, in which they lay concealed for several days in the hold, beneath baskets of onions. After a painful delay they sailed for Liverpool, whence they proceeded to Stonyhurst College, where the Rev. H. Moré filled one of the chief offices for several months, and endeared himself to all by his charitable and accommodating spirit. In 1833, when the English Jesuits embarked for Calcutta with the Right Rev. R. St. Leger, V. A., he was selected on account of his zeal and knowledge of the Portuguese language to join them, and thus attained the object for which he had entered the Society of Jesus, at a time when he least expected it. His zeal and labors in Calcutta and Chandernagore especially among the lower classes of Portuguese and native Christians, are too well known to need comment. At Dacca, Koomillah, Hoosenabad, Chittagong, &c his fatigues and privations were such as to lay the seed of the disorder which has terminated so fatally. After the departure of the Rev. F. Chidwick, he was nominated Rector of St. Xavier's College, and in the discharge of this office he, by his humility, prudence, charity and affability, gained the affections of persons of all parties, and secured that unanimous support to the College of St. F. Xavier to which is chiefly to be attributed its present prosperity.

Though often entreated to return to Europe for the sake of his health, the deep interest which he felt for the inhabitants of India, led him to reject every proposal of the kind, and in his last words to his afflicted brethren he assured them that it was his greatest comfort to think that his bones would rest in India amongst those to whose welfare he had from his earliest youth desired to devote his life.”—Englishman, October 30.

AGRA.

ADDRESS PRESENTED TO BISHOP BORGIH ON LEAVING AGRA.

(From a Correspondent.)

At a meeting held by the Catholics of Agra on the 11th instant, for the purpose of getting up an Address to be presented to Bishop Borghi on his departure for Europe, the following gentlemen were elected as a committee for drawing up the address, viz.

Messrs. W. Greenway,
Fanshawe F. DeCruze,
L. Teyen.
R. P. Stowell, and
P. Lyons.

The following is the Address drawn up by the committee:

TO THE RIGHT REV. DR. J. A. BORGIH,
Bishop of Bethsaida and Vicar Apostolic of Thibet and Hindustan.

MY LORD,—It would ill become us on your approaching departure from India, to allow your Lordship to quit the field of your labours without some manifestation of the respect and esteem which we entertain for your Lordship, and we accordingly feel it to be a duty incumbent on us to tender to you on an occasion like the present, our warm expressions of gratitude and regard, accompanied by our grateful acknowledgments for your exemplary exertions to promote the happiness and the moral and spiritual welfare of the Catholic Community.

2. From the time when you arrived in this country in 1839, we have observed with unfeigned satisfaction, the untiring zeal and disinterestedness which have characterized your exertions in the cause of religion and of humility, and your pious endeavours to disseminate the doctrines of the Catholic faith, all of which cannot fail to secure to your Lordship a prominent place in the annals of the Religious History of the Catholic portion of this country, to devote time and attention, to sacrifice all worldly considerations, and to labour for the general good, are not virtues that can pass by without exciting our regard, and our especial thankfulness and gratitude.

3. When we take a general survey of your successful career, we are the more struck with admiration at the piety, the charity and the judgment with which your labours have been directed towards eradicating error, and introducing in its place the true word of God, by planting firmly in the benighted land, the standard of the cross.

4. In whichever light we view your connexion with the Catholics of Agra, and their friends, whether as their Rev. Father and affectionate Adviser, or their much revered Prelate and Pastor, we are equally impressed with your pre-eminent and inestimable virtues. The kindness, the prudence and discernment which have ever been the essential characteristics of your counsels, are fresh in the recollection of every member of the Catholic community. Where is the member of this community, who has not in some measure benefitted by your paternal and well timed advice, as it regarded the line of conduct to be pursued by us, in our spiritual and social relations in life—we have hence greater reason deeply to deplore even your Lordship's temporary separation from your flock, nor can we forget the religious instruction and edification we derived from attending to your erudite exhortations delivered from the sanctuary.

5. It is now with great gratification that we advert to the establishment at Agra, through your instrumentality of a CONVENT and ORPHANAGE Institutions such as these were long considered a desiderata by, we venture to assert, all Catholic India; and it is hardly necessary to observe, that their permanent establishment at this station must even afford to the Catholics and their friends on this side of India a theme for much self gratulation. But while we hail with joy the establishment of the institutions in question, we are not insensible to the pre-eminent claims which you have on our gratitude; for we behold in those institutions the fruits of your increasing and uniform labours on our behalf. It is a notable fact that some ten years since, the Catholics of India, either here, or in the chief presidency, were destitute of the means wherewith properly to rear up their children in the exercise of their own faith. Assuredly, it was of vital importance to Catholic parents that their children should be provided with such religious education as would render them good Catholics, dutiful children, and useful members of society—such a consummation of their ardent wishes has at length been accomplished at Agra, through your Lordship's laudable zeal and exertions employed ever since your assumption of the sacred duties of THIS MISSION. In truth my Lord, we are indebted for these great accessions to our Institutions to your bounty and charity under the blessings and dispensations of an all-wise and merciful Providence.

6. In connection with the foregoing subjects, we cannot omit to notice in this place, the christian spirit that has animated your Lordship in the erection of a chapel at Landour, a measure in every way calculated to secure to the Catholic traveller and invalid resorting to that locality for the benefit of their health, the means of religious observance, and spiritual consolation, advantages which to them must ever be matter of the deepest concern.

The establishment of this chapel alone, apart from all other considerations, is in itself a memorial of the signal benefits conferred by your Lordship on the Catholics of India, and we would be wanting in our duty, were we to neglect availing ourselves of so favorable an opportunity for thus publicly recording, with respect, our sense of the eminent and unrivalled services rendered by your Lordship to the Catholics of Agra, and to your fellow creatures.

7. We need not point to distant institutions in exemplification of the general improvement your Lordship has effected; in as much as we have here abundant proofs to cite in corroboration of this fact. The chapel in this station affords sufficient evidence of having been materially improved in all its departments and resources.

8. The value of your Lordship's labours in India is greatly enhanced by your judicious and liberal arrangements to insure to poor Native Catholic Widows and Orphans, every comfort in their spiritual and temporal wants by enlarging the Orphanage and sheltering therein increased numbers of those indigent creatures. It would be exceeding the necessarily confined limits of this address, were we to enumerate the many important services rendered by your Lordship to the cause of religion and of Catholic India, we shall therefore content ourselves with respectfully stating, that we are fully convinced of the pious and generous motives which actuate your Lordship in quitting for a time your place amongst us, and we further experience much consolation from the reflection that our separation will be but of short duration. That you will soon return to your flock, after having effected every arrangement with every desirable accession to the convent, and with the means for establishing on a firm basis and with the co-operation of Christian Brothers, a Boy's School at Agra.

9. Finally, we beg to bid your Lordship farewell, and we would that we could offer you some mark of our respect and gratitude more acceptable than this poor tribute to your virtues and merits. In wishing you then uninterrupted health and happiness and the accomplishment of the great ends held in view, your Lordship will permit us to solicit your prayers on our behalf, and the apostolic benediction. With much respect,

My Lord, we remain,

Yours Lordship's respectful & loving servts.

and their Friends.

LETTER No. VI.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Unity is one of the attributes of the Divinity—“Trinity in Unity,” it comprehends one Lord, one Faith, and one Fold; it is the first and the strongest evidence of Truth,—it is the symbol, the handmaid of a one pure, holy, and glorious Church, for if its contrary quality enters, that is, opposite doctrines, it follows, that error must be the concomitant of truth, and that division, as it were, steps in between one Lord, one Faith, and one Fold, and rears for itself, out of the scattered flock, a variety of faiths and of detached folds, thus at once losing the character which is given to the Church in Scripture, as “my perfect one is but one—without spot, wrinkle, blemish, or any such thing” and becoming a thing as foul and disunited as error and dissension could make her. No wonder then that Christ entreated so fervently that his Church might be endued with the spirit of Unity “that they may be one as thou, Father art in me and I in thee.” So prayed the Saviour of mankind. No wonder then that St. Paul inculcates so emphatically to be “careful to keep the Unity of the spirit in the bond of peace,” and no wonder that the Psalmist exclaims in ecstasy, “How good and how pleasant it is for Brethren to dwell together in Unity,” and it is under this figure that the Church is represented in the Canticles “terrible as an Army set in array,” for Unity carries force with it; Unity too is nearly allied to Catholicity: break through the one and you destroy the other; it is by her Unity that the Church is enabled to trace her Catholicism from age to age; it is by an unbroken concatenation of historical events, and spiritual prerogatives transmitted from hand to hand, from mouth to mouth, that the Church of the present day claims her legitimacy with Christ and the Apostles; nay, she can go back for her lineage to the Patriarchs of old, to Jacob, to Isaac, and to Abraham; Moses and Aaron were as but the acorn is to the mighty oak tree, the germ of the future Ark of man’s spiritual salvation; they and their people were merely symbols, or heralds of the Mighty One who, with his glorious Church, was to follow; there were indeed mighty signs of her birth from the beginning of the world—from the fall of man; it is truly, my friends, a glorious object, and worthy the highest aspirations of man, to contemplate this glorious dispensation—the Redemption of mankind! Man had hardly fallen when the God of all goodness placed him again in the way of eternal salvation. As God was pleased to create man with the right of free-will, with a power to do or to refrain—to obey or to disobey, with a quality to know good from evil, to follow the impulse of God’s holy spirit or to reject it; and thus making him above the beasts of the field, a rational and a free being, and not the creature of instinct, or the passive instrument of an irrevocable fate. But alas, this man in an evil moment abused this glorious right, and fell, partly by his own free will and consent, and partly through the suggestion of the evil one. As man then became thus partly the instrument of his own fall, so the same Divine Providence in his unsearchable goodness was pleased to establish a means by which man might in like manner be partly the instrument of his own salvation. He said to man after his fall, “In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread”—so he told him, “if thou wilt be saved, keep my Commandments.”

• This is not more manifest in nature, than it is in the spiritual world; man to gain sustenance for his body must not sleep and be idle all his life time, from the king to the beggar man must work and toil for his bread, so to gain eternal life for his soul, he must in like manner work in the Lord’s vineyard. It is true, he cannot save himself by his own acts alone, but salvation will not be forced upon him; he must knock before the door is opened; till before he can sow—sow before he can reap. As God has laid down laws of nature for the temporal existence of man, so he has laid down divine ordinances for his spiritual life. Man can no more break through the latter than he can through the former with impunity, for he is an independent and an answerable being. It is upon this broad basis then, my friends, we must trace up the Church of Christ link by link—by her Unity of one Faith and one worship; on the other hand in proportion as this heaven born virtue, Unity of spirit, is held up to us, its opposite vice, Disunion or Division is condemned and denounced; for it weakens a cause in the same ratio that Unity strengthens it; St. Paul reckons it among the works of the flesh; he tells us that, they who “do such things, as contention, emulations, wraths, quarrels, dissensions, sects, shall not obtain the Kingdom of Heaven,” Gal. V. 19, 20, 21. How fearful, how awful from such an authority!! and we know division in religion is the mother of all these passions and consequences—these are its fruits generated by pride and disobedience; it is like a wolf among the flock—it destroys and scatters the sheep, it gives birth to sects, it laughs at authority, and it subverts truth, and substitutes error. It is an axiom in theology that the spirit of Truth and the spirit of error, or in other words, that of Unity and Division, cannot co-exist in the same abode or Church, for Christ says "he that is not with me, is against me, and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth," Matt. X. 11, 30. Here is Unity and Division defined by a divine hand. It vitally concerns your salvation - then to examine my friends, whether you are within or without the Fold of Unity. I shall endeavour to show you in the next letter something of Protestant Unity.

Yours faithfully,

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

But they are bad reasoners; aye, even such men among them, who in every other concern of life, act with wonderful foresight and correctness. In order to indulge party prejudices and their aversion to Catholicism with everything belonging to it, they plunge into assertions, which, if followed up logically, would destroy root and branch all piety and religion; but as soon as it comes to the drawing of the legitimate consequences from their acknowledged premises, they shudder at the awful abyss of immorality and infidelity, on whose brink they stand, and choose, (often-times insensibly to themselves) rather to talk nonsense and inconsistencies, than abandon all sense of duty or all regard for revealed truth. In this respect they are not very unlike Don Quixote, who in every other circumstance of life acts and speaks in a manner most creditable to any sensible gentleman; yet who in every matter relating in the slightest degree to his favorite knight-errantry, not only behaves and talks like a mad man, but even declares all persons not as mad as himself, to be possessed by some malignant spirit, envious of his good intentions and valorous achievements. But to return to St. Hilary's testimony. The holy Father continues by saying: "Si vere igitur carnem corporis nostri Christus assumpsit, et vere homo ille, qui ex Maria natus fuit, Christus est, nosque vere sub mysterio carnis corporis sui sumimus, et per hoc unum erimus, quia Pater in eo est, et ille in nobis; quomodo voluntatis unitas asseritur, cum naturalis per Sacramentum proprietatis perfectæ Sacramentum sit unitatis?" That is: "If then Christ has truly assumed the flesh of our body, if Christ is truly that man, who was born of Mary, and if we truly receive the flesh of his body, and thereby become one, as the Father is in Him and He in us; how is a (mere) unity of will asserted whilst the substantial (naturalis) possession by means of the Sacrament, is the Sacrament of perfect unity?" This passage shews conclusively, that, unless we are ready to deny the substantial unity between the Father and the Son; unless we are willing to give up the fundamental dogma of Christianity, viz. the real incarnation of the Son of God; we must admit, that Christ is substantially in the Blessed Eucharist, and that by means of the sacred mysteries, we enter into a substantial union with the Saviour. Now this, I should say is pretty much as near to Transubstantiation, as Mount Sion is to Jerusalem. But I fear with our modern Sectarious it happens as with the brothers of Dives the glutton. Even, if they saw signs and wonders, even if a dead man were to rise from his grave, and attest the truth of the Catholic tenet, they would still persist in refusing to believe it. Well may we apply to them the subsequent words of the zealous bishop of Poitiers, wherein he rebuked his adversaries the Arians, who were as fervent, and obstinate abettors of a figurative Trinity as the generality of modern Protestants are of a figurative Eucharist. "Non est humano aut sæculi sensu in Dei rebus loquendum; neque per violentam atque imprudentem prædicationem sanitati cœlestium dictorum extraneæ atque impicæ intelligentiæ perversitas, extorquenda est." "In the things of God, he says, we must not speak with a human or worldly sense, nor must we by a violent and imprudent preaching squeeze from the soundness of heavenly sayings the perversity of strange and impious understanding." I wish to God, Dr. Martin Luther had taken this most sensible admonition to heart, and had acted up to it! It would have certainly spared him the awful responsibility of having disturbed the peace of the Church of God, and ruined millions of souls into damnation; and among others it would have unquestionably prevented him from abandoning the dogma of Transubstantiation and fixing upon Consubstantiation, not because it was true, but because he deemed it vexatious to the Papists. It would have saved John Calvin the trouble of taxing his versatile mind, in order to find out a system differing both from that of the Catholics and that of Luther, not because it was better than either of them, but because he was ambitious to become the inventor of a fresh novel doctrine in a matter of such paramount importance. It would rid the Sacramentarians of the ungracious task of squeezing Scripture, ecclesiastical antiquity, aye, even common sense into the straight waistcoat of their anti-popery prejudices, and make their proud worldly minds submit themselves with more humility to the simple understanding of the word of God. Did our modern preachers and mountebanks possess the spirit of God, they would unquestionably prefer imitating the Fathers of the Church of Christ and the generous defenders of her saving faith than run, as they now do, in the footsteps of her sworn enemies, and the robbers and adulterers of more or less of her heavenly doctrines. Then they would easily understand to think and to say with St. Hilary, as follows: "Denaturali enim in nobis Christi veritate quæ dicimus, nisi ab eo discimus, stulte atque impie dicimus. Ipse enim ait: 'Caro mea vere est esca, et sanguis meus vere est potus. Qui edit meam carnem et bibit meum sanguinem in me manet et ego in eo. 'De veritate carnis et sanguinis non relictus est ambigendi locus."—Which means: "For what we say of the substantial (naturali) reality 'veritate' of Christ within us, is foolish and impious, unless we learn it from him. But he himself says: 'My flesh is truly meat, and my blood is truly drink; who eats my flesh and drinks my blood, remains in me and I in him.'" "Hence there is left us no place of doubting about the reality (veritate) of the body and blood." This is language worthy a Catholic mind, worthy a heart which feels a simple, filial respect for the sacred words of Scripture; language, which at first sight shews, that St. Hilary and the Church in the fourth century were no Calvinistic shadowists, but professed the Catholic doctrine that the body and blood of Christ constitute verily and indeed the real substance in the Blessed Eucharist. At least, as long as I cannot be convinced, that St. Hilary hit upon the deceitful expedient of the Fathers of the Church of England-faith; viz. of giving with one hand, what they take away with the other, of teaching one doctrine in the text, and the contradictory one in a note; I must remain persuaded that the Saint meant by his verily and indeed, &c. somewhat more than the Church of England catechism. In fact he is so much persuaded of the Blessed Eucharist's being nothing else, but what the Catholic Church even in our days professes it to be, that he calls it at once the true body and the true blood; and this not only because the Lord himself had declared it such, but because it was the received faith of the Christian world, "Nunc enim et ipsius Domini professione, et fide nostra vere caro est, et vere sanguis est. Et hæc acceptatque hausta id efficiunt, ut et nos in Christo, et Christus in nobis sit." That is, For now it is, both by the Lord's assurance and our own faith, TRULY THE FLESH AND TRULY THE BLOOD. And these eaten and drank, effect that we be within Christ, and CHRIST WITHIN US. Surely, Mr. Editor, this is pretty unequivocal language. Still to prevent even now a Calvinistic mistake of Christ being within us in figure, by faith, by an act of commemoration, St. Hilary says that Christ is within us by his flesh. "Est ergo in nobis ipse per carnem." He is then within us by his flesh. This much may amply suffice us in regard to St. Hilary and his times; who, if he had sat with the Fathers of the fourth Lateran or the Tridentine councils, would undoubtedly have voted for Transubstantiation, and have anathematized all innovations against it as strenuously as any of them. Still I know obstinate heretics will not be convinced; but these I may as well dismiss with the pathetic words of the same holy Bishop: "Is this perhaps not the truth? Forsooth, let it happen to be no truth to those who deny, that Jesus Christ is truly God!"

MADRAS.

THE CHURCH OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER
IN PARCHERRY.

On Wednesday the 6th September the Catholic community of Madras had the gratification of witnessing the solemn and interesting ceremony of laying the "foundation stone" of a church to be erected in Parcherry, to the greater glory of the Holy and undivided Trinity, under the Patronage of St. Francis Xavier, the Apostle of the Indies.

At a quarter past six o'clock in the morning the procession advanced from the vestry-room of the present temporary chapel to the place where the new building is to be raised. The cross bearer and acolytes headed the procession, the Bishop and clergy were last. His Lordship wore mitre, crozier, cope &c. When the procession arrived at the place intended for the altar where a cross had been erected by Dr. McAuliffe the day preceding, the prescribed antiphons, psalms, prayers, and litanies were sung, in which the clergy and choir joined. Before the foundation stone was deposited in the place destined for its reception, a brass-plate with an inscription commemorative of the event was handed by the Bishop to Doctor McAuliffe together with some parchments. The rev. Gentleman read the inscription, in an audible voice, in Latin, English and Portuguese; and then he handed a parchment to the Rev. P. D. Lewis Ponnou-awny, who read the same in Tamil. The foundation stone was then laid by Mr. Mayers the principal Benefactor of the mission. After which the votive mass of St. Francis Xavier was said by the Bishop attended by Dr. McAuliffe. After mass a large party, including the Bishop and clergy, sat down to breakfast in a tent erected for the purpose by the Catholics of Parcherry, who were anxious to invite their friends from the neighbouring districts to be present on the august occasion. The following is the English version of the inscription.

TO THE GREATER GLORY.
OF THE HOLY AND UNDIVIDED TRINITY.
IN THE YEAR OF REDEMPTION
MDCCCLXIII.

On the 6th day of Sept. in the Reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty

QUEEN VICTORIA,

*In the Pontificate of our Holy Father
GREGORY THE SIXTEENTH,*

The first stone of the Church of St. Francis Xavier, APOSTLE OF THE INDIES,

*Was Laid by GEO RICKETT MAYERS Esq.
The principal Benefactor of the Mission, in the presence of the Right Rev. J. Fennelly, Bishop of Castoria and Vicar Apostolic of Madras, of six British Clergymen, two Capuchins and one Native priest resident in Madras, and a large assemblage of the Faithful.*

Copies of the Madras Expositor and Examiner, the Bengal Catholic Herald, The London Tablet, The Dublin Weekly Freeman's Journal, Weekly Register, Pilot and Nation, The Edinburgh Courier and The Australasian Chronicle, A medal of Father Mathew's Irish total abstinence society with some Indian, English, Irish, Roman and American coins, were deposited in the Stone along with the Inscription.

This church, if we may judge by the extent of the foundations already marked out, which (we are informed) include only the nave, side-aisles and steeple, will be every way worthy of the great apostle of the Indies. The whole edifice, it is estimated, will be completed at an outlay of £3500 Stg. or 35,000 Rupees. The nave and side-aisles will be fit for service in six or eight months. These will be completed for £1500 Stg. or 15,000 Rupees. The remaining superstructure will not be raised for two or three years, unless Providence should provide means sooner. The steeple also will lie over.

In the elevation, which has been shown to us, the steeple will rise 103 feet above the surface of the earth. It will be undoubtedly a great ornament to the town. Immediately over the bells there is provision for a large town clock. The steeple will front Popham's Broadway, which is growing daily into importance, and promises in a few years, if it be not so already, to be the most respectable street in all Madras. An order has been already sent to Ireland for a set of joy-bells for this church, to be cast by the same intelligent artist who made the large bell for the Cathedral of Tuam. The superstructure which it is intended to raise at present will be slightly, and we may say a perfect building in itself, even without the additions which are to be raised hereafter. Instructions have been given to make provision, in laying the present foundations, for these contemplated additions, so that they may not interfere with the security or symmetry of the present erection.

We wish our beloved Bishop a speedy and successful consummation of this his grand undertaking. We are grieved, whenever we see the temple of the most High God inferior to the habitation of man. According to our notion of a Christian temple, the sublimity of its spacious dimensions should preach Catholicity, and the silent solemnity of its lofty walls and its vaulted stuccoed roof should remind the Christian as he enters that "this is the house of God." Such has been the spirit of Catholicity, and so far does it surpass the stunted religious feeling of the sectaries no matter how inspired by fanaticism. The reformation has spared two Christian temples in Dublin, and the overpaid state-church in Ireland has produced nothing like them in 300 years. They stand to this day a proud monument of the Christian spirit of the Irish Catholic, when he was not yet trodden down by the Saxon. The great Christian sacrifice being abolished by the reformers, the present occupiers of Christ's Church and St. Patrick's are at a loss to understand their original destination. The protestant ritual will allow only a comparatively small portion of their extensive areas to be used for service. The rest is an unmeaning waste—an unintelligible blank. The same is true of Westminster and Yorkminster abbeys in England. Their accommodations will not be understood until O'Connell's prophecy is fulfilled and high mass celebrated to them. Greater wonders have happened.

For the accommodation of those who are placed in a sort of necessity to make interments in the schismatic graveyard of Madras, we have been told that the Bishop intends, in the course of next year, to consecrate a cemetery on a part of the extensive compound upon which St. Francis Xavier's church is to be erected. Some people say, after the late reconciliation of Portugal to the Holy See, what necessity for a new cemetery in Madras? We answer that the unfortunate leaders of the schism appear to become more hardened in proportion as their ground of justification becomes more untenable. We are not allowed to despair of the conversion of any even the most obdurate sinner. Yet we are not obliged to set aside all prudent calculations as to the probability of the result. We think it highly probable that these infatuated men may stand out to the last. The evil may not rest even here, because, in the inscrutable judgments of God, the crimes of the father may be visited upon the children. We think it wise policy in Doctor Fennelly to use all the vigorous means within his reach, in order to cripple the power of these unhappy men to create division in the Christian community. When a Catholic cemetery is consecrated in the extensive compound of St. Francis Xavier's magnificent church, the grave-digger at St. John's may hang up his spade. We opine, few will submit to be suffocated Sunday after Sunday in schismatic pigeon holes, when the splendid church of St. Francis will be thrown open for their accommodation.

We now call upon the Catholics of Madras at large, and those of Paricherry in particular, to second the endeavours of their Bishop. Let them give their mite cheerfully, and prove their cheerfulness by sending it in timely. Few of our Catholic community can afford a large donation; but very many can afford small monthly contributions. We recommend, therefore, that some zealous persons will at once and without loss of time open collection books and go amongst their friends to collect. For the satisfaction of the public, monthly contributions will be acknowledged in the Catholic Expositor, like those for the orphanages and for the Propagation of the Faith. Let every one be up and stirring, as if the whole weight of the undertaking rested upon himself.—Let each one labour as earnestly as if the work could not be done without him. There is a poor native man in Poodoopetta who mortgaged his house and pledged his trinkets in order to secure an eligible site for a chapel in that village. His zeal for his religion is above all praise. We require no such sacrifice from our readers. We only ask what they will never miss, a few rupees or a few annas monthly until the church is completed. There are many who let double the amount we require slip through their hands monthly without being able to render a satisfactory account for it to God or Man.—Madras Catholic Expositor, October.

BANGALORE.

We have been informed by letters from Bangalore, that the zealous French Clergyman of that station—the Rev. Henry Gailhot—announced from the Altar on the 20th of August last, that a Catholic English school would be opened there on the 1st of September. His appeal to Parents to take their children out of the Protestant Regimental school and to send them to him their best friend and spiritual father was rather strong and pressing. He has engaged the services of a person eminently qualified to superintend the school, and we have no doubt that his benevolent endeavours will be crowned with success. What Catholic father will be found, deserving of the name of Catholic, who will leave his child in a Protestant school to be flogged by a Protestant schoolmaster for not learning Protestant prayers, for not reading the Protestant Bible and committing to memory Protestant collects, contrary to the discipline of the Catholic Church, when such splendid opportunities are afforded him of giving his child a genuine Catholic education. Can such a man be considered as fulfilling the duties of a Christian father? Will he be accounted excusable before Almighty God for placing the faith of his artless little child in imminent peril of shipwreck? We cannot too much praise the zeal of Mr. Gailhot in establishing at Bangalore a school for the instruction of Catholic children, altogether independent of Protestant control. Such schools have been already established at Cuddalore, Secunderabad, St. Thomas' Mount, Vizagapatam, Poonamallee and Madras. This is the plan, which the exclusiveness of our creed obviously recommends all over the world, where its adoption is practicable. We may talk of the national system of education in Ireland. What is it after all, even in the opinion of its greatest advocates, but a prudential submission to Protestant legislators offering partial redress to Catholic grievances. There is not a Bishop in Ireland, who would not prefer a grant for separate education, if the grudging generosity of the British Minister would indulge his wishes. We have reason to expect that before long the regimental schools of India will be considerably liberalized. But even if that desirable consummation were accomplished to-morrow, it would still be the duty of the Catholic clergy, where separate Catholic schools are established, to uphold them—and where they are not, to bring into requisition all honorable means to establish them. On the Feast of the Assumption, immediately before mass, the errors of Protestantism were renounced, and conditional baptism administered, by the Rev. Mr. Gailhot to two boys and a girl and a soldier of the 15th Hussars. The altar of the B. V. Mary was tastefully decorated, and the military choir sang with unusual grandeur and solemnity. Mr. Balfour, we are informed, has made a present to the church of a beautiful oil painting of the last supper. It is not yet set up. The church is yet in rather an unfinished state, and will be used as an English school until a schoolhouse is built,—there are 76 boys in the native school.—Ibid.

MOULMEIN.

The Catholic soldiers of H. M. 84th Regt. at Moulemein have subscribed to the erection of a Library and Temperance Hall. We are glad to learn also that they visit the church every day and frequent the sacraments very numerously. Some of their comrades have renounced Protestantism and embraced the faith of their fathers. The Protestant chaplain never failed to strike fire on these occasions. It was too bad, if all the eloquence he lavished on the hideous monster, was ineffectual to deter his flock from embracing Popery. The fact is, that his abuse of the Catholic church went a little beyond bounds, so as to disgust his auditors, and to excite in their minds a suspicion of the preacher's sincerity, when he thought the misrepresentation of other creeds to be necessary for the defence of his own. The officers have joined their sympathies with the afflicted parson. The commanding officer has interdicted the Rev. Mr. Siorck all admittance into the barracks, congee house, guardhouse or huts of married soldiers. Young Adjutant Seymour and Captain Russell are never backward when strong measures are required to prevent the growth of Popery in H. M. 84th regt. or elsewhere. Several men of the Grenadier company went to the Captain for leave to be transferred to the Catholic roll. The Captain positively refused, but very condescendingly granted them permission to join the Anabaptists or any other sect they liked. The impartial Brigadier who is never at a loss for a proposal, that wears the appearance of moderation, acknowledged candidly enough, "that no officer has a right to prevent Protestant soldiers from becoming Catholics," but he thought they should first present themselves before the parson, to see if he could solve their doubts. And he had no objection to make this a general rule, so that if a Catholic wished to become a Protestant, he also should present himself to the priest.

Rare impartiality of the most liberal and sage Brigadier! When did it happen that a Catholic turned Protestant, unless he had been already virtually excluded from the pale of the Catholic Church by his joining a freemason lodge—keeping a concubine—or some other insuperable impediment to his enjoyment of peace in the Catholic communion? What use in sending a man to the priest, whom the priest regards only as a weed fit to be thrown over the wall of the Pope's garden?

On the other hand, the Protestants who become Catholics are men of moral worth;—men filled with a due sense of their eternal responsibilities. To send such men from the Captain to the parson is like sending the Redeemer from Pilate to Herod. So far for the impartiality of our most sagacious Brigadier, who shrewdly pronounces a judgement of equality between two things, which in reality are most unmatched.

We now beg leave to inform the officers as well as the men of H. M. 84th regt., that freedom of conscience is the birthright of the British soldier. If Bigotry and Fanaticism have made encroachments, unjustifiable as well as unjust, upon that right the right itself has survived the reign of religious oppression, and still remains legible in the British constitution. Attention has been lately called, in the British senate, to the religious condition of the soldier, and it will not be henceforward so safe to interfere with his inalienable right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. It happened in Fort St. George, some time ago, a Protestant wished to become a Catholic, the commanding officer took on himself to put the soldier to some rounds, but the soldier understanding his own privilege as well as the extent of the officer's power over him, joined the Catholics from that day forward in their march to Church. The officer took no notice of the matter because he felt that the soldier only exercised his right. The same has happened at St. Thomas' Mount. If these examples were followed, commanding officers would learn more moderation than has hitherto marked their conduct, whenever a poor soldier evinces a predilection for the old religion, which abides in all the freshness and bloom of youth after eighteen centuries.—Ibid.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Daniel O'Connell was born on the 6th of August, 1775, at Carhen, near Caherciveen, in the barony of Iveragh, and county of Kerry. (The very year in which British oppression forced the American people to seek for security in arms, and commence that bloody struggle by which they established their national independence.) His father was Morgan O'Connell, of Carhen, Esq., who was married to Catherine, daughter of John O'Mullane, of Whitechurch, in the county of Cork, Esq. His father's mother was of the family of O'Donoghues, (dhuv), or the black chiefs of their tribe. Mr. O'Connell was educated on the Continent, partly at Louvain, partly at St. Omers, and partly at Douay. On his return to Britain, he had to undergo the formality of studying his profession (the law) in England, for, to use his own words, "when he was prepared to enter Trinity College, Trinity College was not prepared to receive him." Having swallowed the regular number of legs of admission at the Middle Temple, he was duly admitted to the Irish Bar, in Easter Term, 1796. Mr. O'Connell married, on the 3d of June, 1802, his relative Mary, daughter of Edward O'Connell, M. D., of Tralee; he succeeded his father in 1809; and in 1825, by the death of his uncle, Maurice O'Connell, Esq., succeeded to the family estate of Derrinane. The O'Connell family are proverbial for living to a very old age. General Count O'Connell, Knt. of the Cross of the Order of the Holy Ghost, and Colonel of the late 6th regt. of the Irish Brigade, in the British service, was uncle to the Liberator; he died on the 9th of July, 1833, at Meudon, near Blois, in France; he was the youngest of twenty-two children by one marriage, of whom over one-half lived to the age of 92, at which age this venerable patriot died; he was born in August, 1734, at Derrinane, the residence of his father, Daniel O'Connell, Esq.—Limerick Reporter.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CHOIR.—An old man named James Jones, about 90 years of age, has formed one of the choir of Bedford church, near Tenbury, for upwards of sixty years; and on Sunday, the 30th ult., the choir was strengthened by the addition of his eldest son, his grandson, and his great grandson (so that it embraces four generations), on which occasion the singing was excellent.

And much more in the same strain, but too long for quotation here, though it is impossible for us to omit the following passage,—“That the pretended crimes that have been laid to their charge affected at most some few individuals; that by far the great majority of the society occupied themselves constantly in the attainment of science, in the practical administration of our holy religion, guided by the soundest principles of morality, ever tending to alienate men from vice, and lead them in the ways of justice and virtue.”

Such is the system which the fertile imagination of the right reverend prelate has conjured up into “the mystery of iniquity,” and such the foundation upon which the mighty fabric reposes!—ILLOS- TES HUMANI GENERIS!!!

But we must still read the right reverend prelate's lecture on these matters, and we will take it from one whom we deem a very unexceptionable witness in such a controversy.

Bayle has furnished us with abundant evidence, that in his days it was often as it is sometimes now. “It is certain,” says he, “that whatever is published against them (the Jesuits) is almost equally believed by their enemies, both Catholics and Protestants. It is also true, that the accusations are renewed against them, as often as occasion offers in any new-book. In the meantime, they who examine with any sort of equity the innumerable apologies published by the Jesuits, find, as to some facts, sufficient justifications, to make a reasonable enemy drop the charge."

"The fate of the Jesuits," he adds, "and that of Catiline, is much the same. Several accusations were given in against Catiline without any proof; but they met with credit upon this general argument, since he has done such a thing, he is very capable of having done this, or that, and it is very probable he has done the rest." "There was published at the Hague, about eleven years ago, in 1689, a book entitled The Religion of the Jesuits. The author confesses, that the prejudice against these gentlemen is so general, that whatever attestations of innocence they fortify themselves with, it is impossible to undeceive the world." "He (this author)" continues Bayle, "means that a man need only confidently publish whatever he pleases against the Jesuits, to be assured that abundance of people will believe it. I believe him in the right; at least that in this he will prove a good prophet. It was doubtless on this presumption, that he published the story of Vienna (one of those monstrous historical falsehoods against the society), though he believed it false. But if other authors have taken the same method, what will become of all the facts which the enemies of the Jesuits have published? Should we not have reason to believe, that they have divulged several, which they knew to be false or doubtful, and which, nevertheless, would in their reckoning appear as certain, and be received by the public as undoubted truths? I cannot think the rules of morality will allow the making so ill a use of public prejudice. They command us to be equitable towards all, and never to represent people worse than they are." "And as at the bottom," he adds, "it is a great fault to be ready to believe whatever is said to the disadvantage of our enemies, true or false, doubtful or certain; so there is more indiscretion than sincerity in revealing this prepossession. Would a cunning enemy discover this weak place? But, in point of indiscretion, this author has not his fellow."

Bayle, it is true, falls somewhat into the failings of those whom he so justly and so loudly condemns; but this he does upon the same plea upon which so much opposition is sought to be raised in our days both against the doctrines of the Anglican divines, and still more against those of the Catholic Church,—the presumed tendency of certain doctrines and opinions. Yet, after all, he acknowledges in respect to the casuistry taught by the Jesuits, that "they who have read father Piro's book (L'Apologie des Casuistes) will own, that it is easier to censure it, and perceive that it contains dangerous doctrines (i. e. in his estimation) than answer his objections."

The very same accusation, which we have exposed in Ranke, has been, frequently and long since, taught, wilfully and designedly, against them; as, for example, in 1682, in an anonymous work, called the "Emperor and Empire betrayed, and by whom?" "All this," says the writer, "smells strong of an obsequence, which knows no other duty, nor rule of justice and piety, than the absolute command of his superior." But of this, as well as of the many other lies and fabricated accusations against the Jesuits, Bayle very justly observes:

"These writers would be too obligingly treated, should we say to them, I expected proof, and you bring me vulgar stories. For they most commonly vent, not only what they have heard themselves, but what they have forged in the mist of their own brain. He whom I have cited, and M. Jurieu, would afford matter of laughter to all the world; the one maintains that the Jesuits betrayed the house of Austria in favour of France; and the other, that they would be always disposed to betray France in favour of the house of Austria."—Bayle's Dic., art. Ignatius of Loyola

If a Christian bishop would but do them the same justice as a layman, who had no other than the light of an infidel philosophy to guide him, we might rest contented. Till then we must console ourselves with the belief, that his injustice is the warrant for their innocence.

But we have still one little mistake to rectify. Another of the right reverend prelate's lamentations is, that "this is the order which directs the education of a great part of the people of Ireland, and of many of the sons of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry in England;" and even here, though there is a considerable admixture of truth, yet is there also a large portion of error. Verily, the right reverend prelate seems spell-bound against the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. In all Ireland, if we mistake not, the Jesuits have but two establishments,—a college at Clongowes, and a church in Dublin. We doubt not that in those two localities, they do their duty by all classes, whether they be of the upper or lower; but it is well, if they have two poor schools in all Ireland; and not being a missionary country like England, they have not one parish or congregation. Yet this is to be called educating a great part of the people of Ireland! Against the Catholic nobility and gentry of England, however, we must own it is a true bill. We ourselves were educated at Stonyhurst, and God be praised for the same! for whatever of good principles we have, we imbibed them there, and we have ever since been but too happy in every opportunity of bearing testimony to the strict discipline observed amongst the students, and the self-devotion and heroic virtue of the fathers of the society; and we beg the right reverend prelate to accept of our sincere thanks for procuring us this renewed gratification upon the present occasion.

Even at the risk of being tedious, we cannot refrain from a slight notice of another warning, and another calumny, against the Catholic Church. "We are far," says the charge, "from presuming to assert the absolute perfectness of our own Church; but it is not in retracing any of the steps, by which she has reveded from the Church of Rome, that she is to be made more perfect; nor by attempting to remodel her upon the doctrine and discipline, not of the primitive Church, but of the Church of the fourth or fifth century, infected as it was with the remains of Gnostic superstitions, and the inventions of enthusiastic or ambitious men."—p. 60.

Now, the Gnostic heresies were out of the Church, and not in it. They were, in the commencement, an admixture of Christianity introduced into Paganism and Judaism—erroneous tenets forced from Christianity, and engrafted even upon sectarian tenets of the Jews. Subsequently, indeed, some few derived their origin from teachers who were or had been connected with the Church; but these, such as Marcion, the most considerable of them all, were immediately excommunicated, and separated from the fellowship of the faithful. They were denounced by name, their doctrine repudiated, and themselves pointed out as men to be avoided as the authors and abettors of heresy. The doctrines of Christianity, as propounded by the Church, appeared defective to the eyes of Gnostic mysticism; and, though some of them were ambitious of a Christian origin, such as the Nicolaites and the Ebionites, yet not even these, were ever confounded with real orthodox Christians, who were bound together in one great but exclusive communion, and who held the unity of the Church as an essential and fundamental doctrine.

St. Irenæus informs us that some of the Gnostic heretics possessed representations of our Saviour both in painting and sculpture, which they declared to have been executed by order of Pilate during the life time of Christ. The saint reproached them with placing these representations with those of pagan philosophers, and using both with superstitious observances: so little of real Christianity had they*.

Cerintus, and Basilides, and Saturninus, were all disciples of the Alexandrian philosophy; taught the transmigration of souls; that the world was created by angels; and every possible variety of mystic extravagance and blasphemous impiety, interwoven only with some faint traces of Christianity. Valentinus, another of these Gnostics, was three times denounced by the Church at Rome, whither he had gone to broach his absurdities. Tatian quitted the Church as soon as he began to propagate his errors; while Theodotus was denounced and excommunicated by Pope Victor, for attempting to gain proselytes to his impious doctrines in Rome; and Noctus was expelled as an innovator by the clergy of Smyrna about the year 220.

When the heresiarch Montanus, about the close of the second century, began to disseminate his dangerous and subtle novelties among the people, he was continually, though in vain, called upon to desist: as a customary consequence, the Churches of Asia several times assembled to examine his doctrine, pronounced it impious, and cut off from the communion of the faithful all who were infected with his errors†.

When the great Tertullian, he who for many years had been the main living pillar of the Church, her most eloquent apologist, and the most active, as the most able, champion of orthodoxy, in face of all the heresies which surrounded him, allowed himself at length to be seduced within the snares of the enemy of the human race, and of truth; after joining these same Montanists for a short time, he set up a sect for himself, which adopted his name, and worshipped apart from the rest of the world‡. So distinct were all the heresies of this, as of every other age; and so completely have they ever served, instead of instilling their poison into her, to attest the orthodoxy of the Church, and to mark her triumph over them.

The Ophites, another division of Gnostics, separated themselves into various sects violently opposed to each other. Those whom Origen met in Egypt had nothing of Christianity amongst them; while the Sethians and Cainites pretended to derive their descents from Seth and Cain. Cælestius, Carpocrates, and Epiphanius had so little of Christianity in their system, that their followers were no better than so many sects of heathens. Of all the teachers of Gnosticism in any shape or form, the only one who contrived, by the art with which he concealed his doctrines from the public (announcing them only in secret assemblies,) to maintain himself within the ostensible limits of the Church, was Bardesanes.

But neither he, nor any of the numerous enemies of early Christianity, succeeded in instilling, without detection, their own doctrines amongst the faithful. Such as were unhappy enough to imbibe and profess them, were immediately repudiated, and cut off from the assemblies of the true believers; nor does it appear that any one sect of Gnostics ever admitted, in its integrity, any one doctrine of Christianity. This at least is certain, that, multifarious as they were, they every one of them denied and rejected the perfect, hypostatic union of the Divine and human nature in the person of Christ, though with an almost endless variety of the most fanciful opinions on this essential and fundamental tenet. Indeed, it would seem that it was a maxim with them, that uniformity of belief was neither attainable nor desirable, and that the human mind had a right range free and unrestricted amidst the boundless regions of a speculative and imaginary world. They had apocryphal Scriptures of their own; or, when they borrowed any from Christianity, they were careful to modify and corrupt them to their own views.

The Character of the Rev. William Palmer, M. A., of Worcester College, as a Controversialist; particularly with reference to his charge against the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, of quoting as genuine, works of the Fathers, spurious and heretical productions; considered in a letter to a friend at Oxford by a late Member of the University. London: Dolman. 1842.

One of our reasons for believing that this pamphlet is not wholly from the hand of a student is the very derivative way—to say the least—in which great names and their opinions are dealt with; a freedom which we dare not blame in a writer that stands above the herd, and is entitled to deal out praise and blame, with “a voice potential,” but which would sound rather out of place coming from younger and less known fingers. Thus it would hardly become the modesty of a young student of divinity, or of any student of divinity just received into the Church to pronounce that an opinion of Bellarmine and Baronius as to the feelings, at a particular juncture, of our Blessed Lady—is “a most ridiculous one,” (p. 41.) though such a strong expression of dissent may, for aught we know, be not unsuitable to the occasion, or to a critic of greater pretensions.

Let us now give a short extract, containing a specimen of the kind of evidence by which Mr. Palmer is refuted. The following passage gives first Mr. Palmer's accusation, and then the evidence in reply:—

“1. The next three quotations (p. 22, 23.) are from a homily, ‘In Annunciatione,’ ascribed also

* It is to be observed that St. Irenæus does not blame the use, but the abuse of these images. Ceillier, vol. ii. 145.

† Ceillier, p. 631. vol. ii.

‡ Ceillier, p. 377. vol. ii.

to Damascenus. It appears from Ceillier, that Leo Allatius believes this homily to have been composed by Theodore Studites the younger. When this writer lived, I cannot at this moment discover, but the elder Theodore flourished in the ninth century, nearly a hundred years after the time of Damascenus. Ceillier observes, that there are passages in the homilies on the annunciation, "which do not correspond with the modesty and gravity of this Father."

If Mr. Palmer had not been in so desperate a hurry to prove all Dr. Wiseman's citations spurious, he might have saved himself the disgrace of this exposure. Neither Ceillier or Leo Allatius say anything that Mr. Palmer here attributes to them. If he will be kind enough to turn once more to Ceillier, he will find that this critic most distinctly acknowledges the genuineness of the homily cited by Dr. Wiseman. His words are these:

"The sixth (homily) is on the same mystery, (the Annunciation). St. Damascene, who never allows an opportunity to escape of showing his devotion to the Blessed Virgin, renders thanks to her in this sermon, because by means of her we have images representing Jesus Christ, the Roman empire enjoys a settled peace, and the arms of the Saracens have been defeated," &c. &c.

The two next homilies are on the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin. Allatius ascribes the second to Theodore Studites the younger.

It is in the first of these homilies on the Nativity that Ceillier absurdly says, that there are passages "which do not correspond with the modesty and gravity of this Father," but this homily Dr. Wiseman has nowhere quoted.

The second half of this letter is the more valuable; and, indeed, it is of greater moment than the mere title-page would lead us to expect. It is not merely a waste of labour against a minnow of shallow waters like Mr. Palmer, but it is a vindication, on sound principles of criticism, against such Catholic writers as Ceillier and Tillemont, of the genuineness of ancient treatises which they have rashly condemned as spurious and valueless. Of course, in saying this, we mean no more than that to an unlearned ear this vindication sounds true and well grounded.

The following condensed criticism on Mr. Palmer is worth reading:—

The Origines Liturgicæ, and the Treaties on the Church, are Mr. Palmer's great works. The former of these, the only work of the kind ever written by a member of his communion (Brett wrote his after he had left the Church of England), owes every thing valuable in it to Renaudot, Assemani, and such writers. Wherever Mr. Palmer tries to be original, he falls into some disgraceful blunder. On the logic of this book I must say one or two words. It is written to show the similarity between the Anglican and Primitive Liturgies. To prove his point, Mr. Palmer should have taken the Primitive Liturgies, and shown that the Anglican one contained the same things. He has, however, reversed the plan, and proved nothing which any one would deny. Most heretics prove their perfect agreement with scripture and antiquity in the same way. They show that scripture and antiquity contain all the doctrines they believe. This, of course, no one denies. What we assert is, that scripture and antiquity contain doctrines which they do not believe. And so with reference to the Liturgies. The Primitive Liturgies contain all that is contained in Protestant Prayer-books, but they contain much more. The "awful, unbloody, propitiatory sacrifice," which is the very life and soul of all the Primitive Liturgies without exception, and to which everything in them is made subservient, is cut out of the Anglican. To look in the latter for any sacrifice except that of praise and thanksgiving, which any layman is qualified (nay bound) to offer, is like seeking for refreshing streams in "that dry and thirsty land where no water is."

The "Treatise on the Church," strange as it may appear, is neither more nor less than a castigated and Anglicanized version of such books as Tourneley, Bailly, and similar works, which every Catholic student is obliged to have at his finger's ends before he is admitted to the priesthood. I think I might safely challenge Mr. Palmer to point out a single passage he has quoted from the Fathers, for which he is not indebted to our own theologians. No! if "Romanism" had really been "negligentful of antiquity," Mr. Palmer's work would never have been written, or at latest would have been written in a very different manner, both as to matter and form.

In a note to page 69, we find a true and most important remark, which we think we are not in error in attributing to Dr. Wiseman.

In addition to the fact mentioned, in the former of these extracts, it may be observed, that sanctity of life, and the deepest views on all the great truths of Christianity, always go together. This is seen in the case of all the mediæval saints. St. Bernard for instance. In later times, again, we see that worldliness among Catholics produces a distaste for strong doctrine, on the worship of the Blessed Virgin, the authority of the Roman Pontiff, and other topics, whereas, sanctity of life and particularly the devotion to the Passion of our Lord produces "ultramontanes," and "Mariolaters." This is a matter of constant experience. The principal Gallican divines were worldly men; Fenelon was an "ultramontane." And now, among the Oxford Divines, those whose writings show them to have attained most experience in the spiritual life are precisely those who hold what are called extreme opinions.—Tablet.

MISCELLANEA.

FATHER MATHEW.

Colonel SIBTHORP, seeing the right hon. gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department in his place, said he was anxious to put a question to him in reference to a subject which was exciting very great attention in this country. He wished to know whether the right hon. baronet was aware of the recent importation into this country of an individual by name Father Mathew. ("Hear," and laughter.) He did not attribute motives to that individual, but it appeared to him singular that while there was a great outcry—whether right or wrong he would not say—in this House and elsewhere against Orange processions in Ireland, and the exhibition of party banners, it should be allowed in a Protestant country for Popish banners to be carried, and publicly displayed by Popish priests. He begged to know whether the right hon. baronet was aware of what was going on in reference to the so-called Temperance movement; and whether any steps would be taken to prevent its being the precursor of future proceedings for carrying out the objects of those who were now disturbing Ireland.—Sir J. GRAHAM replied that he was aware Father Mathew had visited this part of the United Kingdom, and that in several large cities the pledge of temperance had been taken by great numbers of the working classes; but that was a circumstance which had in no way excited his (Sir J. Graham's) jealousy or alarm. ("Hear," and a laugh.) On the contrary, he thought that the observance of the pledge in every class of society would be of great advantage. Nothing could appear to him more humbles than the proceedings of Father Mathew, and in reference to these proceedings nothing had excited his attention except the report of the interchange of a salute in public between Father Mathew and Lord Stanhope. ("Hear," and loud laughter.)

FATHER MATHEW AND MRS. HOWARD.—On Tuesday, the 22d, the Rev. Theobald Mathew breakfasted with Mrs. Howard, of Corby, and her son, at her house, in Lower Brook-street. Among the guests who met the rev. gentleman were, Lady Eleanor and Miss Lowther, Lord and Lady Dinorben, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Lady Bedford, Mrs. John Barrett Lennard, the Earl of Effingham, Mrs. Edward Dawkins, Lady Stepney, Sir Henry Webb, Bart., the Hon. Mrs. Douglas, Mr. and Mrs. William Beckford and Miss Beckford, Lady Murray, Miss Mary Blount, Lord and Lady Manners, Miss Agnes Strickland and her sister, Mrs. Morley, Mr. David Barclay, M. P., the Hon. Miss Murray, Maid of Honour to the Queen, and Miss Franklin, Count Zamoyiski, Lord Montague, and the Hon. Mrs. Arthur Dillon and Mrs. Jameson, the well-known author, Viscount Clements, and Sir James Flower, Bart., M. P., and Lord St. Vincent. Father Mathew afterwards went to administer the pledge at Deptford.

INVOLUNTARY EVIDENCE.—"At a meeting of the British Society for promoting the religious principles of the Reformation," held on Monday at Dover, the following unwilling testimony to the religious education of poor Catholics was borne by the Rev. Mr. Cumming, who did not appear to perceive the force of his own observations. He asserted that the strength or weakness of the empire reposed in the humble classes, and that the Romish church felt and acted on this. She sent forth her poorest members into the workshops and manufactories, thoroughly versed in the religious controversy; and the great efforts of the Reformation Society was to raise up well instructed operatives, who should be able to meet them.

JUSTICE AT OXFORD.—The Dublin Evening Post, commenting on the "Wynter" correspondence, says:—"There was, as they allege, an heretical sermon preached by a Dignitary of the Church of England, and a Professor of Hebrew in the University. They had (Dr. Wynter and his Assassins) that sermon before them. Well, then, did they point out, in any page or section of the sermon, a single heretical dogma? Was there any proposition set forth by Doctor Pusey on which they fastened? In the Catholic Church, when what is deemed a schismatical publication takes place, the highest authority in that Church—the Pope and the College of Cardinals—refer the publication to a committee to draw out distinct propositions from the context to which exception is taken—taking care to declare, at the foot of each proposition, the true Catholic doctrine on the points at issue. What has been Dr. Wynter's course? He does not condescend to lay his finger on a single sentence of the sermon, with the view of impugning the doctrine taught—nay, he does not venture to assert that there is any heresy at all in the sermon. But, standing with his assistants upon the Sic Volo sic Jubeo of a Roman Emperor, or a Caliph of Bagdad, he punishes and degrades a man of irreproachable life, without even affirming that he is guilty of any the least crime, canonical or otherwise. If there were a Convocation now, the Church of England, like the Church of Scotland, would go to pieces on the rocks. But, avoiding this peril, who will ensure the safety of the Ark, in the boiling Charybdis in which she is now tossing about like a feather?

NOVA SCOTIA.

THE NEW CEMETERY.—The Right Rev. Dr. Walsh, the bishop who had lately returned to the colony, presided on the 23d ult. at St. Mary's Church, in Halifax, at a meeting preparatory to that of the 26th, when the Catholics assembled by thousands to enclose the new Catholic cemetery, the ground for which had been purchased by subscription, and placed at the bishop's devotion for that purpose. The six wards of the parish appointed each six representatives, so that all the body were divided into thirty-six companies, each presided over by its wandbearer, and the banners of the Irish and Temperance Societies were borne in the procession.

BRITISH GUIANA.

Sailed, on the 16th of August, from Southampton, per steamer Tweed, for Georgetown, county Demerary, the Right Rev. Dr. Clancy. In consequence of the death of several priests, in that most mephitic climate, and the abandonment of their missions by others, the vicariate is at present served by only one ecclesiastic. The Bishop of Oriens expects a supply of clergymen from Rome, and returns to the colony (though in bad health) for the purpose of rescuing from the hands of a few schismatical laymen ecclesiastical property, and transmitting it by legal conveyance to his canonical successors. The nuns, notwithstanding many spiritual privations, caused by the want of priests, enjoy good health and public confidence.

SOUTHERN AFRICA.

The Rev. George Gibson, late of St. Patrick's Liverpool, sailed from Portsmouth for his new mission, Fort Beaufort, in Southern Africa, on Sunday, August 20, in the ship True Briton.

CHINA.

HONG KONG.—A Correspondent of the Derry Sentinel, writes from Hong Kong, a description of the island:—"We have already three religious places of worship here; one a building allotted for the present to the Church of England until a more suitable one can be erected, one Baptist church, and one very chaste building belonging to the Church of Rome, several of whose missionaries have arrived here, and are very active; there is a kind of college, I believe, attached to the chapel. I suppose they hope to occupy their lost ground in the country, through which the disciples of Loyola once preached without hinderance, some of whom even held posts about the Imperial person.

THE PASSING BELL.—Our correspondent has given us great gratification by the information that the Rev. Dr. O'Connell has resolved to restore at the church of St. Michael and St. John, in Dublin, the ancient and edifying practice of the passing bell. It will toll on all occasions of death in the parish, without distinction of rank or station; and, while it announces the death of a parishioner, neighbour, or friend, will suggest the truly Catholic duty of a prayer for the passing soul—an act of charity extending beyond the grave. We are surprised to learn that this is the first revival in Catholic Ireland of this ancient and almost universal ceremony.

BERMUDA.

ROMAN CATHOLIC SOLDIERS.—A Roman Catholic inhabitant of Bermuda addresses the Halifax Register in the voice of complaint to that fearless advocate of Catholic interests in the British colonies, on the subject of the soldiery at Bermuda left without religious consolation, or the hope of it. Father M'Sweeney had visited them, and done much good; but though this excellent priest had crossed a stormy sea of 600 miles in the depth of a Nova Scotian winter, without a farthing's cost to the state, he was debarred by the authorities from visiting the Catholic convicts! In like manner, in the heat of a Bermuda summer, the Catholic soldiers are drawn up under the burning sky, while the Protestants of several persuasions are comfortably seated at prayers. For the honour of the army itself, for the protection of the Catholic soldiers, we proclaim to the British empire that in Bermuda, in this year of our Lord, 1843, the Catholic soldier does not enjoy religious freedom, that his dearest rights of conscience are trifled with, in a word, that he is a spiritual slave. The Catholic soldier is there forced to send his children to a military school, where they are taught the Protestant Catechism, the Protestant Scriptures, in a word, a religion in which their parents do not believe. Is not this interference with the rights of conscience? Is this British remuneration for Catholic fidelity? Do the souls of soldiers' children become the property of the officers, because their parents have the misfortune to be under their temporal command? By what right, law, or principle can any officer coerce a soldier to have his child taught a religion which he abhors, no matter what that religion may be? Where is the Act of Parliament, where the authority which confers this monstrous power? Again, as to the soldier himself, we know from the best authority, and we defy contradiction, that within the present month of July, 1843, the Catholic soldiers have been kept outside barracks, under the rays of a burning sun, during the whole time the Protestant service was going on. We have this from an eye witness who could not be deceived. The poor men thus drawn up were exposed to the jers of their comrades, as well as to the fiery heat of the sun. We heard of some who were foolish enough to succumb, and to enter the Church—of others who were tempted by the alluring coolness to take refuge in the porch—of all, that they felt it as a cruel and degrading punishment, of which they feared to complain. We send this statement back to Bermuda on the wings of the press. We provoke an answer. We challenge contradiction. We assert that the above occurred at Ireland Island on Sunday, the 2nd of this present month of July.—Halifax Register.

ITALY.

Half an hour after noon, on the 3d inst., at Senegallia, died his Eminence Cardinal Fabrizio Scerbas Testaferata, bishop of that see, who was born at Valetta in Malta on the 20th of April, 1758, and was promoted to the Purple by Pope Pius VII., of holy memory, on the 6th of April, 1818. This eminent ecclesiastic has left at Senegallia monuments of the intellect, the wisdom, and the charity that animated him. He opened a seminary for clerks, confided to religious ladies the education of the female children of his diocese, repaired all its collegiate edifices, instituted at his own expense a Mont de Piete; founded and endowed a new establishment for foundlings, called in the Sisters of Charity to the maintenance and education of female orphans, and the Brothers of the Christian Doctrine to the tutelage of orphan boys. His memory will never die in the hearts of his spiritual children, who, while he yet lived, had raised a statue to his honour.

IRELAND.

Miss Anne Collins and Miss Anne Murphy received the habit of religion at the convent in Blackrock on Friday, in the presence of fifty of the clergy, and a large number of the inhabitants of Cork, Catholic, Protestant, and Dissenting. The Right Rev. Dr. Murphy officiated, and the Rev. Dominic Murphy, of St. Patrick's, preached from the text "Every one that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father or mother, or wife or children, or lands for my name's sake shall receive an hundred fold, and shall possess life everlasting."—Matt. xix chap., 29 verse. The grave Gregorian chant of the priests, so beautifully varying the instrumental and vocal performance of the convent choir, expressed to the mind and heart the sacred influence of the music; but the most thrilling part of the ceremony was that in which the postulants substituted for their white satin ball-dresses the sombre garb of the convent.

His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Crolly, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland, arrived in Drogheda on Friday, from the archiepiscopal city, in excellent health.

The Rev. Edward Gordon, Catholic pastor of the missions at Niagara, of the new diocese of Toronto, has arrived in Dublin, his native city, on a short visit, after an absence of nearly twenty years. The accounts of the progress of religion in his diocese are most gratifying to every lover of religion. The Rev. Mr. Gordon will return not only an admirer, but a pledged disciple of the Apostle of Temperance, of whom he speaks in the most unbounded terms of respect and admiration.

PORTUGAL.

The face of things in the peninsula is changed; Spain has reconquered the right and the power to return into a right way, and at the same moment the reconciliation of Portugal to the Holy See is perfected. The Patriarch of Lisbon has received the Cardinal's hat from the Queen, and at the same time the Bishop of Lisbon was consecrated. The administration of this rite to the Archbishop of Beagu, and the Bishops of Oporto, Beja, and the Algarias, was to follow within a few days.—Univers,

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

We have already shown, that from the peaceful undisputed spiritual supremacy exercised by the successor of St. Peter in the sixth century, we are obliged to concede, that that supremacy must have been universally acknowledged in the 5th century, and also in the centuries which intervened between that period and the era when Christianity was first promulged. The justness of the reasoning we have advanced, will be more readily appreciated, if our readers reflect, that, if in the sixth, the fifth, or even the fourth century, the Roman Pontiff began for the first time to exercise such supremacy, then he must have found the minds of all orthodox Christians disposed to dispute the existence of that prerogative, and in reality as hostile to the recognition of such a principle, as any Protestant Christians of the present day are. Hence the assumption of the supremacy, at any of the periods just referred to, would have encountered an opposition similar to that, which Protestants would oppose to it in our time. In these circumstances, it is evident, that whatever success temporal power might have in establishing such a usurpation, as the Papacy would be, in the hypothesis under consideration, it could never prevent history from recording the epoch when it occurred, and the means employed to subdue the opposition, which it must have encountered. But we have already established, in the early part of this inquiry, when refuting the assertion that the assumption of unlimited temporal power by the Popes was one of the leading events of the sixth century, that in point of fact, the Popes of that period were often destitute even of the power necessary to save themselves from persecution unto death, and, therefore, very far from being in such a condition, as would have enabled them to coerce the Christian world by force of arms, or by any other display of temporal resources, to acknowledge their spiritual supremacy. We have, moreover, shown, that not only were the Popes the sixth century destitute of any temporal power adequate to the accomplishment of such an enterprise, but also that, whenever circumstances made it necessary, the Roman Pontiffs openly declared, that the Emperors possessed all power in temporal concerns, whilst themselves, the administration, only of spiritual things belonged. It is easy to confirm all that we have advanced, by adducing some of the testimonies which the early Fathers and Councils supply upon this subject.

From these it will appear, that long before the sixth century, the spiritual headship or primacy of the chair of Peter was universally acknowledged by the Churches of the East and West. It is well, also, to remark, that the authorities we here appeal to, in support of the Apostolic primacy of the chair of Peter do not simply assert, that, in the age to which they respectively belong, the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff was actually and de facto acknowledged. No, these authorities proceed farther, and teach that doctrine as a familiar well known truth, which like the other truths of Christianity, was established by Christ and transmitted faithfully to succeeding ages. We shall now quote the memorable words addressed to Pope Leo, by the Fathers assembled in the general Council of Chalcedon in the year 451:

"In the person of Peter, appointed our Interpreter, you preserved the chair of Faith, by the command of our Master descending to us. Wherefore using you as a guide, we have filled the truth to the Faithful, not by private interpretation, but by one unanimous mission. If where two or three are gathered together in the name of Christ, he is there in the midst of them, how must he have been in 520 Ministers? over these, as the head of the members, You PRESIDED, by those who held your rank; we entreat you, therefore, to honour our decision by your decrees, and we agreed with the Head, so let your Eminence complete what is proper for your children—besides this, Dioscorus carries his rage against him, to whom CHRIST ENTRUSTED THE CARE OF HIS VINEYARD, THAT IS AGAINST OUR APOSTOLIC HOLINESS." Referring to these words, Pope Leo in a letter addressed to the learned Bishop named Theoderet writes as follows: "We rejoice, that what truths had been first defined by our ministry, should be confirmed by the irrevocable consent of the brethren there (at Chalcedon) assembled, knowing that to be divine, which proceeding from the FIRST OF ALL THE SEES, received the sanction of the Christian world, and lest the consent thus given to that see, WHICH THE LORD CHAINED TO PRESIDE OVER ALL OTHERS, shall appear the effect of flattery, or be otherwise suspiciously construed, it so happened, that at judgment was at first controverted by time. Truth shines more clearly and is more strongly retained, when what faith at first might is confirmed by examination."

CHITTAGONG.

We are indebted to the kindness of our venerated Prelate for the use of the following highly interesting letter, addressed to His Grace by that zealous and indefatigable Missionary, the Rev. Mr. Barbe, Vicar of Chittagong:

MY LORD.—I have the honor to send to your Grace the sketch* of the Bandel Church of Chittagong. The Edifice measures 150 by 40. On the same ground stands the Churchyard, Boys' School, and the Parochial house; to the zeal and piety of my Predecessor, the Reverend A. Goiran, the Christians are indebted for the erecting of these buildings; the congregation deserves a great deal of credit for the manner in which they have seconded the views of this respectable Clergyman, as the expenses incurred are not less than Ten Thousand Rs. The Christians are about 1600 in number it is true, but they are generally speaking, poor. God to whom all belongs, creating in their hearts charitable feeling, has given them the means to raise to his name a place of worship! May the Saviour of our souls be praised by these people, who contributed their mite to erect a Church to their God.

Close to the Church-ground a large Bungalow was erected last year for the Girls' School, the spot was given by H. Randolph, Esquire, who also presented to the Church a Bell and a silver Ostensorium.

The Christians are scattered in different villages, some living at 12, and 15 miles from town, to which is to be attributed their irregular attendance at Church; the number of Christians in town are about 600; Jamal-khan, which is about 2 miles from town, contains about 300 Christians, there are a Church and a burial ground attached to it. I have prayers there every second Sunday early in the morning.

Last year a Bungalow was built at Khatolia (at the expense for the greater part of Mr. J. D. Freitas)—it is 4 miles distant from town, there I have prayers every second Sunday early in the morning, and I come back to town for High Mass, which begins at 10 o'clock. The Christians are in that village about 100 in number.

From the place where stands that small Church, might be seen the ruins of the house of the late learned Sir William Jones; the building was so strong, that a great part of the roof stands yet, notwithstanding the beams are all gone, the walls are entwined by roots of different creepers, the cornice and panels are inhabited by a great number of wild pigeons. The view from that hill is one of the most beautiful that I have ever seen. What a pity that such a building has fallen into the hands of a native.

The Portuguese settled in the coast of Chittagong in the year 1600, and entered as warriors in the service of the native Princes. The first Church was built by them at Deang which is at the mouth of the river, the spot may yet be traced, it is on an elevated ground, the building appears to have been about 80 feet in length, and 40 in breadth. 12 Christian families live close to that spot, and I was told by a Mosulman, who is about 100 years old, that he recollected the time when some of the villages close to that place were all inhabited by Christians, since that Epoch, some families are gone to Tipperah, some to Neacolly, and the remainder are in different places of the Chittagong district.

The Soobah of Bengal took Chittagong from the Arrucanes in 1666, and the Mogul Government retained it till it was ceded to the East India Company in 1766, by the Nabob Jaffer Ali Khan. As one of the predecessors of this ruler had granted to the Priest who was in charge of the Christians, 30 Rupees monthly, and also 165 Rupees for the repair of the Churches, it was stipulated at the cession of the Territory, that the Company should continue the grant, which has been done ever since.

* To Mr. Fernandez I am indebted for the present sketch. He has also made an oil painting for the Church, representing the Crucifixion, measuring 8 feet by 4 feet, which is well executed.—this young man is to be patronized.

Chittagong, which is comprised between the latitude 21 and 23 degrees, north, is bounded to the North by Tipperah, to the South by Arracan; to the East by a long ridge of high Hills, and to the West by the Sea and the adjacent Islands, Sundeeep and Hattiah.

The population of the district is about 1,50,000, more than two thirds are Mosulmans,* some Mug Villages are to be found in parts of the District, and close to the Hills on the banks of the river are tribes of Arracanese extraction; the hills are inhabited by Kookies, Khyangs and other independent tribes about whom very little is known.

The land in the plains is all in cultivation, some parts give two crops a year. Mustard seed, linseed-oil, country hemp, (Gurshon) and Caster-oil grow well, on the foot of the hills grows a species of Cardamums which is very much like the Tenasserim pa-la. The Sylvestris Vinea is found on many parts of the Hills, the grapes are small and the fruits are a little acid, but I have no doubt it would be very easy to improve them. Tigers, Leopards, Gya's, and the wild Cows, as those in the Tenasserim Provinces, are to be found in the Hills, also a great variety of Monkeys, amongst them is the great species of Gybon. Amongst the birds are two species of peacocks, pheasants, wild fowls, mangoe birds and king fishers. Green pigeons, of different sizes as also the imperial pigeons are very common. On the Hills the Tukan of the largest size is to be found also.

Chittagong has two species of fowls of very large breed, the first is called by the natives "Colow" and is so large that the cock measures 2 feet in height and is obliged to bend his knee to feed. The fishes are in great variety and some very good, the Mangoes and Mullet are to be had all the year round—the fruits and vegetables are inferior to those of Calcutta.

The soil is very rich and adapted for the culture of Sugar Cane, Coffee, Tea and Cocoa. I have in my garden two species of Sugar Cane, the largest, which is the Mauritius, grows about 14 feet high and is of very good thickness, but I doubt whether it contains so much Saccharine as the country ones, which are small indeed, but much sweeter. Coffee grows very well here. I have some in my garden planted about 2 years ago and the trees are loaded with berries. To A. Sconce, Esquire, who is a most zealous gentleman for the improvement of the country, Chittagong is indebted for a Coffee Company, which promises to the Shareholders a good return,—that gentleman has in his garden a couple hundred of Trees of Assam Tea, from which he has this year made some Tea of good flavour. I have seen on one of the Hills a Cocoa tree loaded with fruits and in as good a condition as any that I have seen at Penang—formerly there was also some Nutmeg trees giving fruits, which were destroyed in the time of the Buiwesa War. I had this year in my garden some Gunja plants, cannabis, which was in as good a condition as those which grow in the South of France, so I have no doubt that if enterprising persons would settle in this country they could turn to profit their Capital. The land is very cheap and workmen might be got for 2 Rupees Annas monthly.

Chittagong is a very romantic place,—on the separated Hills which rise from 100 to 150 feet on the level of the Sea, are very fine houses where the respectable people of the place reside, from these may be seen the Island of Sundeeep and the Sea on one side, and on the opposite side the Hills, the Plains and the different Rivers* serpentine in every direction and affording to the Ryots the facility to transport in boats the products of their lands. The water of Chittagong, which flows by small streams from these Hills, is very clear and of the most excellent quality. The houses in Chittagong are scattered in so many directions and at such distance from each other, that it is difficult to mark the limits of the town, but generally speaking the city extends from the Public Offices to the river, and the principal part is known by the name of Ferringee Bazar. There is only one good street which runs from the Hills to the Pier, where the Salt Godahs are small, the roads on the other parts of the town are scarcely passable during the rains. Few pukka houses are to be found in the town, the greatest part of them being built of bamboos and mud. In some places persons without names (femes sans noms) are confined in some of the streets, not being allowed to parade in the open and in the Burman country persons of that description are not allowed to reside in the town, they are in small houses out of it, but here those persons are to be found in all the streets, a great annoyance to the respectable people to see such neighbours close to their families.

The Civil Establishment consists of a Commissioner, a Judge, two Collectors and the Salt

* I say nothing about the character of the inhabitants—the Natives here bring of the same disposition as in other Bengal districts—generally speaking their God is Mahomed and for him they would sacrifice every thing.

* The rise of the Chittagong River is 13 feet.

Agent—the Doctor who is in charge of the three Companies stationed here belonging to the Regiment at Arracan.

Chittagong produces Rice enough for consumption but seldom for exportation. The Toon, which I believe is called Penang Mahogany, is very common, it is exported to Calcutta for furniture, but it does not last long, being destroyed very soon from dry rot. There is also another species of wood with beautiful veins of dark colour, very hard and lasting, called Chackerassy,—the Jarrol used for ship building is very common, and sold at a low price—in comparison with the teak, this wood is coarse, but under water it lasts as long as teak, but exposed to the sun it splits,—vessels built of Jarrol with teak decks are as good as if they were all teak built.

Formerly Chittagong was a great place for Ship building, some being of 7 or 800 Tons, but since the English have taken possession of Moulmein few vessels are built here,—the number of Sloops belonging to this port is about 400 in average, carrying from 2 to 6000 Maunds each, the expence for building these vessels are calculated at one Rupee per maund when completed, so for 6000 Rupees a person may have a new vessel ready to go to sea, carrying 6000 Maunds (3000 bags) here I speak of vessels built by natives, who are able to get carpenters cheaper and also don't trouble themselves much about the quality of the materials,—the number of Sloops built here every year is from 30 to 40. The sails of these Sloops are made of country canvas, well cleaned. Hemp is sold at the rate of 2 Rs. 4 Annas per maund unbleached, the piece measuring 35 yards, is sold for 4 to 5 Rupees, the sails of small Vessels are made of Cotton called Dosootty or Dungary, which cost 1 R. 12 as. a piece, measuring 35 cubits, they generally last 2 years. The Commanders of these Sloops receive from 30 to 40 Rupees per month, they, generally speaking, are Musulmen, some of them know how to take observation; when Christians are in command, being reputed more clever, they have higher salary, these vessels being badly built and badly fitted up, never go to sea against the monsoon, they start in October or November and come back in April, they bring Salt from Arracan to Chittagong, and from hence carry it to Dacca, some take paddy or rice from Arracan to Penang and they bring back Beetlenut, Cocanuts, or touch at the Coromandel coast for salt, those that are too late at Penang and consequently unable to proceed to Madras, return to Chittagong touching at Arracan for Paddy.

Maldivie Boats of the same description as those to be seen at Calcutta, are built in form of a Junk having only a mast, remarkable for their lightness as being generally built with Cocoa-nut trees,—they come here two or three every year in September and October, they bring Cocanuts, Coir and Cowries and take back in January, Rice, Piece Goods and Curry Stuff, some of the largest carry about 5000 Maunds. Burman boats sometimes visit this place in November and December, bringing Teak, Cotton and Petroleum, they take back Tobacco and Beetlenut, but generally they proceed to Nu'chitty where they get Beetlenut much cheaper and they have no duty to pay.

The communication between this and Calcutta is closed for boats from May to September. As it is very dangerous in the South West Monsoon to cross Sundee and Hattiah, any other part of the year Balams of different sizes proceed to Calcutta at each spring, these boats are not very nice to look at, but they are safe and the planks being sewed with rattans they are very light,—they take to Calcutta planks, Turkeys,† Fowls, and fish-maws, this last article might be had here in great quantities in the cold season at the rate of 25 or 30 Rs. the maund,—they bring to Chittagong Iron, Tar, Oakum, Piece Goods and Provisions of different kinds,—their trip never exceeds more than a month.

Chittagong being very healthy, formerly many European residents of Calcutta resorted here for the benefit of their health, and I don't know why the station is declining, the living is cheap, there are many houses on the Hills inhabited, and in the cold season the place is very pleasant, the Thermometer never rising at that time above 65 in the middle of the day, and in May which is the hottest month in the year, it seldom rises above 87. The Monsoon begins in May and ends in September—the quantity of water which falls does not exceed 70 inches, when on the Tennasserim coast during the Monsoon, which begins and ends at the same time, 200 inches of water is the average. May and June are the most unhealthy months,—last year during that time many persons died of Cholera in different parts of the district, we lost 12 Christians of that dreadful disease, the prevalent sickness being fever, bowel complaint and spleen: to the last, many children are subject, on account I believe of the dampness of the place; this year has been very sickly, fever being very prevalent, but few persons have died. Here, as in many other places, when persons

* The monopoly of salt is in the hands of the East India Company, its cost including establishment, &c. to them per maund is about 1 R. 8 as. and they sell the same at 4 Rs. 4 as. which yields about 30 lack of Rupees clear, annually.

get sick they use charms to be cured; when the disease increases, they take Medicine from the native quacks, changing every 2d or 3rd day Medical attendants, and in the last stage of the disease they call a Doctor, and if the person dies they blame him for it.

Chittagong could very well spare 10 or 12000 people, those labourers would perhaps have objection to proceed so far as Mauritius, but I dare say that many of them would be most happy to go to Moulmein if their expenses were paid, and they were sure to gain a livelihood.

At 25 miles to the North-West of Chittagong is the Hill of Seethakoond, on the summit of which is built a place of worship esteemed sacred by Hindoos and Mugs. This Hill contains volcanic-focus which makes its appearance between the different beds of clay which compose the strata, as smoke or fire. There live certain number of Fuckeers, who under the appearance of penance and mortification enjoy all the luxuries of this life; four miles to the East of Seethakoond-Hill is another place called Bâlowâ-koond, esteemed very sacred by the people. On the Hill is a Pagoda built by other Fuckeers in which is a well 5 or 6 feet deep and about 15 in circumference, on the surface of the water is a gas continually lighted without any explosion or noise; but the continual agitation of the water occasioned by the column of air bubbles, bursting on their arrival on the surface the water renders it perfectly cold and tasteless.

Chittagong has two places of Protestant worship, one Episcopal and the other Ana-Baptist. The first is built in the Gothic style, and the Clergyman who resides at Dacca, spends here the cold season,—the congregation of the Ana-Baptist is composed of 25 or 30 persons, being chiefly their own families. The society keeps here two country-born preachers, one receives 200 rupees monthly and the other 150, they have also 2 or 3 native preachers, paid by the same society. If the blessing of God does not appear in their spiritual works, the same cannot be said respecting their family, as the two Reverend Gentlemen who are yet in the middle of their age, are blessed with 18 children. If they misunderstand certain texts of the Scripture, it cannot be said that they misunderstand the 15th Chapter of Genesis. The promises made to Abraham has it appears more charms for some persons, than have the counsels which St. Paul gives in his first Epistle to the Corinthians.

I am happy to inform your Grace that since my return from Tippetrah I baptized 5 Adults, amongst them were 2 Mug women, and 2 more are under instruction.

I have the honor to be my Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient and Faithful servant,

Chittagong, Sep. 5, 1843.

SECUNDERABAD.--At Secunderabad one hundred and fifty-eight persons have renounced the Schism and returned to the Church. At the same place a numerous Tea-party was held by the Members of the Temperance Society, the Rev. Mr. Murphy presiding.

HYDERABAD.—We understand that a new Church is about to be founded at Hyderabad for the Catholic inhabitants.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

FORT WILLIAM.

On Monday the 6th instant, a numerous meeting of the soldiers of the 10th, who had taken the Total Abstinence Pledge, was held in the Catholic Fort Chapel, with a view to form themselves into a regular society. Several of the gentlemen from St. Xavier's College attended, together with the Rev. R. Johnson, S. J. who was called upon to fill the chair. He opened the discussion with a warm and earnest address, in which he enlarged with much force on the signal advantages of temperance both as to this life and the next, and professed his readiness to do every thing in his power to support and promote the holy cause for which the meeting that evening had been convened. The resolutions, which had been drawn up by the soldiers themselves, were then proposed by Messrs. Cooper, McKenzie and Norton, by Color Sergt. Gwydir and others, each resolution enforced by a brief but eloquent speech, and after a short discussion they were carried unanimously. The meeting broke up at gun-fire, every person of it delighted with the unanimity and cordiality which had marked its proceedings. The resolutions passed, are as follows.

1st Resolution.—That being deeply convinced of the great evils of intemperance (the immediate cause of distress, disease, and crime) and viewing the success with which it has pleased Almighty God to bless the endeavours of Teetotalism, at home and abroad, we feel it desirable to form a Society at Fort William with a view to check the evil of intemperance in the Regt.

2nd Resolution.—That it is the opinion of this meeting that total Abstinence from all intoxicating liquors will alone effect this desirable end.

3rd Resolution.—That a Total Abstinence Society be formed and called the Fort William

Total Abstinence Society and His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal be solicited to become the President.

4th Resolution.—The pledge shall be to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal purposes and when prescribed by a medical man, and to discountenance the causes and practice of Intemperance.

5th Resolution.—That every person professing Christianity be invited to become a member of the Society.

6th Resolution.—That the Society do hold meetings once a fortnight and that nothing but Total Abstinence subjects be discussed.

7th Resolution.—That a committee of three members with power to add to their numbers, be appointed, whose duty shall be to solicit donations for the interest of the Society and to draw up and present to the society a code of rules for adoption.

8th Resolution.—That to carry out the intentions contained in the foregoing resolutions, it is the opinion of this meeting that it is necessary to form a committee of management of the following persons with power to add to their number if requisite viz.

Serjt. P. Brophy, Corp. J. Carroll,
" E Higgins, " P. J. M'Donnell,
" M. O'Donnell; Ln. Corp. J. O'Connor.
Pt. B. Supple.

9th Resolution.—That Color Serjeant Richard Gwydir act as Secretary.

10th Resolution.—That each member on being enrolled do pay to the Treasurer the sum of eight Annas, to be entered in a Book kept for that purpose as well as a monthly subscription of four annas. The money so collected, after defraying all local expences, be disbursed according to the decision of the Committee.

Goa.—We learn from the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette of the 28th ultimo that His Grace the Archbishop of Goa, is expected to arrive at Bombay by one of the next Steamers from Suez.

MADRAS.—The Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly V. A. of Madras, has we learn just opened another School in Chindatrapetta, in the house formerly occupied by Cather Saib, in order to give the Catholics of that village the benefit of an English Education at a very moderate charge, and the children of the indigent Catholics to be admitted gratis, and they send about 30 larks of

CONVERSIONS.

At St. Thomas' Mount, Madras, about the middle of October ten heathens were baptized by the Catholic clergy of that station, and on the 23d of the same month, seven Protestants were received into the Church.

VERY REV. MR. MORE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—It is, I think, necessary in order to perpetuate the memory of the late Very Rev. Mr. Moré, whose zeal and kindness of heart and eminent success in this Mission, were so highly appreciated by every member of the Catholic Community, that a suitable Tablet be subscribed for, commemorative of the high estimation in which he was held by us, and of the degree of respect which we must yet necessarily feel for a character so much valued. I would therefore beg to suggest that a subscription be immediately opened, and I have not the least doubt justice will be done in so righteous a cause. It may perhaps be necessary to obtain the sanction of His Grace the Archbishop to this proposal, but I am certain that it will be readily given by the Venerated Prelate.

Should my anticipation, in this matter be fulfilled, I would further suggest that, when the subscriptions amount to the sum required for the Tablet, a Meeting of the subscribers be convened with a view to resolve upon the inscription, location, &c. or perhaps it would be much more satisfactory to leave the whole matter to the judgment of His Grace and the Jesuit Fathers.

A. B.

We have to inform A. B. that a beautiful Tablet is in progress of erection at the expense of an attached Friend to the deceased.—Ed.

The acting Orphan Committee return respectful thanks to W. G. for his donation of six dozen and a half of wine for the use of the Orphanage.

FATHER MATHEW IN LONDON.

Last Saturday about 4,000 persons took the pledge in the Catholic Cemetery, Commercial-road; amongst the number were several police-men and Custom-house officers. During the day some speakers addressed the meeting on the peculiar hardships and temptations to which the coal-whippers, as a body, were exposed, on account of having their wages paid to them in public houses, the owners of which, in the majority of cases, had the power of giving or refusing employment. A petition in favour of the Coal Whippers' Bill, now under the consideration of the Legislature, was unanimously agreed to. Last Sunday, about one o'clock, the cemetery was crowded, and from that hour till half-past nine at night there was a constant flux and influx of visitors. A great number of Temperance societies with their banners were on the ground. It was calculated by several competent persons, that about 100,000 persons of both sexes had visited the spot. In one of Father Mathew's brief addresses, he stated that he had attended in order to administer the pledge to those who could not conveniently come upon working days, and that no one could be scandalized at such a deed which did not interfere in any way with the religious worship of any creed. A variety of speakers addressed the meeting, one of whom, Mr. Clewer, related the following anecdote:—A Scotch minister, who was a Teetotaler, once visited a man who was addicted to habits of intemperance, and began to denounce strong drink as the enemy of the human race. "Stop, sir," said the other, "are we not told to love our enemies, and am I not right therefore in the course I take?" For a moment or two this was a poser for the good minister; but he soon rejoined, "Aye, John, we are commanded to love our enemies, but tell me, John, in what part of the Scriptures are we ordered to swallow them?" During the day the boys belonging to the school of Mr. W. Doyle, New-street, Bishopsgate-street, took the pledge from the very rev. gentleman, who seemed greatly pleased with their demeanour and appearance. Towards the conclusion of the proceedings Mr. Teare (of Preston), summed up as it were the business of the week, and stated that more than 20,000 persons had taken the pledge since the commencement of Father Mathew's labours in that cemetery. About half-past nine the very rev. gentleman retired from the ground, after having announced that he would be on Kennington Common the next day.

The following address was presented on Sunday from the pupils under the superintendence of the Rev. J. Moore, Shadwell, Mr. Segrue, the master, and 160 of the boys, taking the pledge:—

"Rev. and Dear Father Mathew—We, the youth of Virginia-street, educated under the fostering hand of our beloved pastor, the Rev. John Moore, beg leave to address you with sentiments of filial love and undying attachment, and hail your arrival amongst us with sincere delight.

"We gladly avail ourselves of the present opportunity to congratulate you on the splendid and almost miraculous success which has hitherto attended your career of benevolence throughout the land, and the untiring zeal which you have evinced in the discharge of your heaven-born mission—viewing with unmingled delight the efforts which our parents, brothers, and sisters are making under your sacred guidance to sustain the spotless banner of Temperance.

"We, the children of Erin's exiled sons in a stranger land, deem it a duty to copy their bright example; and, though distant from our father land, we no less ardently and respectfully request, reverend dear father, to be enrolled as members of the Total Abstinence society, thereby linking us in the hallowed chain which binds our little brethren in the faith in the island of Saints.

"In conclusion, reverend dear father, we beseech our eternal Father in Heaven to crown all your exertions with success, and to hear the prayers which one hundred and sixty young hearts, in unison with millions of others, daily pour forth for your present and future happiness. "RICHARD HARDING."

Early on last Monday morning, the members of several Teetotal societies assembled in the vicinity of Hart's Temperance Hotel, Aldersgate-street, in order to escort their great and revered leader to Kennington-common. In front of the above-named hotel a capacious carriage, with six greys and three postillions, made its appearance about ten o'clock, and soon attracted a very large crowd, which enthusiastically cheered Father Mathew whenever he approached the drawing-room windows. Before he started, an American gentleman of great respectability took the pledge (previous to his departure for the Continent), in order, as he stated, to show a better example to his sons at home. Several ladies, too, took the pledge from Father Mathew in the drawing-room. The procession, accompanied by bands, having formed, the very rev. gentleman made his appearance at the door of the hotel, amidst repeated bursts of applause, and after some little delay, occasioned by the eager curiosity of the crowd to see him and shake hands with him, entered the carriage. He was accompanied by the Rev. John Moore, the Rev. Mr. Cotter, the Rev. Mr. Jauch, J. S. Buckingham, Esq., Mr. Tear, and Mr. Hart. Next came the carriage of Dr. Oxley, and other vehicles containing Mrs. Buckingham, Mr. Buckingham, jun., &c. &c. The procession then proceeded with very little interruption, through, Aldersgate-street, St. Martin's-le-grand, Skinners-street, Farringdon-street, and over Blackfriars-bridge into the London-road, whence it advanced to the Belgian Chapel, in front of which Father Mathew's carriage stopped for the purpose of taking up the Rev. Mr. Doyle, the head chaplain. About this time, and near the chapel, a gentleman (afterwards ascertained to be the son of a distiller, named Orme, of the Blackfriars-road), accompanied by a servant in livery, approached the procession at rather a rapid pace, and was asked by some persons, "in the name of God, not to drive over the people." He persisted, however, in getting forward, and attempted to pass under a banner, between the two men who carried it. This was resisted, and very fortunately too, for had he succeeded in his attempt, there must have ensued numerous accidents, probably loss of life, for the horse was a very spirited animal, and the procession in advance of the banner was crowded. Mr. Orme, or his servant, began striking about with a whip, and the result was that several individuals, about a dozen in number, inflicted personal chastisement upon him on the spot. One man, a mere casual spectator, and who was not a Teetotaler, having had his hat knocked off his head, stooped to pick it up, and at that moment received a stroke to a whip across his head. Exasperated at this uncalculated treatment, he sprang upon the back of Mr. Orme's chaise, and forcibly pulled that individual to the ground. The police came up at this juncture and took into custody the man who had pulled Mr. Orme down. The breeching and harness of the gig were rendered nearly useless during the mêlée, and the gig itself was damaged. This will probably be a lesson for any distiller, or distiller's son, who may wantonly take it into his head to drive a spirited horse through a dense procession, accompanied by thousands of respectable and orderly spectators. An unprecedented number of vehicles of all descriptions were drawn up in front of the Elephant and Castle just at the time the procession passed; but only a few good humoured jokes escaped the lips of some of the drivers, no attempt to disturb the procession having been made. It was remarked that as Father Mathew's carriage passed the various bakers' shops in the route, the inmates heartily cheered him, and that no small curiosity to see him was exhibited in the public-houses on his way. The procession which, after being joined by the Stamford-street and the St. Patrick's auxiliaries, was about a mile in length, then advanced up High-street, Newington, to the Common, where thousands of people had already assembled, and where the utmost enthusiasm was manifested as soon as the carriage and six entered the grounds, and drew up in front of the platform. On and near the platform, banners, with the following inscriptions, were displayed:—"Walworth and Camberwell Total Abstinence Society for the Prevention of Intemperance. Come with us, and we will do thee good"—"Farringdon Branch of the Total Abstinence Association; J. S. Buckingham, Esq., President"—"Metropolitan Total Abstinence Association"—"National United Temperance Association, established Jan. 20, 1840"—"Southwark Total Abstinence Association, established 1840"—"Walworth and Camberwell Female Total Abstinence Association. In front of the Common, the beautiful white satin of the St. Boniface Society, bearing the inscription "Virtue," designated the place where the Temperance cards and medals were to be had. This banner, during the procession, was affixed to the rear of Father Mathew's carriage. A considerable number of the P and S divisions of police were present.

After a brief address from Mr. TEARE, urging all who were already Teetotallers to make room for those who wished to take the pledge.

The Rev. Mr. DOYLE, of the Belgian Chapel, advanced in front of the platform, and after some introductory remarks of a complimentary nature, read the following address:—

"THE ADDRESS OF THE SOUTH LONDON CATHOLIC TEMPERANCE SOCIETY TO THE VERY REVEREND THEOBALD MATHEW.

"VERY REVEREND SIR.—The members of the South London Catholic Temperance Society welcome the arrival of Father Mathew on this side of the Thames with every expression of affection and personal attachment. They regard him as their friend—and as the friend of mankind, without any exception of creed or country. In him they recognize one of the greatest benefactors to the human race that the world has witnessed; and briefly, yet earnestly, express their hopes, and indeed confident expectation, that his coming amongst them will prove a source of much and lasting good. In conclusion, they pray every blessing on his great untiring and benevolent exertions, and on himself.

"THOMAS DOYLE.

"President of the South London Catholic Temperance Society of St. George the Martyr, St. George's Fields."

Father MATHEW expressed his grateful thanks to his rev. friend and confères; and, in the course of his reply, observed, that the only alloy to the delight he felt in giving the pledge, was the reflection that some persons might be losers by the movement; other channels, however, for the employ of capital were open, and he trusted that their future efforts, in another line of business, would be successful. He was glad to find that the mighty engine, the press, which might be said to direct public opinion, had approved of his labours. He was overjoyed also to see upon the platform, there and elsewhere, persons of all religious creeds and all political convictions. (Hear, hear, hear.) He sincerely trusted that charity and fraternal love would be the results of the Total Abstinence meetings. (Cheers.)

J. S. BUCKINGHAM, Esq., next addressed the assembly. He had been, he said, a Total Abstainer during fourteen years, and he would positively assert that all intoxicating drinks, were not only useless, but injurious. He had been recently travelling in Ireland during three months, and he had only seen three persons drunk there during the whole time. Recollecting, as he did, the time when Intemperance stalked through the land, he could only attribute the change to an Almighty Providence. There were, unfortunately, some people who objected to the present Total Abstinence movement, because it was headed by a Catholic priest. Now, he (Mr. B.) was an Englishman and a Protestant, and he would be delighted to shake hands with any Catholic gentleman in the cause of Total Abstinence. Mr. Buckingham, after further remarks, which did not reach us, sat down loudly cheered.—Tables.

THE LARGEST BELL EVER CAST IN ENGLAND.

This immense bell has just been shipped for Montreal, it being intended for the new Catholic Cathedral, where it is to be placed in a tower by itself, and to be used as a "bourdon," or alarm-bell. It is to be named "Maria," the cathedral being dedicated to the virgin.

It is the most extraordinary work of the kind ever executed in England, and was cast at the foundry of Messrs. Mears and Company, of White chapel. Some idea may be formed of the vast size of this bell, from its having required ten tons of fused metal to form the cast; and the time occupied in running the fused metal from the furnace into the mould was fifteen minutes. The diameter of the bell at the mouth is 7 feet 5 inches; its height is 7 feet; and its thickness at the sound bow is 6½ inches. Its weight is 7 tons 11 cwt. 2 qrs. 4 lbs.; its sound is very powerful and melodious. The weight of the clapper is upwards of 3 cwt. The bell will be rung by means of two wheels, one on each side of the stock or bearer, which with its iron-work and fittings, weighs about 2 tons 10 cwt. There will be four ropes used in the ringing, a man pulling at each side of the wheels. The bell itself is heavier than the great Tom of Lincoln by 32 cwt.; it bears some bas-reliefs of the cardinal virtues, which are finely cast. On one side is the following legend; "Negotiamini dum venio omnis spiritus laudet Dominum. Anno Domini, 1843. Fundatæ Marianapolis, 2018 Greg. P. P. 16. Pontificatus, 128. Regin. Victorie Britanniarum 63." On the other side is inscribed, "Expissimo Mercatorum, Artificum, Agricolarumque, Marianapolitansium Dono;" intimating that it has been paid for from a fund subscribed by the merchants, artificers, and agriculturists of Montreal. Its cost, including that of the works, is upward of £1200. On the rim is the maker's name, "Thomas Mears, Fecit, Londini, 1843."

There has also been a peal of ten bells already sent out, to be placed in the sister-tower of the cathedral at Montreal, a gothic structure, recently erected at the cost of £80,000. The shipment of the huge bell on board the Lady Seaton, bound for Montreal, and lying in the Brandy-quay, London Docks, was a labour of great difficulty; and a part of the deck of the vessel was of necessity, cut away to admit the bell into the hold of the vessel—Illustrated London News, Aug. 19.

This accusation of the Bishop of London's is but an old discovery of Mosheim's; yet Mosheim acknowledges that the ancient fathers faithfully represented the doctrines of the Gnostics, as well as the pagan historians of that day. Plotinus and St. Irenæus are agreed, he admits, upon this point. If, then, the ancient fathers faithfully represented their doctrines for the purpose of refuting them, and not only refuted them, but expelled their authors from the Church when they refused to renounce them, is it likely that they adopted them? or, what more do we require to establish the fact that there was no community of belief or feeling between them? What Mosheim failed to do, Dr. Bloomfield will not succeed in accomplishing; and neither one nor the other can identify one single opinion, much less a dogma, introduced into the Christian Church by this wild and extravagant development of the superstitious philosophy of the ancient heathens.

Each successive heresy, so far from making inroads into her doctrine, only compelled the Church to put forth her attributes with fresh energy, and to vindicate her own against the fictitious tenets of innovators and impostors, by a stricter definition of the sacred and imperishable truths entrusted to her keeping; and thus it is that they can be traced in a pure, continuous track, through the mists of error which have in vain endeavoured to obscure it.

Gnosticism; indeed, had but a short reign; it was too absurdly fanciful, and too extravagantly impious, to endure long in the face of the pure and bright truths of Christianity; and, by the middle of the third century, it resolved itself into a more modified, and, at least, a less ostensibly offensive form amongst the disciples of Manes. This superstition, also, was of eastern origin, and too unhappily resembled its predecessor in the romantic folly of its poetic imaginings, and in the very faint glimmerings of Christianity with which it was rather deformed than embellished. So far, in reality, did the doctrines of this new sect fall short of Christianity, that they also maintained a most ridiculous system of the transmigration of souls; paid Divine honours only to the Christ reigning in the sun and moon, and worshipped without temples, altars, or sacrifices.

On the other hand, is it neither matter of authentic history, or even of idle report, that any one of the Gnostic follies or superstitions was ever incorporated with the doctrines of Christianity? and we venture to ask with confidence for the proof that the Church of the fourth or fifth century was, in any shape whatever, infected with the remains of Gnostic superstition, or any other heresy. But while we defy the right reverend prelate to make good either one assertion or the other, "that it (the Church) was also infected with the inventions of enthusiastic and ambitious men," we must also beg leave to put a question to him, and to ask why it is that he deprecates "the attempt to remodel (the Church of England) upon the doctrine and discipline, not of the primitive Church, but of the Church of the fourth or fifth century?" Now, we are far from pretending to divine what may be passing in the mind of the right reverend prelate, but we cannot, in the honesty of our heart, conceal from him what is passing in our own. We suspect—we acknowledge it to be only a suspicion—that the right reverend prelate judges it more convenient to carry the question in debate, from a period in which the mass of evidence is crowded, positive, unequivocal, incontrovertible, and overwhelming, to one in which the lamp of faith is less discernible, emitting but fewer rays, and burning, not, in reality, with less vigour, or with less brightness, but with less of vivid distinctness through the more lengthened distance.

It brings him nearer—may he not argue thus?—to his own rule; to a period in which little else was written but the Scriptures, or, at least, little that has come down to us. May it not give the right reverend prelate an excuse for saying, "We have no other evidence but the plain and most certain warrant of holy Scripture;" we will search that, and decide for ourselves. But let us remind him that this was also the very argument of many of the Gnostics,—of all, indeed, who pretended to any connexion with Christianity. They had, for ever in their mouths those words of our Saviour, "Seek and you shall find." An appeal to the Church was answered by an appeal to the Scriptures; for they held that the Church had been already overlaid with errors and corruptions, even as early as the second century; indeed, many of them accused the apostles, nay Christ himself, of accommodating his doctrine to the prevailing prejudices and necessities of the times,—they alone were gifted with a plain and rightly-informed understanding for the investigation and discovery of spiritual truths, and for evidence of these truths, they confidently appealed to the Scriptures; continually complaining of the injustice done them by the Church, in driving them from her communion; for their design was to associate, if possible, their pestilent errors with the pure doctrines of Christianity. But in this they most signally failed, and the Catholic Church was no more infected with Gnosticism during the fourth or fifth centuries, than it is now with Puritanism or Quakerism*.

We have but one word more to say to the right reverend prelate,—to repeat our recommendation to him to study his history as well as his theology, before he again steps forward as a volunteer in the crusade against Catholicity,

"To be too busy is some danger;"

His discretion might have tutored him better, than to have sent him pell-mell into a fight, for which he seems to have been so little prepared. One solitary specimen will suffice of the right reverend prelate's profound knowledge, even of English ecclesiastical history; "It was a system of corruption and tyranny, which drove her (the Church of England) from communion with Rome." It was indeed the work of corruption and of tyranny,—of corruption amongst the nobles, and tyranny in the monarch,—a slavish subserviency amongst the governed, and an iron despotism on the part of the governor. But this is not exactly as the right reverend prelate means to apply his observation—Corruption of doctrine in the Church of Christ, the Catholic Church, and tyranny in her discipline. This is his assertion; but where has the commentator upon Æschylus studied his history of the reformation? Has he never heard of that singular fact that for eighteen years after the cessation of all

* St. Hippolytus, who flourished early in the third century, gives us the following relation of the expulsion of Novatus from the Church, which may be taken as a specimen of the method adopted upon such occasions.

Hearing that Novatus was disseminating his pernicious doctrines, the clergy required his attendance, and examined him in presence of the authorities of the Church. He disavowed the errors which were imputed to him, but soon attempted to propagate them by stealth. Finding others of the same opinion as himself, he openly broached his heresy. He was then summoned a second time before the authorities of the Church: but now, instead of the feigned humility with which he had submitted to their remonstrances upon the former occasion, he exhibited his true character, comported himself with an obstinate haughtiness, and asked what harm he was doing. Finding their efforts to reclaim him ineffectual, they expelled him from the communion of the faithful.—See Ceillier, vol. ii. p. 342, &c.

See the history of these sects at large in the writings of St. Irenæus, Tertullian, and others, as analyzed by Ceillier; also a shorter account of them in Dollinger's History of the Church. London, 1840. Consult also Berrier's Diet de Theologie, and the various biographical notices of ancient heresiarchs.

communion with Rome, not one of the tenets of the Anglican Church was altered? On the contrary, were not the most severe, nay barbarous enactments passed to maintain them? It was a pure art of schism, and nothing more; and, as a consequence, the transfer of the papacy from Rome to Westminster. And as long as he lived, this new head of the Church was even a fiercer persecutor of the doctrines of bishop Bloomfield, than bishop Bloomfield is now of his; for the king, with the aid of Cranmer, burnt his heretics alive, and even forced one of his bishops, who had been himself condemned to death, but had saved himself by recantation, to preach an orthodox sermon to his victims at the stake.

Is all this new to the right reverend prelate? and is it not an acknowledged historical fact, that it was the brightness of Boleyn's eyes, and not the corruptions or tyranny of Rome, which drove England from communion with her? Even for the first five years of Edward's reign, no doctrinal reformation took place,—for Cranmer's first liturgy only touched the rubrics and ceremonies. It was a form of prayer and administration of the sacraments, declared by him agreeable to the most sincere and pure Christian religion taught by the Scriptures, and the usages of the primitive Church; and it was not till his second illumination (having also been directed in the first, as he expressed it, and as we have already observed by the aid of the Holy Ghost), that he discovered the errors of his former doctrines, and was now instructed to promulgate others in direct opposition to them; though he still declared those same former doctrines to be a very godly order, set forth by authority, agreeable to the word of God and the primitive Church! Yes, this was the theologian who, after a term of eighteen years of simple schism, first invaded the doctrines of Rome, and who is so eulogized by the right reverend prelate for so doing. Much, however, as Protestantism is indebted to Cranmer, we must own we never could exactly discern his right to the admiration which we are expected to entertain towards him. We never could hold in reverence a man who, at his consecration, made a secret protest against the public oath which he was about to take; who degraded the episcopal character by declaring that a prince might make a priest as well as a bishop, for that neither priest nor bishop needed consecration; who lowered the episcopal office to that of a mere officer of state, holding it only at the will and pleasure of the sovereign; who, though he had bound himself by the most sacred and solemn engagement to observe a life of celibacy, was privately married to a niece of Oslander, whom he secretly introduced into this country, and smuggled about from one palace to another; who was ever guilty of the most accommodating tergiversations under the fearful frown of Henry, in matters of opinion; while, in matters of fact, he carried his subserviency so far as to divorce that scrupulous and exemplary monarch from no less than three wives,—in one case, deliberately playing off a studied and hypocritical drama, under a wretched attempt to save appearances, by deceiving the world with a feigned course of decency and order; in another, solemnly confirming, and soon afterwards as solemnly annulling, his own decision; and in the third, exhibiting a most edifying display of the basest obsequiousness to the will of him with the gratification of whose pleasure his own interests were now so completely identified; who, ever swimming with the stream when he could not stem it, and—upon this principle it is presumed—thinking it right and lawful to execute Catholics and burn Protestants under one master, and Protestants of another shade under a second, for not trimming their religious opinions by his; while at last he came most unhappily to the same fate himself as a traitor and a heretic, still, however, recanting all his heterodox opinions in favour of his original Catholic tenets, in compliance with his old habits, and in hopes of escaping the punishment he had so cruelly inflicted upon others, but recanting his recantation when he found his accustomed duplicity no longer available to his purpose†

Is this the man who deserves the honours of a martyr, or a temple to be erected to his fame? or does he merit to be lauded at the expense of Hildebrand and Becker, whom the right reverend prelate is pleased to style the "authors and abettors of evil, the firebrands of discord, and the subverters of civil government!" We cannot but think the right reverend prelate might still read history to some advantage, and display a sounder judgment both in his praises and his censures†.

* In 1538, Cranmer summoned Lambert into his archiepiscopal court for broaching errors against the real presence; when his prisoner appealed to the king, as supreme head of the Church, Cranmer, in the presence of the royal pontiff, disputed with the heretic in favour of transubstantiation (being then embodied in one of the six articles), but failing in his powers of persuasion, abandoned his unfortunate victim to the sentence pronounced upon him by Cromwell, as vicar-general to the supreme head—that he should die at the stake! Two years afterwards, Cranmer argued, both in the house and in convocation, against this same doctrine, but had the discretion at last to owe himself confounded by the "goodlie learning" of the king; (see Burnet, vol. i. p. 270, and Lingard, pp. 277 and 287, vol. iv. 4to. ed.) while in 1549, he put forth "a form of prayer and administration of the sacraments," which telling neither one thing nor the other, as to the manner of the presence, may be presumed to have been intended for the foreign reformed tenet of consubstantiation, which both Burnet and Strype conceive him to have held, even when he conspired to the death of Lambert, for professing opinions towards which he himself was verging at the time, and which he openly avowed in 1552; when all corporeal presence of Christ in the Eucharist was absolutely renounced. In 1562, this portion of the article was omitted, and a purely "heavenly and spiritual" presence, depending upon the faith of the recipient, declared to be the orthodox definition of this mysterious doctrine. Each alteration, be it remembered, was announced by competent authority, and for the express and avowed purpose of "avoiding diversities of opinions." (See the 29th of the Forty-two Articles of 1552, and the 28th of the Thirty-nine of 1562.)

† The reader will recollect that Cranmer, after dissolving the marriage between Henry and Catherine, "officially declared (after the farce of a solemn investigation at Lambeth) that Henry and Anne (Boleyn) were, and had been joined in lawful matrimony: that their marriage was, and had been public and manifest; and that he moreover confirms it by his judicial and pastoral authority," yet—two days after the condemnation of the Queen (Anne Boleyn) by the Peers, Cranmer, "having previously invoked the name of Christ, and having God alone before his eyes, pronounced definitely that the marriage formerly contracted, solemnized, and consummated between Henry and Anne Boleyn was, and always had been null and void." Henry dressed himself in white on the day of her execution, and was married to Jane Seymour the following morning: (Jane died in childbirth.) But Cranmer's ingenuity in discovering the means of gratifying the unruly

With the frequent warnings of the bishop to his weaker brethren, against being seduced by the attractive guise of Catholicity, we have nothing particular to do. Those to whom they are addressed will, we trust, know how to appreciate them, and not be so easily deterred from prosecuting their inquiries after truth. Truth and unity;—these are the essential attributes of Christianity; and till they have attained to these, they should never rest. The great St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, speaking of his feelings before his conversion—before his heart had been fully enlightened to the whole truth of Christianity, thus beautifully expresses himself "While in virtue I saw a beloved peace; in vice I beheld a hateful discord. In the one, I observed unity; in the other, division. And in this unity I placed the seat of reason, the essence of truth, and the sovereign good; in division and discord sat the spirit of every ill." He proceeds to consider the dangers which beset an ill-directed mind, and a perverse spirit,—learning without wisdom, and knowledge without docility,—and he thus accounts for the unprofitable acquirements of those whose pride and presumption cast a maze over their eyes. "They speak most learnedly," he observes, "on the creation, but they seek not with sincerity the truths of the Creator; and for this reason they find them not. Or if they find them they soon lose them again in the variety of their own conceits, and with blind perversity charge their own falsehoods upon the God of truth†."

God grant that they who are seeking for the light, and perhaps approaching it little by little, may profit by these wise sentiments of one who was once precisely in their condition‡ —Dublin Review, February, 1843.

AMERICA.

PUSEYISM IN NEW YORK.—Mr. Arthur Carey, a candidate for ordination in the Protestant Episcopal Church, having been suspected of holding doctrines which exceeded the orthodox latitude, his clergyman, the Rev. Hugh Smith, D. D., Rector of St. Peter's Church, Chelsea, refused to give him the certificate required; whereupon the Bishop (Ondonk) instituted a special commission for the purpose of examining Mr. Carey, and ascertaining his opinions. The commission was constituted of the Bishop, Drs. Berrian, M'Vickar, Seabury, Anthon, and Smith; Rev. Messrs. Haight, Higbee, and Price; and also Mr. Carey, of course. The examination having been concluded, Drs. Smith and Anthon alone desires of an unrelenting and tyrannical master, who, as Heylin too truly affirms, "never spared woman in his lust, nor man in his anger," (Lingard) was still to be favoured with another opportunity of displaying itself in these same delicate emergencies. Ann of Cleves was lawfully married to Henry, but, not happening to suit the monarch's taste, the Convocation, headed by Cranmer, and taking up the chord from him, quickly and graciously pronounced this marriage also as null and void, as either of the two from which they had already relieved him! Upon which Burnet most magnanimously observes, "and here this matter ended, to the great reproach of that body that went so hastily and so unanimously into that scandalous decision."—p. 217, vol. v.

expressed themselves unfavourable to Mr. Carey's ordination. Two days afterwards, at the ordination, the Bishop having concluded to ordain the candidate, a scene took place of which the following is an outline:—At an early stage of the ceremonies, Drs. Smith and Anthon rose, one after the other, and read each a written protest against the ordination of Mr. Carey. The Bishop, nevertheless, proceeded; when the rev. doctors shook the dust from their feet against the whole proceeding by rising and leaving the church together, amid the wonderment, and we doubt not, to the very great scandal, of the congregation. The following Saturday (July 8) the Churchman of this city contained a leader of beyond three columns, written with the well-known power of the editor (Dr. Seabury), and marked by all that intense suppressed bitterness in which he excels. The rev. doctors caught up the cartel of battle flung down by their reverend "brother" of the Churchman, and in a card the same evening announced their "reluctant" determination to come out with a "full disclosure," in a pamphlet of forty-six pages octavo.

We now come to the account of the examination, furnished jointly by Drs. Smith and Anthon. Throughout they bore the principal part, and, to do them justice, they questioned and cross-questioned Mr. Carey with an ingenuity and perseverance which would be invaluable to a court of sessions lawyer. Our worthy contemporary, Dr. Seabury, appears to have acted as counsel for the pris—we mean the candidate—and he too displayed a scientific adroitness in guiding his client, and baffling the reverend cross examiners, hardly to be expected in any one but a veteran practitioner at the bar. After some preliminary sparring between the two doctors, and their six "brethren," as to the propriety of taking down in writing the questions and answers, the examination commenced by Dr. Anthon's asking the following question of Mr. Carey:—

Q. 1. Supposing entrance into the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country were not open to you, would you, or would you not, have recourse, in such case, to the ministry of the Church of Rome?

To this searching and well-considered question Drs. M'Vicker and Seabury, and Mr. Haught, immediately objected, and with some show of reason, as "hypothetical in its character;" and Dr. Seabury, in his capacity of counsel for the defence, advised Mr. Carey not to answer. Mr. Carey, however, expressed his willingness to answer, and did so in the following words:—

A. Possibly I might, after due deliberation, but think that I should more likely remain in our own communion, as I have no special leaning towards the joining of theirs at present?

Dr. Smith proposed the second question:—

Q. 2. Do you hold to and receive the decrees of the Council of Trent?

A. I do not deny them; I would not positively affirm them. (p. 18.)

The examination then proceeded as follows; that is, so far as the bare questions and answers are concerned, for our space will not permit us to record all and singular the interruptions—adjurations from Dr. Smith, and objections from Dr. Seabury—which in the pamphlet form a strange sort of by-play to the main plot.

Q. 3. Do you, or do you not deem the differences between the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Church of Rome to be such as embrace points of faith?

To this Mr. Carey was understood to reply, If these differences be understood to be matters of doctrine they would embrace points of faith, but if, as is believed, they are matters of opinion, they would not.

Q. 4. Do you, or do you not, believe the doctrine of transubstantiation to be repugnant to Scripture, subversive of the nature of a sacrament, and giving occasion to superstition? If you do not, how can you ex animo subscribe the twenty-eighth article of our Standards?

A. I would answer, in general language, that I do not hold that doctrine of transubstantiation which I suppose our Article condemns, but that, at the same time, I conceive myself at liberty to confess ignorance on the mode of the Presence.

Q. 5. Do you, or do you not, regard the denial of the cup to the laity an unwarrantable change in a sacrament of Christ's own institution, or as to be regarded as a mere matter of discipline?

A. (taken down by Dr. Smith)—I consider it an unwarrantable act of discipline; Mr. Carey subsequently preferring to substitute the word severe instead of unwarrantable.

Q. 6. On which Church do you believe the sin of schism rests in consequence of the English Reformation?—the Church of England, and, by consequence, the Protestant Episcopal Church of this country, or upon the Church of Rome?

Dr. Seabury objected to this question being put on the ground that it was an historical question, Mr. Carey, under advisement, answered, "It is an historical question."

Dr. Smith here appealed to the Bishop against this evasion of the question, and the Bishop having decided that the question ought to be answered, Mr. Carey, in substance, replied that in some respects schism rests on both sides. He considered both churches in communion with the Church of Christ.

Q. 7. Is the Romish doctrine of Purgatory in any respects maintained by our standards?

"Here," says the pamphlet, "the bishop asked Dr. Anthon what view he entertained on the doctrine of Purgatory as held by the Church of Rome; to which Dr. Anthon replied, 'that, with due respect to the chair, he was not under examination.'" (p. 20). We are forced to admire the doctor's presence of mind in prudently declining to answer on so knotty a "point."

The question being again addressed to Mr. Carey, he answered:—

A. I consider our standards as condemning the doctrine popularly held to be the Roman doctrine.

Q. 8. Is there any countenance given in the doctrinal standards of our Church for the idea that the departed can be benefited by the prayers of the faithful, or by the administration of the Holy Communion? And is not that idea condemned by Article 31 of our Church?

As far as Mr. Carey's answer could be ascertained it was to this effect:—"That he supposed that idea was not condemned in that Article; his opinion being, that the language of the Article was popular language, pointed at a popular opinion which was held against the Church of Rome."

Q. 9. Do you, or do you not, fault the Church of Rome in pronouncing, as she does, the Books Apocryphal Holy Scripture?

A. I do not, either to myself or any one else, attempt to prove a doctrine out of the Apocrypha. The Holy Spirit may have spoken by the Apocrypha, and the Homily asserts the same thing. I would not fault the Church of Rome for reading the Apocrypha for proof of doctrine.

Q. 10. By Dr. Smith. Can there be a doubt that, in separating from the Church of Rome, the Church of England embraced more pure and scriptural views of doctrine? And is not the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country, at present, more pure in doctrine than the Church of Rome?

A. There can be a doubt, on the ground that the Church of England retained doctrinal errors, viz., the doctrines of Puritanism. In some points, the Roman missal was preferable to our liturgy.

Q. 11. What construction do you put upon the promise of conformity to the doctrines, discipline, and worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church?

A. He did not consider (as we understood Mr. Carey to say) the articles as binding our consciences in points of faith, and read a passage from "White's Memoirs of the Church" (Convention of 1801), which he considered as maintaining the same opinion.

He does not feel himself obliged to give his ex animo assent to the thirty-nine Articles, as the assent is given in the English Church.

Previous to our putting to Mr. Carey our twelfth question, the following questions were put by us to him:—

Q. Can you subscribe to the 22nd Article.*

A. I could subscribe to it considering it as referring to the popular doctrine of the Romish Church.

Touching the doctrine of the invocation of saints, mentioned in this article, the question was asked by Dr. Smith "whether that doctrine had any warrant in Scripture." He replied that it had not. The question was further put by Dr. S., "whether it were right to introduce or observe the practice without any warranty from Scripture;" to which it was replied, "that it was not forbidden." The examination was farther prosecuted by the bishop, when the candidate, in reply to a question touching the lawfulness of the practice, was understood to say that "he did not fault the Church of Rome, provided the invocation was confined to the 'ora pro nobis,' or intercessory form."

Q. 2. How do you understand the last clause of the 19th article, viz., "As the Church of Jerusalem, &c., have erred, so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith?" The answer was substantially this:—"I understand the article in an historical sense—as referring to the past, and not to the present state of the Church of Rome." The last section of the article he considered "as directed against the abiding infallibility of the Church of Rome, as a particular branch of the Church universal." The question was then pressed in another form, viz.: "Do you consider the Church of Rome now to be in error in matters of faith?"

A. It is a difficult question, which I do not know how to answer; but I refer to my answer on the other question, touching my opinion of the decrees of the Council of Trent.

* Art. 22, concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping, and Adoration, &c.

Q. 3. Do you, or do you not, receive the articles of the Creed of Pius IV.

A. So far as they are the repetitions of the decrees of the Council of Trent, I receive them. (p. 23.)

From this examination they sum up Mr. Carey's belief as follows:—

"He deemed the difference between us and Rome such as embraced no points of faith—doubted whether the Church of Rome or the Anglican Church were the more pure—considered the Reformation from Rome unjustifiable, and followed by grievous and lamentable results, though not without others of an opposite character—faulted not the Church of Rome for reading the Apocrypha for proof of doctrine—did not consider that we were bound to receive the Thirty-nine Articles of our Church in any close and rigid construction of the same—declared that he knew not how to answer the question, which had been repeatedly asked, 'Whether he considered the Church of Rome to be now in error in matters of faith?'—was not prepared to pronounce the doctrine of transubstantiation an absurd or impossible doctrine; and regarded it, as taught within the last hundred years, as possibly meaning no more than we mean by the doctrine of the real Presence—did not object to the Romish doctrine of Purgatory, as defined by the Council of Trent. Thus far for the NEGATIVES; now for the AFFIRMATIVES. He believed that the state of the soul, after death, was one in which it could be benefited by the prayers of the faithful and the sacrifice of the altar—regarded the denial of the cup to the laity as a severe act of discipline only—justified the invocation of saints—in one instance declared that he did not deny, but would not positively affirm, the decrees of the Council of Trent; in another, that he received the articles of the Creed of Pius IV., so far as they were repetitions of the decrees of that council!" (p. 27.)

The examination having closed and the candidate having withdrawn, the bishop proceeded to ask the opinions of the "Presbyters." Six of them, viz., Drs. Berrian, Mr. Vicar, and Seabury, and Messrs. Haight, Higbee, and Price, expressed their satisfaction with Mr. Carey's answering; Dr. Seabury clenching his opinion with the decided remark, that "he should esteem it a privilege to present the candidate for orders, as he had sustained the ordeal most nobly;" and Mr. Price also observing that "though generally opposed to presenting the graduating class for orders, yet he now felt free to express his willingness to present Mr. Carey." On the other hand, Drs. Smith and Anthon expressed the strongest dissatisfaction both with the manner in which the examination had been conducted, and with Mr. Carey's answers.

One thing should not be passed over. Dr. Smith having asked Mr. Carey "how, with his present views, he could defend the Church, if attacked by the Romanists," he replied, "that he supposed he would, in that case, dwell upon the less pure parts of Rome, in contrast with the more pure points of our Church." (p. 31.) This is certainly an ingenious confession of a most disingenuous intention, though perfectly characteristic of the mode in which too many Protestant controversialists attempt to sustain themselves in their assaults upon the Catholic Church.

We need hardly say that our statement of facts, as far as it purports to come from the pamphlet, is necessarily one-sided. Except in the columns of the Churchman we have not had any authorized statements from the other side, and the following card from that paper of last Saturday makes us fear that we are to continue so:—

“TO THE CHURCH.

“The undersigned members of the examining committee in the recent case of Mr. Arthur Carey, candidate for orders, in conjunction with the Rev. Drs. Smith and Anthon, feel themselves called upon by the published statement of the two latter gentlemen, thus far to reply:—

“First—In justice to themselves, to decline definitively any defence of any act on their part of purely canonical discretion.

“Secondly—In justice to Mr. Carey, solemnly to declare that the answers of the candidate, as given in the above pamphlet, do not convey the full and fair impression produced on their minds by his examination; and that, in their judgment, such statement is calculated to mislead the public mind, and to do injustice to all parties concerned in his examination and subsequent ordination.

“With this summary notice of the statement above alluded to, the undersigned hold their own duty to the Church touching this matter to be fully and finally absolved.

“WILLIAM BERRIAN, JOHN M'VICAR,
SAMUEL SRABURY, JOSEPH H. PRICE,
EDWARD Y. HIGBEE BENJAMIN I. HAIGHT.
“New York, July 19, 1843.”

One of the gentlemen whose names are signed above, seems to have thought, with us, that that portion of the community most particularly interested will not like so summary a mode of getting rid of the subject, for we notice an advertisement in the morning papers of Wednesday, to the effect that “shortly will be published a Letter to a Parishioner relative to the ordination of Mr. Arthur Carey, by the Rev. Benjamin Haight, rector of All Saints' Church.”

It is hard for us to describe the excitement which this matter has caused in New York. It is still harder to account for it, unless by the meddling disposition of our community. A difference occurs between some Episcopalian clergymen; it gets into print, and incontinently the whole good-natured public becomes profoundly interested, and hasten with all the alacrity of schoolboys in a scuffle to take sides immediately; the newspapers catch the contagion and follow the example.

The Courier and Enquirer says:—“Puseyism [in America] is confined exclusively to three bishops and a few of the clergy. The laity as yet are to a man Protestants. * * The poison, as yet, is confined to bishops and priests. They, and they only, are to be benefited by a return to the bosom of the Church of Rome; and now, while the people are uncontaminated, and neither bishop nor priest has made a convert among them—now is the time to lop off this dangerous excrescence, and restore the Protestant Episcopal Church to its purity.”

We have intimated that we do not attach any great importance to this controversy, nor do we; certainly not that exaggerated kind which it has already assumed in the eyes of many both in and out of the Protestant Episcopal sect. The creed of that sect is far too elastic, far too yielding, far too loose and ill-defined for us to suppose that it will not be found capacious enough (at least for the present) to retain within it every partizan, as well he who verges upon stark-staring Calvinism as he who goes to the uttermost limits of Puseyism. Besides this, the Episcopal Church in the United States cannot afford to let the controversy gain head. It must be hushed up at all risks. In England, where Episcopalianism is the “monarch of all she surveys,” as well of the souls of men as “of the fowl and the brute”—that is, her tithes—where she has the strong arm of the law to uphold her against all opposition—her clergy can afford to quarrel among themselves about High Church and Low Church, Oxford and Evangelical Protestantism. Here it is far otherwise. The pressure from without compels her to be united—to make any compromise rather than suffer dissensions in her bosom. Therefore either the present dispute will be allowed to die out by mutual consent, or one party will give way. Which of these two alternatives will take place time alone can show. We incline to think the former.—From the New York Freeman's Journal of the 29th July.

MISCELLANEA.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

SANTA THOMAS, OF GUATEMALA.—The Belgian colony, which left Antwerp on the 19th March, reached St. Thomas on the 20th May. On the 22d, the Rev. Father Walle left thence for Guatemala, according to his instructions. Father Genon alone remained charged with the spiritual functions. Many Caribs and Indians attended mass, and presented their children for baptism, on the 7th and 9th of June; the other vessels which had the colonists and their property on board arrived. The chief engineer, M. Simon, had died on the voyage, but his favourite pupil and friend, M. Delwarde, immediately commenced the erection of the church. The colony was healthy, and it promised to be prosperous.

LONDON.

MR. EVERITT'S DIOCESE.—It is said that Mr. Marriott and Mr. Sewell, with other Tractarians are determined, if possible, to have the degree of Mr. Everett, the American ambassador, rescinded. They have been induced to do this from the opinion expressed by Mr. Hope, of the Chancery bar that the proceeding at the commemoration, as far as relates to Mr. Everett, was null and void. Mr. Hope was counsel for Mr. M'Mullen (Tractarian). v. Dr. Hampden, and is identified with the Puseyite party.

COCHIN CHINA.

M. Langlois (says the Univers of the 18th), superior of the congregation of foreign missions; has written to M. Miche, Curé de Fraize in the department of the Vosges, that five French missionaries among whom was his brother, have been delivered from the captivity in which the Cochin-Chinese authorities in the Empire of Annam had detained them. A simple demonstration on the part of a French corvette, Heroine, sufficed to accomplish their liberation. The missionaries were landed at Singapore, after having been snatched from a death which they believed to be inevitable, and restored to a liberty for which they had ceased to entertain a hope.—Tablet.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

Having submitted to the reader's notice, in our preceding number, the strong perspicuous testimony, borne by the Fathers of Chalcedon in the fifth century, to the Apostolic Supremacy of the Holy See, we shall now show, that, the very same principles, which the Eastern Church then professed in the celebrated Ecumenical Council just named, were also maintained and cherished with the same reverence, even in the remotest portion of the Western world. It is impossible to contemplate the unanimous testimonies, supplied by the ancient ecclesiastical histories of countries, far, very far removed from each other, on such a question as that now under consideration, and not feel it to be due to truth to acknowledge, that the doctrine sustained by such a cloud of witnesses, must be of Apostolic origin. With many this observation will have more effect, when we remind them, that Ireland, to whose Church annals we propose at present to refer, never was subjected to the imperial or civil power of Rome, but, on the contrary, always remained exempt from the political or temporal influence of the Roman Empire. Yet, although thus removed from that influence, it may be asserted with truth, that in the early records of no other Church are there contained more splendid evidences of the perpetual recognition of the Supremacy of the Chair of Peter, than are to be found in those of Ireland. To the preservation of "the Unity of spirit in the bond of peace" the early pastors of the Irish Church directed their most earnest solicitude. Taught by experience, they knew, that "after their departure, perverse men would arise" whose obstinate attachment to their own con-ceits would disturb the religious peace of their brethren. With becoming wisdom, they therefore resolved to remedy the evil, which they feared they could not wholly prevent, and in conformity to the usage of every other portion of the Catholic Church, they ordained, that all questions of importance should be referred to the Apostolic See. Cummian in his celebrated Paschal Epistle written in the seventh century, affirms, that this discipline had been established in a Synod by the early Pastors of the Irish Church. And in effect, among the Canons ascribed to St. Patrick, by the Protestant writers, Usher and Ware, there is one which ordains, that any controversies which might arise should be referred to the Apostolic See." In the sixth century, the illustrious Irish Abbot, St. Columbanus founded, first, the Monastery of Luxen in France, and afterwards that of Bobbio in Italy. In an appeal which that learned and holy Abbot made to the Roman Pontiff, he styles the Pope "The Most Illustrious Head of all the Churches of all Europe....." "Most exalted Prelate and Pastor."

Speaking of the Church of Ireland, the Saint thus glories in the orthodoxy of his fellow-countrymen. "For," says he, "among the Irish, there is no Jew, no heretic, no schismatic, but the Catholic faith, such as it was delivered by the predecessors of your Holiness, continues unshaken among them. For we are bound to the chair of Peter; it is that chair, which renders Rome, otherwise, indeed, great, eminent and illustrious with us. By the Apostles, Peter and Paul, you are become almost celestial, and Rome is the head of the universe and of all Churches."

VICAR APOSTOLIC OF MAURITIUS.

We learn that the Right Rev. Dr. Collier Bishop of Milevum and Vicar Apostolic of Mauritius, has taken his passage on board the Steamer Atalanta for Suez on the 1st instant. We copy the following account of his Lordship's departure from the Island of Mauritius from the Cerneen of the 29th September last:

THE BISHOP OF MILEVE.—On Monday last, at half past four P. M. the Bishop of Mileve, attended by the clergy, church wardens, and members of the Fabric, went on board the ship Mertoun, in which vessel he had taken his passage to Bombay, and shortly afterwards took leave of our shores. Every proof of the sympathy and respect so highly merited by the Bishop of Mileve was displayed on the occasion of his departure. For many days past, the dwelling of the venerable chief of the Roman Catholic Clergy was thronged with visitors of all ranks, classes, and ages, eager to convey to him the expression of their regret and remembrance, and to receive in exchange a promise of a speedy return. These moving testimonials of gratitude and affection were calculated to awaken in the Bishop of Mileve feelings of a most pleasurable nature, and the affecting address delivered by him, on Sunday, to his parishioners, when taking leave of them, was expressive of the most heartfelt regret and attachment.

VICAR APOSTOLIC OF CEYLON.

We borrow the following account of the return and reception of the Bishop of Usula and Vicar Apostolic of Ceylon, from the Colombo Observer, of the 16th October last.

Early yesterday evening the Wharf of Colombo was immensely crowded by people of all descriptions, at the sight of the vessel which brought to us in safety our venerated and much beloved Bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Antonio, from Pondicherry, whither His Lordship went for consecration.—His Lordship with the Rev. Messrs. Caitano and Casimir left Pondicherry, after receiving consecration, on the 26th ultimo and arrived in this port yesterday evening about 4 o'clock.

Soon after the vessel was anchored the ringing of the Chapel bells in the town began to give the joyful intelligence of the long looked for event of the return of the Bishop.—From the moment the sound of the bells was heard until after $\frac{1}{2}$ past 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, the streets were a scene of confusion and bustle—in every direction people, both male and female were seen either hastening to the Church of St. Lucia or running towards the beach—while some were busily engaged in hanging young coconut leaves along the sides of the streets and others hastening with flowers and leaves to decorate the fronts of their silent abodes in token of their participation in the general rejoicing.

It was indeed truly touching to behold the aged males, the widows and the fatherless, who have been the objects of our good Bishop's chief care, and whose tears of suffering have been many a time wiped off by the compassionate hand of his Lordship, while moving slowly along the streets in their daily dress, look back and ask every passer by "if the Bishop is come" and "if they could see him to-day."

While the streets, lanes and the neighbourhood of St. Lucia's were in this state of anxious expectation, the landing place in the Fort and the Wharf were thronged to suffocation—here too Arches were previously erected by the natives, one over the jetty and the other near the Master Attendant's Office. Similar arches were placed, beautifully decorated, near St. Antony's Church in Sea Street, at the turn to New Chetty Street down the marble rock at Cothanchina and in front of St. Lucia's Church—which last were joined together by a pandal of cloth.

The Rev. Messrs Dias, Noranha, Alberts, and Jose Pedro waited to meet the Bishop at the landing place till 5 o'clock, when His Lordship came on shore; and was received by his dear Clergy and the overjoyed people with an affection and veneration quite indescribable—and the Bishop also was observed expressing to his flock with his usual fatherly tenderness his gladness at seeing them all in good health.

His Lordship was no sooner come to land than white cloths were spread on the ground for him to walk upon and a canopy was held over him as far as the Master Attendant's Office, where a carriage was in readiness, and immediately he was seated in it the horse was removed and some of the most respectable of the Natives drew the carriage from thence to St. Antony's Church—a distance of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, amidst loud and deafening cheers and the firing of guns &c. and accompanied by the dense crowd. In this manner the procession moved, preceded by flag and Cross bearers, till it came to St. Antony's when the people who pulled the carriage were kindly asked by the Clergy to let the Bishop get into his palanquin, which they allowed him to do but reluctantly.—From there our good Bishop rode in his palanquin followed by his Clergy in their respective carriages, and palanquins to the main gate of St. Lucia's, where His Lordship was joyfully and very affectionately received by three Clergymen, the Rev. Messrs. Mendoza, Rozario and who waited there in their white stoles.—The Bishop came out of the Palanquin and entered the Church with great difficulty in consequence of the people who thronged him, some to kiss his garments and others to have a sight of him, and others again to shed tears of joy.—Every countenance was depicted with a hue of sprightliness and every breast filled with feelings of gratitude to the GREAT BISHOP of souls for the restoration to them of their beloved Bishop after a short but a very painful separation.—The Bishop and Clergy forced their way thro' the crowd with the assistance of the Church servants and kneeling in the platform before the High Altar sang the Te Deum—the Rev. Antony Franciscus conducting the Organ with great credit. The Te Deum being over the Bishop took his seat on the hitherto mourning but now smiling Episcopal chair, and the Rev. Caitano Rozario approaching the High Altar read the beautiful prayer "Omnipotens sempiterna Deus" from the Missal, at the conclusion of which the Bishop repaired to the High Altar in full robes and after reading the prayer "Exaudi nos" gave his Apostolical Benediction.—This being done, the Bishop returned to His Chair where both the Clergy and the Laity kissed his hand and thus ended this very interesting ceremony. Such, indeed was the state of St. Lucia's on the occasion that every one present thought that he was transported into some enchanted ground or was placed in the Elysian fields themselves, God Save the Bishop.

CONFIRMATION AT CHINSURAH.

On Wednesday last the Archbishop administered the Holy Sacrament of Confirmation to eighteen persons at Chinsurah, chiefly Recruits of H. M. Regiments en route to the Upper Provinces. For two days the zealous Pastor of Chinsurah, Rev. Mr. Boulogne, was occupied in hearing the confessions of several of these edifying young men, who eagerly profited of his sacred ministry to prepare themselves like good Catholics for the dangers to which they are exposed by their profession, as well as by the climate and also the long journey they are about to enter on. We have heard with joy, that the Recruits at Dum-Dum occupied the last few days in the same holy exercises and for the same reasons, they too being under orders to proceed to some distant stations. We trust that these examples of true Catholic piety on the part of the children of St. Patrick will stimulate the tepid amongst us to increased attention and fervor in frequenting the Sacraments and the public offices of religion.

GRATITUDE.

—"Be ye thankful,"* says St. Paul to the Colossians. Gratitude is indeed worthy of this high recommendation; for it implies a number of great qualities which do honour to the soul of man. There are different kinds of obligations; some can be repaid, such as loans and gifts; there are others which the heart alone can discharge, for if a friend has saved our honour, or our life, it is evident that no adequate return can be made for such a benefit.

As for pecuniary obligations, a man of delicate feeling never contracts them with those he does not esteem. Grecinus Julius was about to exhibit some plays to the Roman people, and permitted his friends to contribute thereto, in order to augment their splendour. Fabius Persicus, a man of wealth and dignity, but of infamous morals, having sent him a large sum, he refused to accept of it. One of his friends was present on the occasion, and remonstrated with him on this excess of delicacy. "How," asked Julius, "have you the face to ask me to be under any obligation to a wretch whom I would blush to recognize in public?" When the consul Rubilus, who was of equal infamy with Persicus, sent a still larger sum for the same purpose, and urged him to accept of it, he answered,—"Pray excuse me; I have already refused Persicus!"

There is no greater heart-break for a man of honour, says Seneca, than to accept a favour from those he does not esteem.

There are two species of gratitude; the one which returns, and the one which wishes to return, but for want of means, endeavours to discharge the debt it has contracted by affection and good will. If it does not do good for good, this is not the result of thanklessness but of poverty; it is as grateful as it is possible for it to be. A painter who would not have money to buy colours, canvas, or pencil, would still be a good painter, although unable to give proof of his genius.

Next to gratitude to God, there is none more sacred than what we owe to our parents. The Scripture is full of terrific menaces against ungrateful children: "The eye that mocketh at his father, and that despiseth the labour of his mother in bearing him, let the ravens of the brooks pick it out, and the young eagles eat it."*

It is only low minds and vulgar souls that consider the intrinsic value of a favour; it is by the disposition with which it is given, and not by the amount of benefit conferred, that gratitude must be measured. If a friend bestows on me a small present with great affection; if, to relieve me from momentary distress, he closes his eyes on his own wants; if he has conferred kindness on me, without any prospect or hope of receiving compensation;—if he has not permitted the occasion to pass by without employing himself for me, even at the sacrifice of his own interests—I should indeed be ungrateful, were I not as thankful to him as to the monarch who would exhaust his treasures to enrich me.

No vice is more generally stigmatised than ingratitude; the ungrateful are loud in their condemnation of it. How is it, then, that this vice is so common? Why does every one do what every one blames?

Enter into a peasant's hut, and you will perhaps see that the spindles are all abandoned, that the labours of the evening are temporarily suspended, and all heads are inclined in the attitude of profound attention. The good people of the cabin are so absorbed in what occupies their thoughts, that they do not hear the tempest that howls without, and even forget to throw some fuel on the expiring fire. The pastor of the parish is, perhaps, the object of detraction. What?—the pastor who divides his homely fare with all the indigent of the hamlet,—who often walks long distances, by night, through rain and storm, to console them on their death-bed,—who visits the sick, instructs the ignorant, consoles the afflicted, maintains the harmony, and protects the honour of families! The evangelical benevolence of the pastor does not protect him against the calumnies of his flock. The minister of Jesus Christ is made to answer for the morality of his church-wardens, the sobriety of his bell-ringer, and the caprice of his old servant!

What bring these men in red caps and *carmagnoles to the church of Chantilly, built by the Condés? Have they come to protect the remains of these brave and generous princes to whom their village owes its existence?—for, without the munificence of this family, at once so illustrious and so unfortunate, there would be no Chantilly. See, they dig the earth:—what are they looking for? Their axe has touched a box of massive silver. They open it, and eagerly look at the seven hearts of the Condés it contains! They laugh with hellish derision—and then throw these relics of the illustrious dead to the crows of the neighbouring forest; while they patriotically steal the silver case which contained them! What infamy! what ingratitude!

Sometimes ingratitude becomes ridiculous. Cneus Lentulus, from a state which bordered on poverty, was enabled, by the liberality of Augustus, to maintain the dignity of his ancestors. When he was thus made one of the most opulent men in Rome, he lamented that Augustus had made him quit his studies, and said that all he had received from the emperor, was little compared with what he had been prevented from acquiring, by being taken from his profession of a lawyer; “and this was so far from being the fact,” says a Latin writer, “that he had no greater obligation to Augustus than this; for although he was needy in the greatest degree, it was easier to get money from him than words, so destitute was he of the qualifications of an orator.”

He who refuses to acknowledge a favour he has received, is ungrateful; as he also is who neglects to return it when the occasion presents itself: but the worst ingratitude is that of the monster who dishonours those who have done him kindness; who repays generosity with hate; who endeavours to crush the hand that succoured him in his distress; and who longs for the destruction of his benefactors, with the hope of raising the superstructure of his fortune on their ruins. It is of such men, or rather, such monsters, that the Scripture says, with sublime conciseness:—“The hope of the unthankful shall melt away like the winter’s ice, and shall run off as unprofitable water.”†

Such men,—and, unfortunately, there are many such in the world,—ought to be marked on the forehead with a hot iron, like the soldier of Philip. Society, to which they communicate their own selfishness, ought to reject them as the sea throws on shore the carcasses that corrupt its waters; and lazaretti ought to preserve nations from this worst of all contagions.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE’S LAMENTATION.

PROGRESS OF POPERY.—Of the advance the Papists have lately been making amongst us we have before informed our readers,—they still continue to advance, some days back we heard that they had purchased spacious premises in Italy for the purpose of founding a monastery. A school for girls as a stepping stone to the Nunnery is, we learn also in contemplation in the neighbourhood of Rev. G. Pearce’s Institution. A letter we have received from a friend at Agra informs us that they have been making progress there also—they have set up a school which is drawing the children of many nominal Protestants, who care little for the spiritual welfare of their children.—Christian Advocate, Nov 4.

MADRAS.

Passengers per Hindustan.—Amongst the Passengers left by the Hindustan at Madras on the 14th instant, we are informed were 3 clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church—2 Students and three Lay Brothers of the Order of the Oblats. These last are to instruct the children of the Catholic Orphan Asylums in some useful trades. We have often wished for something of this sort for the youth of this country. We have wished to see them practice some useful trade by which they could gain a livelihood, instead of hanging about the public offices or serving as volunteers, in the hope of getting a situation after some two, three or four years of anxious expectation.

To become independent the East Indian community must aspire to something else than to be writers in a public office, and for this, among other reasons which might be assigned; the offices at this Presidency cannot afford employment to one fifth of the applicants, and in a few years more they cannot find room for one tenth. What then is to be done? We are sorry to observe that the youth of this country think it derogatory to labour in those arts, which Englishmen with four times the amount of property would bring up their children, but we hope this feeling will soon wear away; all cannot be writers, and yet they cannot live idle, what then is to be done? Let every one encourage the plan adopted by Dr. Fennelly, of bringing out, from Europe, men who can properly instruct the rising generation in useful trades, and let others who are able also to provide for Orphan Children give them the means of procuring their livelihood hereafter.—Examiner, October 23.

† Wisdom, vxi. 29.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION IN THE ARMY.

We perceive by the Moulmein Chronicle that Catholic Clergyman has been prohibited from entering the Barracks of H. M. 84th Regiment stationed at Moulmein, which is certainly one of the most extraordinary things we have heard of for long time.—We have seen it stated in the Madras Express some time ago, that the officer commanding H. M. 84th Regiment refused to allow some of his men to become Catholics, on their desire to do so being communicated to him, and on the matter being referred to the Brigadier he at once admitted that the men could not be refused permission if they wished to withdraw from the Protestant and join the Catholic communion, but recommended that they should first present themselves to the minister to see if he could not remove their doubts, and offering to make the rule general.

Now we cannot discover for the life of us, from whence or from whom the Brigadier has obtained the authority to make such a rule—if etiquette would oblige a soldier to ask permission, we would say that no officer should refuse him the privilege of serving God in any religion he may think best.—Our maxim is “to do to another as you would wish to be done by;” and we are inclined to think that no officer would like to be interfered with, under a wish to change his religion. A man’s conscientious scruples are matters entirely between his God and himself, and to exercise a right of interference would be an act of the greatest tyranny. But we certainly could not suppose that any Commanding Officer would presume to forbid a Catholic Clergyman from visiting his flock in the Barracks—the case under notice is the only one we have heard of for some years and it is to be hoped it will be the last. We are credibly informed that the Catholics compose, at least, one half of the soldiers of H. M. 84th Regiment, and we know that the Army regulation guarantees religious freedom to the Catholic Soldiers. Why then, in the name of all that is just is their clergyman refused admittance to them? are they so far removed from all protection that they should be thus treated, or is it because the Catholic Clergy of the place are Italians and are unacquainted with the forms to be observed in seeking redress? We think this is a case in which the Commander in Chief, in the legitimate exercise of his authority, should interfere.—A Court of Enquiry ought at once to be ordered to investigate the matter, and should things be found to be as stated, that such measures be taken as would prevent a recurrence of such unwarranted interference.

There is nothing which could possibly tend more to create discontent amongst soldiers—no matter what their creed, or the particular Church to which they may belong than any interference with the rights of conscience, and such being the case, we hesitate not to pronounce the reported proceedings at Moulmein noticed above as most unwise and imprudent, and calculated to work much mischief.—Ibid, Oct. 30.

MISSION OF SIAM.

Extract from a Letter of Rev. M. GRANDJEAN, Missionary Apostolic to Rev. M. GERARD, Professor in the College of Saint Diez.

Bangkok, July 2, 1840.

“My very dear Friend,

“I have heard it said that the Protestant missionaries boast that they do not labour without success in the kingdom of Siam: allow me to cite some facts, of which I guarantee the correctness, and which will enable you to appreciate in their true value the results of the biblical propagandism.

“They count at Bangkok eleven or twelve Protestant missionaries; of this number, four live at half a league’s distance from my house, and they seem to reserve themselves for the conversion of the Chinese; I do not know them sufficiently to give you any exact information concerning them. As to the eight others, who are nearer neighbours, I see them every day, and can assure you that, except Dr. Bradley, they all enjoy a constant inactivity; their temples would be deserted, if the family of the missionary—the servants particularly, who are obliged by their situation, and under the penalty of being dismissed, to assist at the evening prayer and Sunday preaching—did not come to trouble the silence of this deep solitude. And yet you have heard Dr. Bradley, the head of this little army of shepherds without flocks, publish in some Protestant annals, that he saw continually assembled around his pulpit from a hundred to a hundred and sixty converts, Siamese, Peguans, Laotians, and Chinese. In Europe they may believe such exaggerations; but we, who are on the spot, must declare that this auditory, if it ever existed, has completely vanished.

“Formerly, Dr. Bradley, who is a physician, and who gave his prescriptions only to those who had previously listened to his sermons, might believe himself to be surrounded by his disciples, because he saw himself consulted by a certain number of sick persons, who asked of him, not to baptize them but to cure them. At present the minister and physician have got into equal discredit; so that his shop, as well as his temple, is nearly always closed.

“Mr. Bradley is, in consequence, like his colleagues, reduced to scatter bibles and pamphlets. The Siamese, who will not listen to his words, sometimes accept his books, but without being more disposed, on this account, to become Christians: some do not read them; others, after having perused them for amusement, say, with much simplicity, to the minister, that if the Gospel was the word of the Lord of heaven, he would value it sufficiently not to give it without distinction to every sort of persons. Contempt for the religion of Jesus is the only fruit that Protestantism has produced in the kingdom of Siam, and Dr. Bradley is still at this day without a single proteŷyte, as he was when he arrived six years ago.

“Your most devoted friend,

THE MONTH OF MARY.

"O MARY, CONCEIVED WITHOUT SIN, PRAY FOR ME, WHO HAVE RECOURSE TO YOU."

It was a fine evening in the month of May, and after wandering long among the tombs of Père la Chaise, I was about to depart from thence, when a murmur of voices fell on my ear, and turning round I beheld a sight which never shall, and which never can be obliterated from my memory. It was a funeral procession—but one which told less of death than of life everlasting, less of grief, than of gladness, that a pure spirit had been removed from the contagion of earth to joy in the purity of its heavenly sisters. Beside the coffin walked a pair of mourners, whose looks of misery told their tale; they were the parents of the departed; perhaps they had lost their only child, the joy of their younger days, the hope and staff of their approaching age. Neither of them were old; the creature over whom they wept could have barely passed the first years of childhood; and the hat-bands of the mourners, and the pall that covered the coffin, were of the spotless hue that denotes the virgin.

The coffin was preceded by a troop of young girls all clad in white, and bearing wreaths of white roses in their hands. Their eyes were cast modestly down, and amid looks of deep recollection and prayer, I thought I could trace on many a fair young brow a mingled expression of sadness for the loss of a friend, and of most sweet assurance of her present bliss. I knew at once that this young troop of mourners belonged to the Society of the Month of Mary, and that they were about to consign a companion of their pious association to an early grave.

The Month of Mary has always appeared to me one of the most beautiful, as it certainly is one of the most powerful, of the devotions of the Catholic Church. By this holy practice, the month of May, the fairest of the months of Spring, is dedicated to Mary, who was the first and fairest among the daughters of men, and whose days beamed upon this unhappy world like a beautiful Spring, making it fair by her virtues and bright by the promise of that spiritual summer which was to visit its children in the person of her Son.

But I must return to Père la Chaise. The pure child of this most pure devotion, was consigned to earth; her sisters in piety and love had knelt round her grave, mingling their prayers with tears, half of sorrow for her death, half of sympathy in her present bliss; then each flung her white garland on it, until it became a trophy of white blossoms, and so they all departed in prayer and religious resignation. The bereaved parents alone remained on the spot where their all of earthly joy was buried. Long and fervently that mother prayed! Now she cast her eyes to Heaven, as if there she could trace the flight of her child to bliss! And now she cast them to the earth, as nature would have its way, and her heart was wrung with sad thoughts of the coffin and the worm, and all that makes death horrible to the mind of man. What a contrast those mourners made, each weeping over an object apparently equally dear to both. It was religion and its absence—frenzied sorrow, and silent resignation—the madness of proud despair and the tranquillity of humble hope. The mother's heart was torn with anguish, but supported by an innate sense of religion, which whispered sweet thoughts of the happiness of her child, and hopes of a future union with her. But the father, his face was of despair, earthly despair—the despair of having lost one most dear, without the chance of ever beholding her again. For him there was no hope in God, no belief in the immortality of the soul,—annihilation was written on his brow; and too surely did he seem to think, that all yet remaining of the bright child of his household was mingling for ever in the dust at his feet. The Cross was before him, and he turned not to it for consolation or for prayer; Heaven was above him; he raised not his wistful glances thither; but with the strong grasp of despair he clutched some fading flowers from the grave, and gazed upon it with a fixed and downward look, as if he still sought to pierce through its awful gloom, and there, and there alone, had thought or hoped to behold his child. For this man religion existed not, and God Himself was as nothing in his eyes. The thought made me shudder and I turned aside. A slight shriek woke me from my reverie; I turned again, I beheld him with frantic eagerness trying to tear aside the earth that veiled his child from his sight. The woman had been roused by this action of madness, and with tears entreated him to desist from his purpose. He heeded her not, and was actually making some progress in his mad design, when she saw me and besought me to assist in calming him. I did what I could: it would have been idle to talk to this man of religion, or of its consolations, but I kept my eye upon him and talked for a long time, quietly endeavouring to lead his mind from the subject that engrossed it; and when he seemed calmer, I advised him to retire, adding that he could return later when there would be fewer spectators of his sorrow.

"Yes, yes!" sobbed the poor woman, "In the calm evening, dear Pierre; that was the hour our Marie loved."

These words seemed to strike him; he rose, and suffered us, for he was utterly exhausted by the violence of his grief, to lead him to his home. Once there, he retired to an inner chamber; his wife would have followed him, but I advised her to suffer his solitary indulgence of his sorrow. She complied, and gently thanked me for my kindness.

"But for your kindness," she said, in a tone of deep feeling, "he would have succeeded in——" The idea was too horrible, and she broke off suddenly.—"Oh, Marie! Marie!" she sobbed, in an undertone. "Ah, Madam! did you know the creature we have lost, you would not wonder at his sorrow—nor at his despair," she added, after a moment's pause, "for he is an infidel, without religion—without a God. He does not believe he has a soul, or that we shall ever behold our child again."

The poor woman looked upon me now as a friend—as a benefactor who had saved the remains of her child from profanation; and, by degrees, she told me the little history of her Marie. I cannot give it better than in her own words, as I heard it partly then, and partly at different visits I paid her afterwards.

"I have told you," she began, "that my husband is an infidel; he is also a man of most violent temper. His conversation is enough to contaminate the strongest Christian! you may believe it might destroy the right principles of a child. My poor Marie! My life was passed in seeking to efface the impressions which her soul received, and to undo the harm that bad example and profane conversations were perpetually doing. For a time I hoped I had succeeded; but it pleased God to visit me with sickness which confined me to my bed for years. When I rose from it, I no longer recognized my child; the evil doctrine had entered her soul, it had taken root, and flourished there. Shall I ever forget the anguish of my heart, when first from the lips of my child I heard the blasphemous doctrines she had learned from her father? It was, indeed, too true. While I was helpless on the bed of pain, that father who should have shielded his child from the very shadow of sin, had instilled into her's the poisonous creed of his own unhappy soul. She laughed in scorn at the name of God, scoffed at religion, mocked at the priests, and never went to church, excepting to meet the gay companions of her folly. She was now surrounded by people well calculated to allure her into vice; she was beautiful, and endowed with a genius, which, if trained in a right direction, had been the pride and glory of her mother; but, perverted as it was, I declare to you I would have gladly renounced it to behold her a gibbering idiot at my feet, so that with the change, had come the unstained innocence of an idiot soul. Marie had now attained her fourteenth year; in vain I raised my warning voice. I was a bigot in the eyes of my child, and at last I became passive, content to implore the Mother of God, to whom I had devoted Marie at her birth, that the sins of the father might not be visited on the head of the child. My prayer was in mercy heard, and gladly do I pass over her youthful errors, to tell you of her prompt repentance and heroic virtues. She conceived a strong desire to go on the stage; this awoke her father from his dream of security. Both were of vehement temper, and I will not describe the scenes that followed. While this contest was at its height, we went to a village fête; it was the first of May, and, with the exception of my child, all the girls of the fête belonged to the Association of the Month of Mary. They had been to Communion that morning, and they came to the fête full of innocent and religious joy. Their Lord was reposing in their hearts;—alas! the passions of this world were in the breast of my child: the contrast wrung my soul with anguish. They looked like the brides of Heaven, in their white robes, and whiter wreaths; a little picture of their heavenly mother hung round their necks. Marie, alone, was in the garb of the worldling, was divested of her spotless robe, and, far worse, her baptismal innocence was no longer on her soul. She herself perceived and felt the difference; I saw it in her face that she did. Her companions gathered round her, and sportively besought her to join their society. She hesitated; I felt as if her salvation depended on her answer. (Oh, Mother! how I besought your aid in that hour!) A sense of guilt seemed to steal over her soul, and something she muttered about being unworthy. They over-ruled her objections, and made a circle round her. One of them took off her own wreath and picture; they knelt, and recited the prayer of the Association. Marie, at first, remained standing, then she hid her face in her hands, and before the prayer was concluded, she had sunk on her knees. Thus she received the wreath and picture; I had not seen her in that attitude since the days of her childhood.

"I know not what she thought, or what she felt, but I can imagine; for she suddenly started from her knees, and rushed through the smiling sympathizing crowd. Finding, after some time, that she came back no more, I also retired home; and opening the door of her little chamber, beheld her prostrate on her knees; the wreath and picture were placed before her, and the poor child was weeping bitterly. I would have retired, but she heard me, and springing up, she first flung herself into my arms, and then fell prostrate at my feet, imploring my pardon for the past sins of her life. From that hour she was an altered being; the books of poetry and of song, the pictures of actors, and of worldly heroes, by which she had loved to decorate her room, were there no longer; and pious books, and pious pictures, usurped their place. A crucifix was against the wall, and beneath it the withered garland ever retained its place. The picture she always wore upon her bosom. Both have been buried with her. In all ways she sought to repair the past scandal of her life. She publicly implored pardon of her young companions for the example she had given. She would ever walk last in processions as the most unworthy; the first and the last she was ever in the Church; her whole life was divided between prayer and good works. She instructed the ignorant, attended the sick, and more than one poor wretch has owned in his dying hour, that, under God, he owed his hopes of salvation to her charity and zeal. This sudden change of life, at first astonished her father, and then made him furious. He thought she intended to enter a convent, and he was furious at the idea. He overwhelmed her with abuse, with curses, ay, and often, very often, with blows, likewise. She bore all in patience; she who could never before endure an impatient word, now sat like an angel, smiling through her tears. And when the storm was over, and his passion had exhausted itself into silence, she would steal to his side and kiss the hand that had been raised against her, and implore his pardon for having given him offence. Her devotion to the Mother of God was wonderful. Her face would brighten at the very name of Mary, and she would often speak to her young friends of her Heavenly Mother with a fervour and holy joy, that failed not to draw from every eye those tears the very mention of that sweet name could bring into her own. Most of all, she wished to die in that fair month which is devoted to Mary,—and her wish was in mercy granted. For months I perceived a change in her appearance, which made me tremble lest I should lose my child at the very moment she became worthy of my love. Consumption took possession of her delicate frame; her colour became deeper and more lovely; her eyes seemed to grow larger and more brilliant; the blue veins of her forehead were more distinctly visible through the transparent brilliancy of her skin. She wasted away, withering like a flower that fades in the sun; and last week she died. Oh! had you seen as I did, the expression of that angel face, when, for the last time, she placed the Cross to her lips, the withered wreath to her beating heart; had you seen the bright smile with which she gave her soul to her Creator, you would have believed, as firmly as I do, that it winged its way straight to the habitation of the blessed. Before she died she made a moving exhortation to her father: I trust it will take effect at a future time, at present he is in despair."

The sound of a footstep in the next room made her pause in her story, she opened the door, but her husband was no longer there; terror was depicted on the poor woman's face.

"He is not here," she cried "he will go mad on her grave. Oh! if ever you hope for the mercies of God, come with me and seek him there."

We hurried to the cemetery; the sun was just setting, and the last rays of its glory were shining on the grave. The wretched father was on his knees, prostrate among heaps of withering flowers. At that instant a swell of music floated on the air, and the young girls of the Month of Mary, dressed in white, and singing a hymn to the Mother of God, approached the grave, scattering fresh white flowers upon it. We fell upon our knees; the father also appeared to listen. He raised his head; the soft sounds seemed to soothe him, and recall his scattered senses. Gradually his tears began to flow, and he turned towards the Cross on the grave. The wife saw it, she rushed through the crowd, and tearing the Cross from her bosom, cried out with frantic eagerness—

"Oh, Pierre! I knew it would be so. You believe that our child is happy; you believe in the God who died on this Cross!"

The man sprang from his knees and stared wildly around him. For a moment, doubt, pride, and shame appeared to shake his soul; then truth and religion triumphed: he caught the Cross, and falling on his knees, he kissed it most devoutly.

"I knew it, I knew it!" cried the wife, flinging her arms tightly round him, "and the prayer of our child is heard already."

The man made no reply, his head sank upon her shoulder, and he burst into a flood of hysterical tears, such as I had never before seen from the eyes of a man. With true natural good feeling, the crowd dispersed; none remaining with us but the Curé, who had accidentally been passing by, and remained to give what assistance was in his power. He spoke long, and seriously, with the man, and Pierre submissively promised all the good priest demanded of him; and we left the couple, broken-hearted, yet happy, by the grave of their child.

"And will a conversion, so sudden, be also lasting?" I asked of the good priest, as we left the cemetery.

"Few conversions are really sudden, though, I admit, there have been wonderful instances of the kind. But this one is not sudden. Atheists seldom really succeed in believing their own doctrine, though pride induces them to call it such. There is almost always an innate conviction of its folly: infidelity is, in some, the pride of philosophy,—in others, the cowardice of guilt. Some fancy atheism the proof of a mind soaring above the superstitions of the vulgar, but many more seek to disbelieve, only because they are afraid to believe. Eternity and a just Judge are fearful things to those, who act as if such things were not. But the opinions of this poor Pierre must have long been changing. The conversion of his child, and her happy death, cannot have failed in making an impression, not seen or felt at once, but gradually leading him to reflection and (which is the same thing) to conviction:—for who ever seriously reflected and remained obstinate in unbelief? All his hopes are now directed to meeting his child in heaven; and he will never relapse into infidelity while he believes that she is an Angel there!"

Here we parted, as our roads lay in different directions; and I returned home weaving sweet fancies on the name of Mary.

How sweet, I thought, is the name of Mary! How well does Saint Bernard speak our thoughts, when he says, "Oh, Mary! you cannot be named without inflaming the heart of him, who pronounces your name and loves you." Why is this name ever given to common mortals? It should rather be enshrined in every heart,—it should never be named but with a feeling of reverence,—it should never be heard but with an interior motion of respect and love for her who bore it once, and who has thus made it a name holy to every Christian's ear. How venerable is the name of Mary,—how full of fragrance and of beauty! Truly it is an inspiration to all pious thoughts, sweet as the odours of the cedars of Lebanon, fair as the lily, lovely as the rose, meek and gentle as the lowly violet, bright as the stars that encircle her brow. All virtues, and all memories of virtues, are entwined around it. Chastity, poverty, humility, obedience, charity,—these are the bright attributes of Mary, and these are the memories that encircle her name. The name of Mary has also a mystic signification—meaning, "Star of the Sea." She was indeed the Sea-star, the star of hope, which rose over the troubled waters of bitterness and crime, and soothed their billows to a sudden calm.

All the nations of the earth were pagans, and the bright days of the religion of Juda had vanished for ever. The days of the patriarchs, of the judges, of the kings, of the prophets, had passed away. The glory was about to depart from Jerusalem, the sceptre of her power had already been wrested from the princes of her people. The Roman cohorts were in her streets, the Roman eagles flew over her towers, a Roman delegate was on her throne, and Roman power controlled her councils. The forms of religion were still preserved; but the spirit—the spirit was there no longer. The priests still lay prostrate before the holy of holies, the temples still echoed to Jehovah's name, but the heart slept on in cold indifference; the body was bent in prayer, but the spirit was bowed yet lower, and grovelled in the very dust in the sordid interests of human nature debased and fallen. Such was the world when Mary came,—the morning star which was to usher in the true sun of the spiritual world. As the storm-beaten mariners of ancient days hailed, with shouts of delight, the rising of that star which was their only guide over the waste of waters, so may we hail the name of Mary, as the true beacon to our haven of safety at the foot of the Cross. Oh! let it sink deeply into our souls! let it linger in our hearts, and about our lips! let us call upon it when we rejoice, as when we mourn—in the sunshine of security as in the gloom of distress and danger. It will be to us as most sweet refreshment in the hour of need, as a light in the darkness of this world, as a certain assurance of safety and rest, as a shield around our hearts, and an armour of proof against the attacks of our foe. We will think on Mary! and the virtues amid which that name is enshrined, will crowd to our memories and perhaps bloom in our hearts. We will speak of Mary, and the devil shall fly from before our footsteps. We will pray to Mary, and our prayer shall be heard at the throne of her Son! She, on earth, denied him nothing,—neither, in Heaven, will she refuse her sought. On earth, He called her "Mother,"—his head was pillowed on that sinless heart, his nourishment was derived from that most sinless breast. Will he deny the wish of that heart—the sighs of that bosom? Her tears often fell upon his infant brow, her lips were often pressed upon his infant cheek. Will he refuse the prayer of those lips?—Those lips which belonged to her, who shared in all his thoughts, and wept with more than a mother's love over all his woes. Where is the child who would refuse aught to his parent? Where is the son who would deny aught to his mother? And Father of Heaven! That mother, Mary,—that Son, the Saviour of the world.

M. C. A.

FATHER MATHEW IN LONDON.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, jun., observed that the present assembly had come together, not to speak only, not to hear speeches only, but to act. What did he and the other advocates of Temperance ask them to do? Simply to give up the habit of voluntarily extinguishing that reason—those reasoning powers, and the great gift of free will, which had been bestowed on them by a beneficent Providence for the wisest and best of purposes. (Hear, hear.) Intemperance reduced its victims not only to the level of the brute, but even below that mark. There were numerous social inducements for persons to embrace Total Abstinence. There were also other and higher considerations. Man lived not for the things of this world alone, but for his fellow-creatures; and those who asserted that they had sufficient strength to resist intemperance at all times—and such an assertion was generally a fallacy—were bound not to eat or drink anything which might cause a brother to fall—in fact, they were bound to give up the use of strong drinks as long as any human being was found to be deficient in that strength of mind and that firmness of resolution of which they (the moderate drinkers) so complacently boasted. (Cheers.) We call on you all (continued the young and able speaker) without any distinction of class, creed, or politics—for that which interests our common humanity is apart from all such divisions—to come forward in the noble cause of Temperance. If you are young, then adopt that course which will keep you from ills innumerable, and enable you to gain an honourable competency and an honourable reputation; if you are old, then nobly resolve to make the sacrifice for the sake of giving a good example to the young; if you are poor, become Total Abstinents, and we will show you how to devote both for the benefit of body and mind, those sums of money which you spend in intoxicating liquors; if you are rich, we will teach you how to employ your money worthily, and how to make yourselves truly happy. In fine, we call on you all to give up the use of that which is a mere selfish gratification. Mr. Buckingham retired amidst general cheers.

Father MATHEW, after a brief address, in which he complimented the last speaker, administered the pledge to the first batch, about 300 strong. Speech after speech, batch after batch followed; one of the batches, consisting chiefly of the boys and girls of the "Juvenile Rechabite tent of Westminster," as announced by the banner displayed among them, viz., a crimson one with a lamp bearing a flag. Several members of the Society of Friends were also in this batch of recipients of the pledge. After addresses from Dr. M. Syder, and from Messrs. Briscoe and Green (who observed, that he was bound to become a Total Abstinence, because he could do more good to others in that capacity than as a moderate drinker).

Mr. SMITH pronounced a warm eulogium on Father Mathew, and remarked, that England, his (Mr. Smith's) native country, was once considered the first nation in the world in many respects, but he must confess that Ireland was now the first in the glorious cause of Temperance. England, therefore, fully expected that every one of her sons would do his duty. It is useless for any person, said Mr. Smith, to exclaim, "Oh, what can one man do?" Suppose that Father Mathew, when applied to, had quietly folded his arms across his bosom, and asked, "Why do you come and urge me to preach up Temperance—what can one do?" Suppose our esteemed friend had so expressed himself, and acted accordingly, what would have been the consequence? Why, millions at this very day would still be the victims of intoxicating drinks. (Loud and general cries of "Hear, hear.") Suppose we applied to a charitable and wealthy person to subscribe to the funds of a school or an hospital, and he were to say, as an excuse for non-subscribing, that he did not want to be taught reading and writing, or that he had no fractured limb—would he not be considered a very selfish creature? Well, the man who says he will not be a Total Abstinence because he does not need such a system, is equally careless of his fellow-beings, millions of whom are still requiring such a salutary medium of regeneration. (Cheers.)

Messrs. WYATT and MITCHELL (secretary to the Vauxhall Teetotal branch) were the next speakers—the latter stating, that a wise Irishman once addressed his last glass of whiskey in the following terms. "Now, have I not toiled for you day and night? Have I not sacrificed for you all the comforts of home and the happiness of my family; Have I not, on your account, been obliged to seek employment in other lands, and what have you done for me in return? I need not tell you for you know right well, you thief of the world, and so I'll now get rid of you for ever." (Laughter and cheers.)

Earl STANHOPE, who, on entering the Common was immediately recognized, and escorted to the platform, addressed the meeting during a quarter of an hour; but, in consequence of another individual, with a stentorian voice, speaking at the same time, at the rear of the van, his lordship's speech could only be heard distinctly by those who were in front of him. He passed a warm eulogium on Father Mathew, testified his delight at the success of the rev. gentleman's mission to England, and stated that he (Lord Stanhope) had, although he was ever a temperate man, taken the pledge from his illustrious friend. Lord Stanhope concluded by calling for three cheers for Father Mathew, which were cordially given. The noble earl was followed by Mr. Whitaker, the Rev. Mr. Nolan, of Nova Scotia, and by Mr. Booth, the last stating that he knew a public-house, near the Mint, where about forty boys, from seventeen to eighteen years of age, assembled every night.

The Rev. JAMES BURNS said that their respected friend, Father Mathew, after procuring five millions of Total Abstinences in Ireland, had kindly come over to England in order to rescue the people of that country from the vice of intemperance. He looked upon that rev. gentleman as the father of the human species; and as a prophet, resembling the one who was sent to Nineveh. He (Mr. Burns) had been a Total Abstinence during six years, but he had taken the pledge again from Father Mathew, although he (Mr. Burns) was a Baptist minister. (Loud cheers.) The Rev. Mr. Moore had got the start of him, but he (Mr. Burns) had been the second to take the pledge publicly from Father Mathew. (Renewed cheers.)

The Rev. JOHN MOORE here most cordially shook hands with the rev. gentleman, exclaiming, "Let no one say for the future that a Catholic priest cannot love and respect Protestant clergymen" (Cheers.)

The Rev. J. BURNS (in continuation): Some persons objected to taking the pledge from Father Mathew, because he was a Catholic priest; but he (Mr. Burns) considered that that rev. gentleman occupied a higher and a prouder position than any other man in the world. "Father Mathew was—it was true—a Catholic priest, but he was a priest who would shine like a star for all eternity in Heaven. (Enthusiastic and prolonged applause.) The rev. gentleman, after calling for, and obtaining, three hearty cheers for the "great Apostle of Temperance," retired amidst unequivocal demonstrations of respect and esteem.

About 100,000 persons visited the Common during the day, 5,000 of whom took the pledge. On the next day (Tuesday) Father Mathew arrived about twelve o'clock, and was enthusiastically received. An additional platform and a strong barrier in front of it had been erected at an early hour. During the day Father Mathew was visited by Sir R. Throckmorton, the Hon. S. Jerningham, P. H. Howard, Esq., M.P., M. Milnes, Esq., M.P., and a number of respectable ladies and gentlemen. After administering the pledge to several batches, Father Mathew received the following address:—

THE ADDRESS OF THE CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY.

Very Reverend and Respected Sir—We, the members of the Philanthropic Society do most sincerely and heartily welcome you to London. We are entirely at a loss to find language to convey to you the real feelings of our hearts, at seeing you amongst us; but we humbly approach you with humility, reverence, and respect, to offer you our everlasting gratitude for the many blessings which, by Divine assistance and your example, have fallen upon us and our families since we embraced the principle of Total Abstinence. Very reverend and respected Sir, your action in regenerating our native country is beyond eulogy or censure—praise you need not, and slander cannot take a single laurel from your brow; for your mighty powers are beyond the sphere of human comprehension, and without further preface we hail you the Great Apostle of Temperance. Very reverend and respected Sir, we have instituted this society to relieve distressed Tee-totalers without distinction, well knowing by experience that temptations to a vast extent have been held out to those who are poor to violate their pledge; and any person making application, proving distress, are immediately relieved from this charitable institution, after due enquiries as to the legality of the applicant. Very reverend and respected Sir, the object of this society is to relieve distress, and prevent intemperance—to feed the hungry, and to clothe the naked—to harbour the harbourless, to visit the sick, and to endeavour the utmost in their power to decently bury their dead. This, with Divine assistance, they have done, and intend to continue so to do. Very reverend and respected Sir, the members of this society are humble working men, unassisted by any but their own united efforts in carrying out those charitable works; but your appearance amongst them will cheer them on in the good work they have begun, and they, true to the pledge they have taken, will preserve unsullied until they appear before their great Maker, where in conjunction with millions of souls that you have saved from a drunkard's grave, will stand up before the throne of our heavenly Father, and in one simultaneous voice will there declare the good you have done.

(Signed on behalf the Society)

"EDWARD CANTWELL, Chairman.

"JOHN RIORDAN, Treasurer.

"D. L. RAYAL, Secretary."

Mr. M'CARTHY, in the course of an effective and humorous address, remarked that there certainly were great changes almost every day in society. Fifty-three years ago seventeen persons were hung in chains near the very spot where that platform was then erected. The Legislature had humanely interposed on behalf of poor dumb animals, but did nothing to rescue men from the mire of intemperance. The rich lady who took "a drop" in the morning because she had a "spasmodic" complaint, would rail at the poor fishwoman who took a larger quantity of the same stuff, and who became intoxicated—and perhaps, after all, the latter took it to cure the spasms. It was said that alcohol was the good creature of God, but did it not transport to penal colonies 74,000 persons in the time of George the III.; and did it not cause 8,000 persons to be hanged in that reign? Mr. M'Carthy, after observing that Tee-totalers had very little need of medical men, asserted that there were 800 doctors attached to poor houses in England and Wales who had never passed through an examination. (1)

Mr. CUTTON (a member of the Society of Friends) next followed, and was succeeded by

Mr. TEARE, who said that during ten years he had been denouncing moderate drinking as much as drunkenness. He then gave an interesting account of Father Mathew's labours in Yorkshire and Lancashire, stating that in Manchester 80,000, in a population of 270,000, took the pledge in four days; and that in Liverpool, 64,000, in a population of 270,000, did the same. In fact, the people of the North of England seemed determined to carry everything before them, and to set that part of the country on fire with cold-water. (Laughter and cheers.)

"THE PROTESTANT MEMBERS OF THE SOUTH LONDON TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, TO THE REVEREND THEOBALD MATHREW.

"REVEREND SIR.—It is with great pleasure and with devout thankfulness to Almighty God that we have the opportunity of welcoming you in your labour of love, to the southern portion of this great metropolis.

"Divine Providence having preserved your valuable life and permitted you to visit our native shores, we have, with gratitude, watched your successful progress, in the northern parts of the kingdom, and earnestly desiring to share with you in the triumphs of this glorious Temperance Reformation, our prayers are directed to our Heavenly Father, that he may be pleased to pour down upon your efforts in this locality the abundance of his blessing.

"It may, Sir, be interesting to you to know that Temperance societies began to exist in this district in the year 1836. A few zealous friends of Temperance commenced the first at the Borough-road School.

"They laboured hard amidst many difficulties, but watched over by the eye of Omniscience, they have succeeded beyond their most sanguine expectations. Twenty-four societies (hundreds of whose members being reclaimed from Intemperance) are the fruits of their early and continued exertions, one of which, viz., 'The South-London Catholic Society,' presented an address to you on Monday.

"In conclusion, it will be the subject of our frequent and earnest petitions at the throne of grace that the Most High may continue to bless your exertions for the welfare of the human race, and that it may be among the designs of Divine Providence, to allow you to labour in England, until Intemperance shall be banished from the land.

"(Signed on behalf of the Society)

"J. MEREDITH."

"Founder of the original society,"

Father MATHREW, in reply, expressed his warm gratitude to those who drew up and presented that address; but begged respectfully to state that he wished the Total Abstinence Societies would not take the distinctive titles of Catholic or Protestant. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) Who ever heard of a Yorkshire Catholic or Protestant Agricultural Association? In Cork there were forty Total Abstinence societies, which were named after their various localities.

The gentleman who presented the address stated that it had been drawn up in its present shape in order to show that Protestants, as well as Catholics, were warmly engaged in the Total Abstinence cause. However, in obedience to the wish of Father Mathew, he would, in the name of his brethren, expunge the word "Protestant." (Cheers.)

The Rev. Mr. RUSSELL, a minister in the neighbourhood, said he was not a Tee-totaler, but he could not help expressing his admiration of the liberal sentiments of the great Apostle of Temperance.

Mr. HART, of the Temperance Hotel (who conjointly with Mr. Teare, Mr. Duff, Mr. Keiley and others, have been actively engaged in facilitating, during the past week, the labors of Father Mathew), next addressed the meeting, and animadverted in very severe terms upon the conduct of Mr. Orme in attempting to drive through the procession on Monday; and also denounced as partial and incorrect the report of the transaction which appeared in the Times newspaper of the following day. Mr. Hart concluded by calling for three cheers for the police, in return for their valuable services on that day, and the preceding one. The call was immediately responded to.

Mr. EMANUEL LEMBERG, a German Jew, from

Breslau, was the next speaker. In the course of a brief, but very appropriate address, he stated, that he had knelt down to receive the pledge from Father Mathew, and had kissed his hand as a token of respect. (Cheers.) If he (Mr. Lemberg) had received an appointment from the King of Prussia, he would, according to etiquette, have to kneel and kiss his Majesty's hand. Why, then, should not he (Mr. Lemberg) show the same respect towards the illustrious individual who had conferred upon him a great blessing by enrolling him in the honourable ranks of Tee-totalism? (Loud cheers.)

Father MATHREW, after warmly shaking hands with Mr. Lemberg, presented that gentleman with a silver medal.

A gentleman connected with one of the morning papers took the pledge during the day, and was presented with a silver medal by Father Mathew. Mr. Teare then procured three cheers for the London Press. Eloquent addresses were delivered by Dr. Mingaye Syder and Mr. Clewer. About 2,500 persons took the pledge.

On Wednesday morning, Father Mathew, after celebrating mass at the convent at Hammersmith, proceeded in the company of the Rev. John Moore, the Rev. Mr. Cotter, Mr. Teare, &c., to the Catholic Orphan Asylum, Lamb's-buildings, Bunhill-row, in order to administer the pledge to the boys and girls of the establishment. The visit was intended to be partly a private one, but the news soon transpired, and when the carriage in which he was seated drew up to the door of the building, a crowd of persons pressed forward to see him. On alighting, he kindly gratified the eager wishes of all by shaking hands with them. He was received at the hall door by Mr. A. W. Harrison, the general secretary of the Associated Catholic Charities, by Mr. Leek, the hon. sec. of the Moorfields school, by Mr. Youns, of Ludgate-hill, and by other ladies and gentlemen. The boys, who were ranged around the playground, were neat in dress and orderly in demeanour. As soon as the very rev. father made his appearance in the yard he was greeted with three hearty cheers by the boys, who soon afterwards knelt down to receive the pledge. The Apostle, after stating that he did not administer the pledge to children without the consent of their parents, but that he was convinced that the excellent superintendents of the school had obtained such consent, delivered a short exhortation to the children, impressing upon them the necessity of faithfully adhering to their pledge during the remainder of their lives. He then said aloud the words of the pledge, which were repeated by about eighty or ninety boys, to every one of whom he gave medals and cards gratuitously. He next administered the pledge to about twenty female scholars, to all of whom he ordered cards and medals to be given gratuitously. It may be here remarked that the number of medals distributed gratis by the benevolent gentleman to soldiers, sailors, policemen, railway guards, and school boys or girls is very considerable, and—without taking into consideration the many silver medals which he presents to the distinguished advocates of Total Abstinence who assist him in his labours—is a very great drain indeed upon his slender resources. It must be stated also, that all the expenses of hiring rooms for administering the pledge, and carriages for processions; of erecting platform, engaging placard-bearers, &c., are defrayed by him. After leaving the school, the very rev. gentleman, in order to have a slight and brief relaxation from his almost incessant and strenuous labours, proceeded in the company of several friends to the Chinese Exhibition, to view which he had been most courteously and respectfully invited by the spirited proprietor, who before he left presented him with an elegantly bound volume, containing descriptions and engravings of the articles exhibited. The Earl of Stanhope and family, and several other distinguished individuals, had assembled in the magnificent room to meet the illustrious visitor. From the Chinese Exhibition Father Mathew proceeded to Kennington Common, which he reached about two o'clock, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Moore, Cotter, &c. After a brief address, he administered the pledge to the first batch, about eighty, men, women, and children, amongst whom were a private in the Scots Fusiliers and a private in the Grenadier Guards.

Mr. M'KENNA, one of Father Mathew's secretaries, stated that the people of Ireland had now four millions of money in the bank, at 3½ per cent. interest.

Mr. CHOUT, from Sheffield, a member of the Society of Friends, vindicated Father Mathew from the silly charge that he would not give the pledge to any person who did not pay one shilling.

Mr. J. CONNER, a stone-sawyer, said that he had worked under the best masters, but had frequently been turned away on account of inebriety. The master masons had reduced the wages of their men, but he felt convinced that if his fellow-workmen would become Total Abstinents for twelve months, they would defeat their employers. He had been addicted to drink during twenty-four years, and had never during that time enjoyed a happy day. He had to thank J. Meredith, Esq., for being brought into the ranks of Teetotalism. (Cheers.)

Father MATHREW stated that it was not originally his intention to have attended there that day, but he had resolved last night to do so, as he saw numbers who were anxious to take the pledge from him. He was delighted to find so many children coming forward. (Hear, hear.) He did not substitute Total Abstinence for religion; neither did he expect that when a man became a Total Abstinenter he would become also a paragon of virtue. All he asked was, that Total Abstinents should be weighed in the balance with other men. When any Tee-totaller was brought into a court of justice, people exclaimed, "Oh, he is a Tee-totaller!" However, Tee totallers seldom appeared at the bar of justice; out of five millions of Irish Tee-totallers, not one had been convicted of any gross violation of the laws. (Cheers.) A circumstance had occurred on last Monday which had been made the subject of many comments. He deeply regretted the occurrence, but the individual who had been taken into custody was not a Tee-totaller. He had, however, taken the pledge yesterday—so good sometimes comes out of evil. ("Hear," and cheers.)

Mr. MESSER said he had at first joined a "Temperance" society, but soon found that he became more intemperate than before. He then became a Total Abstinenter, and then discovered that he had at last found out the right way to sobriety.

Mr. TEARE, in justly severe terms, denounced the gross impositions practised by some persons on the ground, who were selling spurious medals as those of Father Mathew. It was also, he said, a cruel imposition, because it sported with the feelings of the poor Tee-totallers, who wished to have the real medals as mementoes of their solemn pledge.

After an address from Mr. Gower, Mr. BAILEY stated that he had once made a dog drunk, and that ever afterwards the animal would make himself scarce whenever he saw a pint-pot. His (Mr. Bailey's) wife often told him, when he was in his drunken fits, that he was worse than John Godfrey's dog, for that animal only got drunk by compulsion. That observation made him (Mr. Bailey) reflect within himself, and finally to become a Tee-totaller. (Cheers.)

The Rev. Mr. FARMY (a Catholic clergyman, from Ireland), in the course of an eloquent address, stated that he had seen more drunkards in London during the three weeks that he had resided there than during the last three years in Ireland. The rev. gentleman strongly urged all present to take the pledge, and prayed that God would grant them grace to do so, and to persevere in it until the latest moment of their lives.

Mr. SILVERSIDES, a private in the Grenadier Guards, was the next speaker. He spoke with considerable fluency and ability, and concluded amidst loud cheers.

In one of the batches a drunken woman presented herself, but was at first refused by some of the assistants. The amiable Apostle and philanthropist, however, approached her with a look of pity, and after giving her the pledge, shook hands with the poor creature, bidding her be of good heart and remember her pledge, and stating that many had taken it when intoxicated, who had never become drunk again. The woman was deeply affected by the condescending manners and words of the rev. father, and shed tears in abundance. About 1,800 took the pledge during the day.

On Thursday, the indefatigable champion of Temperance visited Parson's Green, near Fulham, about four miles from London. Some opposition was manifested in the early part of the proceedings, and a sort of counter-meeting was got up by a brewer. Other attempts at disturbance were also made; the police, however, interfered, under the directions of Inspector Bicknell, who should have given his orders with less delay. Some ruffians also tried to deface or destroy the carriage in which the distinguished gentlemen had arrived. These insults were the first that Father Mathew (according to his own statement) ever witnessed during the whole of his life. His mission, however, to Parson's Green was completely successful, not less than 1,000 persons having taken the pledge at his hands. A great number of the most respectable and wealthy inhabitants of the vicinity were present, and were most courteous in their demeanour towards their celebrated visitor. The speakers during the day were Dr. Syder, J. Meredith, Esq., Messrs. Holden, J. M'Carthy, W. Green, Hart, Hall, J. A. Smith, O'Leary, and Teare. The rev. J. Moore, Kelly, Conway, and Hodson, and Brother Herbert were present during the day. Father Mathew left about half-past eight o'clock. He stated that he would attend on Friday and Saturday in the riding-school, Albany-street, Regent's Park, and on Sunday at Cumberland market, in the same locality.—Tablet, Aug. 12.

MISCELLANEA.

WEST INDIES.

Died, of yellow fever, on the 25th of May, after five days' illness, the Rev. John Malley, in Georgetown, county Demerara. This amiable young priest had been ordained by his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, and was the first ecclesiastic sent by the College of All Hallows, near Dublin, to the foreign missions. He was appointed curate to the Right Rev. Dr. Clancy, and chaplain to the convent, and after eleven weeks of pious and efficient service, expired in the apartments of the vicar apostolic, a martyr to religion and ecclesiastical discipline, notwithstanding the unremitting attention of two of the most eminent medical practitioners in the colony. In addition to the above calamity, the Rev. Wm. Yates, who acted, during the absence of the bishop, as vicar-general, died in New-Amsterdam, county of Barbice, after an illness of a few days, in the month of June, according to letters, just received by the packet of the 1st of July.

BELGIUM.

THE JESUITS COLLEGE AT NAMUR.—We noticed, last week, the sojourn of the King and Queen of the Belgians at Namur, where the royal pair were present at the opening of the railroad, and where their presence was greeted with so many signs of loyalty and festival. An incident of this period will be found in another part of this paper, and we have now to notice the royal visit to the college of the Society of Jesus.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Namur—College Notre Dame de la Paix, August 5, 1843.—Sir,—I send you by this night's post, last Tuesday's number of the Ami de l'Ordre, which contains a report of the visit with which their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians honoured this establishment the preceding day. You are perhaps, aware that this is one of the principle, indeed I believe I may say the principal college of the Jesuits in this country, and that in which most young Belgians of family are educated. An abstract of such parts of the report as you may be able to find room for in the TABLET, would, I have no doubt, tend in some degree to the promotion of good—especially the King's reply to the addresses. Such words from a monarch, and that monarch a Protestant—you will not, I am sure, consider unworthy of attention, or devoid of importance. The calm, earnest sincerity with which his Majesty delivered those sentiments added much to their impressiveness, I have been told that in the course of the morning, when he received the bishop and clergy of the diocese, his Majesty conversed for nearly an hour in the same strain.

After the King's reply, their Majesties walked round the hall, accompanied by the rector and some others of the Fathers, and attended by their suite, conversing most affably with many of the scholars. In going through the house, the Queen, whose exemplary piety is generally known, and whose every feature religion has impressed with meekness and benignity, was observed, on entering a domestic chapel where the blessed sacrament is reserved, to say to his Majesty, "It is for me to choose the time we remain here, you have chosen everywhere else;" and kneeling down for some minutes she edified everybody that saw her by the earnest and humble devotion she manifested. When their Majesties reached the church, the Domine Salvum fac Regem was chaunted, the Queen kneeling on the altar steps with her head reverently bowed down, while the King stood in a respectfully attitude on her left.

On the 31st July their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians visited the college of "Our Lady of Peace," directed by the Rev. Fathers of the Society of Jesus. On the previous evening, as soon as the intended visit of their Majesties to this establishment was officially made known, a movement of interest and curiosity were manifest in the town; towards noon the Apostolic Nuncio, the Count de Beaufort, the Baron d'Hoogvorst, and about twenty no less distinguished persons, assembled in the saloon prepared for the reception of royalty. The inner court of the college was tastefully decorated. Laurels and orange trees, banners and national flags, escutcheons, &c., relieved expressively the beautiful regularity of the buildings. The interior of the saloons was carefully fitted up. The two theatres, or halls of study, with the hall of recreation, were thrown into one immense apartment, of which the upper or dais extremity was occupied by a throne-royal, from which the eye rested on a statue (at the opposite extremity) of "Our Lady of Peace." In the intervals were many inscriptions, in various languages—Greek, Latin, French, Flemish, German, Spanish, Italian, and English (according to the tongues natural or acquired of the students). At two o'clock all the pupils assembled in the outer court, with a band of music. A detachment of the guard of honour announced the arrival of their Majesties. When they appeared the cries of enthusiasm drowned the voice of the music. The royal pair were accompanied by the Ministers of Public Works and of Justice, by the Count d'Aerschot, &c. Having taken their places surrounded by their brilliant cortège, and by some 250 pupils, their Majesties were addressed by the rev. father, the rector of the college, in a very brief and most expressive speech, and he was followed by a student in rhetoric, M. Celestin Martini, of Brussels, in a complimentary oration; a compliment in German, by the young Anatole d'Aerschot, and one in English by the young Leopold de Beaufort, were recited with remarkable propriety of accent (which the king noticed), and Messrs. Florimond de Namur d'Elzee and Victor Vaudensteen presented to the King and Queen, with the accustomed ceremonial, two copies of the "Souvenir Academiques du College de La Paix." Then the King, who was listened to with a religious silence, delivered, in grave and solemn accents, which excited a lively emotion in all who heard him, the following words:—

"Gentlemen—I am delighted to find myself among you. I am well aware that your studies are wisely and well directed. Labour sedulously; youth has much need of good principles; nothing is more important, especially in these days in which we live, when men labour hard in the propagation of the evil principle among our youth, and strive emulously to excite their evil passions. There is now going on in all society a struggle between good and evil doctrines. We should strive—yes, gentlemen, we should fight zealously against this spirit of disorder, which tends to the overthrow of states. If it be not opposed now in its spring we shall have to dread the days of storm that threaten. If, on the contrary, we overcome the evil spirit, a happy fortune smiles on Belgium. Belgium occupies a position in Europe so beautiful—so happy! and on herself only does it depend to preserve and render it still more felicitous. Preserving the good principle she will be respected, deserving of respect; and, gentlemen (added his Majesty, turning to the professors), what chiefly charms me in your establishments is the truly national education that you give to youth. Continue thus to train up the young in the way they should go, continue your labours in this spirit, and they will be the support of the country."

At length their Majesties, having visited all the establishment, and left the alumni in an enthusiasm very difficult to describe, returned by the college chapel, where the students chaunted in chorus the Domine Salvum fac.

The same paper gives a brief account of the visit of their Majesties to the Penitentiary, where they were addressed by M. de Hauregard, President of the Confraternity of Consolation, and the King drew attention to the influence of religion on the penitents in solitary confinement. At the inauguration of the Iron Railway, which was the principal end of these fêtes and visitations, the cathedral of St. Aubain was filled to suffocation; the bishop celebrated the mass at the high altar, and it was said that there was not one in that immense crowd that was not edified by the touching piety of the virtuous Queen.

The bishop and clergy were received by the King and Queen on Monday, the 31st July, and the King, in reply to an affecting address from the bishop, said that his conviction had always been that religion is the only true basis on which the social system should be founded, and that he had never ceased to proclaim that truth. That there is nothing more promotes the love of order, and obedience to the law, than the teaching of the clergy. He complimented the bishop on the character of the people in his diocese, and said it was in some measure due to his personal influence among them, and to the love his clergy bore him.

THE CHILDREN OF CHINA.—A final meeting took place, on Friday evening, at St. Gudule, in Brussels, under the auspices of M. Fordis Janson, the Bishop of Nancy, for the definitive establishment of the "Œuvre de la Sainte Enfance"—the saving and civilizing of the doomed children of China: many ladies were present. The venerable prelate, in a familiar and very lengthened discourse, explained the unpromising commencement and initiatory difficulties of a work of piety, to which a vast extension appears now to be secured. He felicitated himself on the ready co-operation of the Belgic bishops and clergy, on the devotion of the ladies of Brussels to the Lord's work, on the zeal which the "little folks" and the Christian schools had exhibited to prosper a work of civilization inspired by charity, by the true spirit of the Gospel. It was already established at Louvain, at Hal, at Ostend, at Tournay, and other towns as well as in the country. "Belgium (said the prelate) possesses all that is akin to goodness. She is distinguished above all lands for her eagerness to assist in the maintenance of every enterprise that can be useful to religion and humanity." Every motive that could act upon the heart of man was in turn invoked by the eloquent bishop—the blessings of heaven, the prosperity of religion, the future good of society. He read a letter, admirable for its simplicity, on the subject of the "Holy Infancy," written by a child of eight years old to its uncle, now in China. It was previously known that twice a month a mass is celebrated in all the principal seats of Christianity for the co-operators in this good work. The prelate stated that he had prevailed on the central council to establish with a similar intention, a mass at the Church of Notre Dame of Hal. Persons interested in the work will meet hereafter to organize the association on a stable basis. There is no question that its success will respond to the desire of the venerable prelate to whom the world owes the original plan of the institution of the "Holy Infancy," and who spares neither pains nor labour to propagate it in all parts of the Christian world.—Journal de Bruxelles.

RELIGIOUS REJOICINGS—At Plasencia, in Estremadura, on the 13th ult., was concluded the Novena of the glorious St. Anthony of Padua, celebrated in the parishes of St. Stephen, the proto-martyr, and of St. Peter, Chief of the Apostles. On the 23rd commenced the Novena of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, in the Monastery of the discalced Carmelites; and during its performance the bells of St. Stephen rung out for another solemn observance, founded by an individual. The solemnity of Corpus Christi was observed in the cathedral with all possible magnificence. The people however, murmured because the processions were not so splendid as in the old days, when the Church had her own wealth in her own hands. The junta of Santiago, in Galicia, abolished at once the horrible order of the Ayauccho Government, which made it necessary for a priest, who desired to walk beyond certain limits, or to pay a visit beyond the fixed bounds of his residence, to apply for a passport to the political chief! Such was the care taken of the Church in Espartero's days.—Tablet.

MANGNALL'S HISTORICAL QUESTIONS.

The appeal of St. Columbanus to the Apostolic See, and the testimony that illustrious Saint gives of the hereditary reverence and obedience of the Church of Ireland to the chair of Peter, satisfactorily prove, that the doctrine of the Supremacy of the Roman Pontiff was unanimously received, not only by the Irish but also by the Gallican Church in the sixth century. For, from the very fact of St. Columbanus appealing to the Pope, to interpose his authority and order the French Bishops to extend to him the indulgence he required, it is obvious, that it must have been notorious to Columbanus and his disciples, that the Gallican Prelates, equally with himself, recognised the superior prerogatives of the tribunal, to which a reference was made by him. To appeal to an incompetent unacknowledged tribunal would only provoke still more the hostility of his adversaries, and instead of serving, on the contrary, greatly prejudice his cause.

The history of the English Church in the seventh century supplies among other instances one remarkable illustration of the truth of what we have stated, namely, that the doctrine of the Roman Pontiff's Supremacy was then inculcated throughout Christendom, as a truth of ancient Apostolic origin, derived from the commission conferred to St. Peter by the founder of the Christian Church.

The kingdom of Northumbria owed the conversion of its inhabitants to the zeal of Aidan, an Irish Monk, who had gone thither from the monastery founded by St. Columba at the Isle of Hy. With the knowledge of the Gospel, the Northumbrians received also the peculiar usage which their Apostle observed, in the computation of the time, at which the Easter solemnity should be celebrated. This usage differed somewhat from that followed by the Abbot Wilfrid, who, at the period now referred to, was the preceptor of Alchfred, the heir to the sceptre of Northumbria. In order to correct the discrepancy thus occasioned in the determination of the precise day on which Easter should be celebrated, Oswin the reigning monarch of Northumbria ordered a conference to be held on the subject at issue, in the Monastery of Whitby.

On the appointed day (A. D. 664) Colman, a Monk of the Irish Monastery at Hy, and the Abbot Wilfrid appeared before the King, in order to vindicate their respective usages. The King, in person, opened the conference by remarking, that, united together as they all were in the service of the same God, and expecting as they did, hereafter, the enjoyment of the same Heaven, they ought to follow the same observances. When the King had ceased to speak, Colman arose and explained the reasons, which induced him to adhere to the system of determining the Easter festival which he had embraced. To these, Wilfrid opposed the practice of Rome, “where Peter and Paul taught the doctrine of the Gospel, and sealed their testimony with their blood.”.... That wisdom, continued Wilfrid deserves to be contemned, which would prefer the opinion of a few, confined to a corner of the earth, however illustrious these might be for sanctity, to the practice of the universal Church. “Could,” he asked, “Columba (the founder of Hy) be preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, to whom the Lord had said: “Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it, and I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of Heaven.” Here the king interrupted Wilfrid, and demanded of Colman, if the Lord had spoken thus to Peter.

Oswin admitted that he had. "You are then," continued the king, "both agreed, that this has been said principally to Peter, and that the Lord has given to him the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven." Undoubtedly, was the universal reply. "Then, I tell you," concluded Oswin, "that this is the Gate-keeper whom I will not contradict, lest on my arrival at the gate of the Kingdom of Heaven, there should be no one to open it for me, as he who holds the keys would be against me." The cause of Wilfrid was pronounced victorious, and the controversy thus finally determined. To examine the accuracy of Wilfrid's reasoning would be of no moment in the present inquiry. For, it belongs to us only, to establish the fact, that the early pastors of the English and Irish Churches admitted unanimously the supremacy of St. Peter's chair. Of that fact, the narrative now recited supplies convincing evidence.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.—The total amount of the sums collected and accounted for to the Treasurer of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, from the 30th September 1842, to the 29th October 1843, is Rupees 1413, or in English Money, one hundred and forty-one pounds six shillings.

CONVERSION.—Within the last few days two Protestants in the Bengal Vicariate embraced the Catholic Faith. The child of one of the Converts being lately in danger of death received private baptism, the other three children are now under instruction, preparing to receive the Holy Sacrament of Regeneration.

CHITTAGONG.

It gives us great pleasure to announce that through the zealous exertions of the Rev. Mr. Barbe of Chittagong; and of the good Catholics under his pastoral care, a new Chapel has been erected at Noakhalee. The Christians of that district have through their respected Pastor earnestly besought the Archbishop V. A. B. to send a Priest to remain permanently among them. The Archbishop in reply has promised to do all in his power to meet their pious views, as soon as possible.

ORPHANAGE AND SCHOOLS AT CHITTAGONG.

The splendid donation of seven hundred Rupees has been given by Mr. Courjon of Tipperah to the above mentioned excellent Institutions. Rev. Mr. Barbe states that the School roll contains now the names of eighty Boys and twenty three Girls, nine of whom are supported in the Orphanage.

PERSECUTION OF SLANDER—EDINBURGH REVIEW: BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.

The almost universal existence even among professedly liberal and in other respects well informed Protestants of a strong under-current of hostile feeling to the Catholic religion, is a fact which cannot have escaped the notice of even the least observant of Catholics. The Protestant may defer to the superior knowledge and judgment of his Catholic friend in all other matters, but in that of religion he deems himself as much his superior as light is to darkness. He unhesitatingly reprobates the religion of the great majority of the Christian world, as a tissue of impious falsehood and gross superstition, although he actually knows nothing of it beyond what he has gathered from the overflowing prejudices of others. But so confident is he in the truth of his own opinions on the subject that he would consider enquiry as an act of supererogation.

This will however cease to excite surprise when we reflect that from the nursery onwards through the whole course of his education, the most revolting notions of Catholicism have been assiduously impressed upon the Protestant's mind. The stock of prejudice thus early laid is preserved and augmented by the current literature of the age, which is, with hardly an exception, bitterly and insidiously Anti-Catholic. To ensure an extensive sale for their works, authors find it necessary to write up to the prevalent prejudices and these prejudices are perpetuated by such writings. Thus cause and effect mutually act and react upon each other.

On this subject we beg to lay before our readers the following extracts from an article in the Dublin Review entitled "Persecution of Slander.—Edinburgh Review: Borrow's Bible in Spain."

"The form of persecution is altered,—the spirit remains the same. Those who heretofore would have used the dagger, or the knife of the assassin, employ now only the tongue, or the pen of the calumniator; and instead of murdering bodies, exhaust their energies in assassinating reputation. Calumny has been substituted for murder, and the faction which has so long rioted in Irish [Catholic] blood, consoles its virulent and malignant passion, by indulging in ever varying, never-dying falsehood, and truculent slander."

Never did the illustrious writer of this paragraph utter a more incontestable truth. The war of slander against the Catholic Church has not, it is true, begun in latter times : it has existed from the beginning. In the days of our fathers, it was backed by persecution—that is, persecution of the body : in ours, shame and fear, but principally fear, have stayed the arm of persecution ; and they in whom the old sanguinary spirit still resides, are unwilling to avow, or unable to gratify their propensity. The demon of slander having thus lost the protection of her old ally, has strengthened her hands the more, and, being thrown upon her own resources, has become crafty in proportion as she has been left unaided, and has assumed a garb she was not hitherto accustomed to wear, because she did not require it.

It is time, it is more than time, that something should be done to arouse the attention of the Catholic public to the pestilent state of our literature, in all its departments, especially as regards Catholicity in Ireland. Anti-Catholic views are circulated every where around us, not always, as of old, in their own naked, palpable shapes, which men could see with their eyes, and shudder at, and fly from ; no longer bearing their proper titles legibly upon them. Their dress is changed, but nothing else. Like the devils that tempted St. Anthony, they assume a thousand different forms, the sublime, the beautiful, the ludicrous, the fairly proportioned, the distorted : their essence unchanged, the evil spirit in all. The press in London, in Dublin, in Edinburgh, every where, is teeming with publications of the class we allude to ; whose avowed object is to instruct, to amuse, and, not unfrequently, to “conciliate ;” but whose real, though disguised, object is to injure the Catholic priesthood and the doctrines and practices of the Catholic religion, by ridicule, by sarcasm, by an affectation of impartiality, by the ‘damning of faint praise,’ by a systematic use of the suppressio veri and the suggestio falsi. No place is too sacred for them to penetrate. Like the gods of paganism, there is no shape they will not assume to win worshippers. They are to be met with in the bookseller’s shop, in the circulating library, in the reading-room, and, alas ! too often in the “parlour windows” of respectable Catholic families ; in cheap monthly issues of popular works ; in the rich engraving, in the neatly executed woodcut ; in quarto, in duodecimo ; in thick volumes, and in thin pamphlets ; in embossed cloth, in purple morocco, in shining gold.

The evil has gone on increasing from year to year ; it has progressed with the advancing desire for information, or taste for mere literature, and the consequent increase in the circulation of books. Young students for the legal and medical professions, the sons of shopkeepers, and of respectable farmers, and of country gentlemen, tradesmen, young boys at seminaries and public schools ; all these (and how large the number comprised under so many denominations taken together !) all these are now in the habit of reading new productions, popular histories, biographies, tales, travels, magazines, reviews and the like. Facilities for gratifying, for glutting this general rage are enlarged. The multiplication of circulating libraries ; the new system now so popular, of publishing in monthly parts, at the price of a shilling each, or less, large and expensive works, which would be sure to deter many a purchaser, if offered only at the price of the entire made up in volumes ; the equally popular system of publishing “people’s editions ;” these and other causes, which it is needless to enumerate, have contributed to make books of every kind, especially worthless and bad books, as easily to be procured as the Catholic Pasty or Think well on’t. Whoever has a shilling to spare may purchase a reprint of Hall’s Libel upon Maynooth College,* or a number of the new edition of Carleton’s libels on the Irish priesthood and people, under the softer title of Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry, with its beastly slanders, and its pictured caricatures, representing the persons and things most revered by the Irish people so as to provoke the laughter of the scoffer and the infidel, but to kindle the indignation of any man who has a single spark of Irish feeling—of Catholic Irish (quis separabit?) feeling in his bosom. We are quite sure that such books have not yet effected any general mischief in Ireland, —thanks to the burning and unconquerable devotion of her children to the faith of their fathers, and their own heroic priesthood. But that these books are beginning to be very widely circulated among the classes above mentioned, and that they have wrought some evil, and injured the moral and religious feeling of some, we know for certain, both from our own personal observation, and from the most competent testimony.”

* Reprinted from “Ireland, its Scenery, Character, &c.” by Mr. and Mrs. C. Hall ; an interesting and most insidious, and, therefore, most dangerous work to which we mean soon to direct our readers’ attention, perhaps in our next number. As a sample of the objectionable parts, we may here mention that, in one of the notes subjoined to the account of Maynooth College, there are no less than five gross and calumnious falsehoods, in matters of plain fact, in the short space of four lines ! In another note, on the same subject, there are three still grosser and more calumnious falsehoods, in matters of notorious fact, in the space of three lines ! Truly this is the age of reckless slander.

ARRIVAL OF PROFESSORS FOR THE COLLEGES OF ST. XAVIER AND SEAL.

The Bentnck Steamer, which arrived on Thursday last, has, we are happy to announce, brought out the seven gentlemen from Stonyhurst College mentioned in our issue of the 21st October, namely, the Rev. Messrs R. Baby and C. Havers, Messrs. G. and H. Thompson, Jos. and John Bond and Jos. Brady. We have now to congratulate the Professors of St. Xavier's and Seal's Colleges, on the relief they will in some measure experience, by the present reinforcement, from the incessant labor and anxiety they must have been subjected to, during some months past.

DR. BACKHAUS.—We accidentally omitted to announce in our last, the departure of the Rev. Dr. Backhaus for Europe, on the Steamer Hindoostan. We doubt not but that the temporary loss of the services of the Reverend gentleman, will be fully compensated by his well known zeal in procuring willing co-operators in the cause of religion here.

MONTH'S MIND.

THE LATE VERY REV. MR. MORÉ.

On Tuesday the 28th Inst, at 7 o'clock, a solemn Requiem will be performed in St. Thomas' Church for the repose of the soul of the Rector of St. Xavier's College. The Orchestra will be led by Mr. P. Delmar—Mr. Linton will preside at the organ. Among the vocalists and performers are Mrs. Valadares and Mrs. Howe, Mr. Valadares, Signor Apparutti, Signor Agnios, Mr. Howe and besides several amateurs whose powers are well known in Calcutta. A select portion of the band of H. M. 10th will be in attendance. The handsome manner in which the musical force of Calcutta has gratuitously come forward to honor the memory of the Rev. H. Moré is equally creditable to themselves and gratifying to his friends, who will not easily forget their kindness.

AFFABILITY.

Affability is not often considered in a moral point of view: it is generally regarded as one of the lesser social perfections, which are the result of a good education, illustrious descent, or intercourse with the fashionable world. It is of a noble stock, and does not often show itself in the houses of those who have grown great beyond their deserts; it is not frequently found in the learned, who love seclusion, and never crosses the threshold of the foolish and presuming.

Affability is not gentleness; but, like the perfumed earth of oriental poetry, it preserves some of its odour, because it dwells nigh to its abode: when united with beneficence, it renders benefits sweet to the eye as a ripe fruit plucked with its blossom yet in bloom.

There are some functionaries of so singular a character, that they might be thought to be avaricious of hate: they are as rough to handle as the bark of the cork tree; and their repulsive and intimidating address drives away the poor man, embarrasses the suitor, and terrifies the stranger. The words of these unamiable beings do not descend like dew-drops on the soul. An irrepressible sentiment of alarm seizes on us when we approach such men, and we seldom quit them without a feeling of indignation. I can never forget the affecting reply of a poor woman to one of these officials, who, although not destitute of compassion for the miserable, was affable only by caprice. She advanced with timid step to meet him, and regarded him steadfastly, to see if his countenance indicated a favorable mood of mind: hunger was visible in her pale and emaciated figure. "What do you want?" said the man of office, with his accustomed abruptness. She stopped, hung down her head, and then advancing a few steps, said to him with tears in her eyes, and an inexpressible sadness of countenance—"Sir, your salutation drives me back; but my indigence impels me on." An alms obtained in such circumstances resembles a wild rose, which cannot be plucked without wounding the hand by the thorns that surround it. The relief it affords is sooner forgotten than the pain and humiliation at which it was purchased. Every act of liberality which is done with a sour countenance, insulting language, and rough manners, is a fruitful seed of ingratitude. Instead of a friend, such favours procure enemies; and those who confer them, may be adored in appearance, but are hated in reality.

If good offices must necessarily be accompanied by sweet and courteous manners, it is needless to say that refusals should be doubly so. In such cases, affability assumes a nobler attitude, and puts on the appearance of humanity. It is impossible for a man in power to grant all the favours that are sought at his hands; but if he cannot confer the kindness that is expected, he may, at least, render his refusal palatable, by touching with honey the cup of worm-wood which he offers to the disappointed expectant.

La Bruyère makes affability the touch-stone of true greatness: "False greatness," says he, "is repulsive and inaccessible, as it is conscious of its weakness, it conceals itself, or at least appears only as much as is necessary to show that it is real. Modesty. True greatness is free, mild, familiar and affable. It stoops to its inferiors through natural goodness, and regains its wonted dignity without effort: its noble and easy character invites respect, and confidence, and causes greatness to appear really such, without reminding us of our inferiority."

Affability with the great is sometimes only a refinement of pride, devised for the purpose of keeping inferiors at a distance; it is a barrier of polished steel which forbids all familiarity, and which does not suppose either virtue, or mildness, or benevolence,—all which are necessary elements of the quality of which we are treating. A man of the world may conceal under the most courteous manners, duplicity of heart, baseness of soul, and the extreme of moral degradation. Such affability is like japan on an earthen vessel; it is the offspring of mere politeness, and has no connexion whatever with morality.

Affability naturally flows from the heart, it is the most captivating expression of goodness. It renders greatness accessible, eloquence persuasive, piety amiable, and charity consoling. Virtue, accompanied by affability, is charming by its gracefulness; and devotion, when robed in its vesture, is beautiful as the broad and tranquil deep.

MISSION OF SIAM.

Extract from a Letter of a Missionary Apostolic of Siam.

Bangkok, April, 16, 1841.

"I should have desired, according to my custom, to write to you at the beginning of the year; but I was prevented from doing so in consequence of a journey I had to make, and of which I am going to give you a brief description.

"On the day after the Epiphany I gave up the cure of my flock to a zealous colleague, Mr. Vermet, and I embarked for Khon-jak, which is situated at three or four days' journey from Bangkok, my usual residence. In the middle of the narrow boat there was constructed a small covering of leaves to guard me against the sun during the day and the dew of the night. The roof was scarcely two feet and a half high; so that from morning till evening I was obliged to remain lying, or to sit as the sailors do. I was accompanied by two rowers and a child of thirteen years of age.

"As the king does not allow us to leave Bangkok, and as two years before I had been refused a passport to go to Jonquailan, I set out this time without permission, and in the evening, at ten o'clock, I passed in sight of a post of the customs, whence they shouted to us, Khaman? that is, Who goes there? Thanks to the privilege of paying no tax, that our neophytes enjoy, because they are almost all soldiers, physicians, or interpreters, in the service of the prince, one of the rowers cried out, Ray farang. It is a bark of Christians, and we were allowed to pass on.

Although during the half of the voyage no hesitation is to be met with, and sailing in so frail a boat exposed us to many dangers, as well from the crocodiles that infest the river, as from the wild elephants that cover the neighbouring plains and come down every night to the banks of the river, we nevertheless, arrived without any accident.

My first visit was to the governor: I offered him some tea-cups, a bottle of eau-de-Cologne, and a pair of scissors—singular presents for such a personage! He appeared, however, satisfied with them, and received me with distinction, inviting me to sit upon a wooden bed, whilst he himself had no other seat than the floor. After having frankly declared to him what was the object of my journey, I withdrew to announce without delay the Gospel to the inhabitants of the country. I went every day into four or five houses, and when I had assembled around me a certain number of auditors, attracted for the most part by curiosity, I announced to them the good news for an hour together. Early in the morning I used to quit my boat to attend to my ministry, and I did not return until the evening, when I came back suffering from excessive thirst; for those poor people having no tea to offer me, I preferred to pass the entire day without drinking, to exposing myself to take the fever by quenching my thirst with cool water.

More than once I challenged the Talapoins to public conferences: I even went to meet them in their pagodas, and offered to discuss with them the articles and proofs of our faith; but they declined all controversy, under the pretext that they were without education, and that I should have too great an advantage over their ignorance. There was even one of them, the oracle of the province, who admitted the truth of all I preached; he acknowledged that I had the argument against the Talapoins, against their idols, and their absurd reveries; in a word, he confessed before every one that there is but one God and but one true religion. The strict consequences that I drew from these admissions appeared to him equally just. Alas! this was all I obtained from him. When I pressed him to yield to his convictions, and to pass from the admiration of Christianity to the practice of the duties that it imposes, I found him even more obstinate than his colleagues. I have since learned that vices of his own attached him to the altars of his gods.

In the neighbourhood of Khonajok there were encamped about three thousand Laocians, whom I had reason to think were better disposed than the Siamese to embrace the gospel. I went amongst them, and I was immediately surrounded by an immense crowd of auditors, who paid the greatest attention to my words. Encouraged by this beginning, I expressed a desire to confer with the priests of the country; and I was instantly conducted to a pagoda. What a temple, and what an auditor! for a minister of Jesus Christ! I had before my eyes three monstrous idols, beside me more twenty-five to thirty Talapoins and the most important of the people, impatient to hear the doctrine that I had come to announce. This sight gave me courage. I preached for two hours without being interrupted, except by the applause of the multitude, by the questions addressed to me upon several points, somewhat difficult to be understood. When I had finished speaking, a number of voices cried out, 'What is this baptism that purifies our souls? Give us this grace that we may go to heaven! And must we, said the Talapoins, quit our pagodas to be baptised?'—'Undoubtedly; this is the price of your salvation.'—'Well, we will leave them; only remain some time with us to instruct us.'—I willingly consent, provided that the great mandarin allows me.'—'Yes, yes, he will permit you; all the people desire it.'

I went, in consequence, to the mandarin, to whom I presented some trifles by way of gifts. He willingly acquiesced in the desire of the Laocians, and authorised me to continue, as long as I might wish, my sojourn amongst them. 'Hereafter,' he added, 'I shall have a dwelling built for you; but at present it cannot be done, because the labours of the fields are not yet finished.' During the eight days that I passed at Khonajok, our prayers were copied with great emulation. 'Let us make haste to learn them,' said my disciples to each other, 'that we may the sooner receive the great grace of baptism.'

My journey lasted only a month. The people were so engaged with the cultivation of their fields, that I had to adjourn to a more favourable time the project of instructing them in the principles of the faith. I hear it said now that the Laocians call loudly for me. In order the better to ascertain their dispositions, I have just sent my catechist amongst them: if he brings me back an assurance of the truth of what I have heard, I shall immediately set out again for Khonajok, notwithstanding the rainy season.

I attach the more value to the conversion of this interesting tribe, as their frank and generous character would be a guarantee of their perseverance. I have under my eyes a remarkable instance of the attachment of the neophytes of Laos to the faith which they have received with baptism. Some time since it was announced to me that a converted prince from Laos was at Bangkok. I invited him to come to see me, and was very much edified by his conversation: he knew perfectly well the prayers that the missionaries teach their disciples, and he repeats them without fail every day. His history is shortly as follows:—This young prince, twenty years of age, and brother of the king of Muang-Lo (to the north of Tong-King), was travelling with a grand suite of about a hundred elephants, and five or six hundred guards. Whilst he was paying a visit to the king, Muang-Luang-Pho-Bang, his relative, the Siamese surprised them, plundered the country, and carried the princes into captivity, each loaded with five chains. When our young Laocian was presented to the king of Sam, his Majesty ordered his chains to be taken off, consoled him for his misfortunes, gave him gold and silver cloth to dress himself in, and confided him to the care of an old mandarin, with directions to rear him as his adopted son. At first he was allowed to go out but little. During nearly three years he abstained from eating meat, lest he might eat it without his knowledge on fast days. At length he met a young Christian girl, who had a crucifix suspended from her neck; he made inquiries of her, and discovered that he had at Bangkok brethren in Jesus Christ; he had himself converted to our Annamite priests, and since that time he frequents our churches with much devotion. — Annals of the Propagation of the Faith.

VICARIATE-APOSTOLIC OF LEO-TONG AND OF MANCHOURA.

Letter of DR. VEROLLES, Bishop of Colombia, and Vicar-Apostolic of Manchoura, to Rev. M. LANGLOIS, P. P., Argences.

Sy-Ouan, in Mongolia, March 12, 1841.

"My very dear Friend,

"I have already answered the letters you wrote to me in 1839. I was then in Su-Tchuen, engaged with the preparations for my departure; I am now in Tartary, and shall give you some details on my new position.*

"I quitted my ancient post in the beginning of last September. The rains and inundations, which were excessive last year, had destroyed all the roads, and we had to take long circuits, and sometimes to stop several days in the same place; the journey was, in consequence, very long. In China every thing is done slowly.

"At length, on the 29th of October, I arrived at the house of his lordship the Vicar-Apostolic of Chansi. He resides at fifteen leagues' distance from the capital, Tay-yuen-Fou, and almost on the high-road. This good old man, who is more than seventy years of age, received me with a truly paternal cordiality. His age, and infirmities disable him from walking: this painful situation is, however, glorious for him, because, on his entering China, about the year 1800 I believe, he was recognised in the province of Canton, and thrown into confinement; the dampness of the prison paralysed his limbs. He is of the order of St. Francis, as is, likewise, his coadjutor.†

"On the 8th of November I received episcopal consecration; the holy oil flowed upon my head! 'Receive the Holy Ghost' was said to me, and I found myself associated to the order of pontiffs of the new alliance. I was then invested with the insignia of my new dignity: a precious ring was placed on my finger; a mitre, rich with jewels, circled my brow; and, with the pastoral staff in my hand, I was made to bless the people. What do you say, my dear friend—what would my mother have said, if she found me there? Would she have recognised her son—her poor Emanuel? Would she not think she was dreaming? Yes, indeed; I myself thought it was a dream. 'Alas!' said I, when I prostrated myself on the floor of the temple, at the foot of the holy altar upon which I was to consummate my sacrifice, 'humble priest, return to the earth whence thou hast come, rather than consent to new honours!' But God has willed it: a refusal, on my part, would cause to fall at once this new Vicariate, which a thousand obstacles seemed prepared to destroy. My dear friend, pray for me—for your old curate, whose first steps in the pastoral ministry you have directed—that it may never happen with me to repeat with the prophet, 'You have raised me up in your anger and indignation, only to cast me down from a greater height!' But what consoles me is, that, having become a bishop, I am always poor, and now poorer than ever. From henceforward I shall have to wander often over vast deserts, more frozen than the deserts of Muscovy, and to lodge in caverns, without any other food than oat-flour steeped in hot water.

"Three days after my consecration I quitted our worthy Italians; I hired a wretched Chinese calash, and I set out for Tartary. I had still four hundred leagues of a journey to make. Having arrived at the frontiers of the great empire, I stopped for some days at Huen-hoa-Fou, amongst the Christians, who gave me an affectionate welcome. The cold was growing excessive; already we could pass over frozen rivers. I and my people had to wrap ourselves up in all kinds of furs.* My regulation-hat was a fox's skin, rolled into the shape of a turban, after the Tartar fashion; I had for my night-cap a rat's skin; for cravat, the skin of a huc-liau—(I don't know the name in your language); my sleeves were of other skins: the sheep, cats, and wolves contributed their share in my accoutrement. In China, they make dress of everything, without any consideration for human respect.

"The Christians of Tartary came to meet me; accompanied by them, I made my entry into my mission. I was mounted on a miserable horse, which, shortly after having passed the great wall of China, sank under me, and rolled upon my leg. It was in this manner that I took possession of my Vicariate—at the first step a fall. When I speak of that great wall, I mean only to speak of the place where it, perhaps, formerly stood; for I perceived no vestige of a wall within the horizon. In the places where it does exist those who have seen it acknowledge that it is but little above the ground. But enough of this subject, which is very unimportant; those wonders of China are only wonderful from afar.

"I shall not dwell on the countries I have traversed; the description would be as tiresome as they are monotonous. From the capital of Su-Tchuen to that of Chansi there are only mountains to be met with, more or less steep, but always bare and quite barren; formerly they were covered with extensive and fine forests. The Chinese, who only know how to devastate, have destroyed all. Beyond these mountains immense plains spread themselves, in which, here and there, are some fields of wheat and millet; and rocks which might be taken for great blocks of clay, they are so bare, interrupt, without embellishing, the sameness of the landscape. Besides, there are no hedges, few trees, and a great number of large villages, surrounded with walls. Although the population is immense here, I do not think it is so considerable as in Su-Tchuen. The inhabitants of this northern province are more rude and unfeeling than those of the south of China; but they are also less disposed to robbery, less quarrelsome, and less given to cheat.

"To-morrow I send back my Canton couriers, and I will pursue my journey towards Manchoura; I

* In 1839, the Holy See detached from the diocese of Pekin the province of China called Leao-Tong, as well as Manchoura and Mongolia, two provinces of Tartary, and formed of them two Vicariates-Apostolic; the one, composed of Leao-Tong and Manchoura, is confided to the congregation of the Foreign Missions; the other, which embraces all Mongolia, is under the care of the French Lazarists. The first Vicar-Apostolic of Leao-Tong is Dr. Verolles, previously missionary in Su-Tchuen. He was with him only one priest (Mr. Ferreol); who will assist him until he can enter Corea, where his destination calls him. Within a short time two other missionaries were to go from Macao to Manchoura.

† The Vicar-Apostolic is Dr. Salvetti, Bishop of Euria, and his Coadjutor is Dr. Alphonsus Donato, Bishop of Jaldia.

* "The cold of Tartary is extreme; the earth freezes to seven or eight feet deep, and the thermometer generally descends to 30 degrees below zero."—Extract of another letter from the same Bishop.

have to pass the Easter a hundred and forty leagues to the North of Sy-Ouan. The following information on the country which I have still to travel over has been supplied to me by Father Ferreol, this intrepid missionary, whom the church of Corea will soon number amongst its apostles:

"In crossing Mongolia, we travelled sometimes for whole days without meeting a single habitation. The uncultivated mountains and plains are covered with herds of oxen, horses, and dromedaries. In these regions I could figure to myself the idea of what is called a wandering people. The Mongul, in general, does not cultivate the earth; he feeds his flocks, eats their flesh, and dresses himself with their skin and fleece; he sets up his tent in the place where he finds the pasture abundant, and when it is consumed he encamps elsewhere. We entered one day into one of their tents to take refreshment; it was of a circular form, and terminated in a dome. All around was ranged the family furniture, the oven of the kitchen in the middle; under our feet were skins covered with their fur; and, at the entrance, a large heap of cow and horse-dung, which is the only fuel that the inhabitant of the desert has to cook his food. We seated ourselves on the floor, around the domestic hearth; our hosts served us with tea and mare's milk, and, after having lighted our pipes at the fire, we set off. What a country for a European traveller! In place of high-roads, there are numberless paths, which are able to lead astray the most practised; more than once my guides have mistaken them. Rivers are often met with; but no boat, no bridges. If you have to pass them, take off your clothes, or else mount your beast, if you have one; and if the water be too deep, wait until it sinks, or that it freezes during winter. We were obliged to pass the same river more than thirty times; one of my guides was twice carried away, together with his mules, into the middle of a muddy water; my baggage was completely soaked. When the passage was most dangerous, two men held my horse by the bridle; the current used to carry us all with it. The most favourable time for travelling here is the winter: then every thing is frozen; in summer it is only mud and water."

"These obstacles obliged me to make long circuits; I shall take the way through the desert, as the surest, although the longest. When shall I be in the midst of my five thousand Christians of Leao-Tong? Alas! they have not, for the most part, been visited for the last five years. I hasten to fly to their aid. But I am alone!... I shall immediately devote myself to the studying of the Manchou-Tartar language, for I must preach the Gospel in the centre and north of my Vicariate, which do not contain a single Christian. From Kalmonkia to the frozen rivers of Soungari, more than seven hundred leagues, the good news of salvation has not as yet been announced. What a heart-rending thought for whoever has zeal for the salvation of souls!

"My dear friend, you ask my benediction for your flock. In giving it to you a few words of edification would not be ill-placed. What, then, shall I say to my old friends the worthy inhabitants of Argences? Would they be inquisitive to the sound of a well-known voice, that cries out to them from the other end of the world, Save yourselves!—time is nothing; eternity is all!

"And you, my venerable and dear friend, pray for me and for my desolate mission."

"Yours, in J. C."

"+ EMMANUEL, Vicar-Apostolic of Eastern Tartary."

We have before us another letter from Dr. Verrolles, addressed to his mother; it bears nearly the same date, and mentions the same facts. "On the 9th of June," writes the new Vicar-Apostolic, "I had quitted my mountains of Thibet. I had at length to tear myself from this pleasing solitude, and to leave my dear pupils. They and I could only weep: the separation was to last for ever."

Those dear pupils of Dr. Verrolles are young levites, whom he was preparing for the priesthood. Mr. Delamare, Missionary-Apostolic, who visited them in 1839, has given a description full of interest of the country they inhabit.

"I am in the college for a month back," he wrote to one of his colleagues: "this establishment is situated out of the territory of the Celestial Empire upon the high mountains of Lower Thibet. To come here from Su-Tchuen one has to pass over several chains of mountains, both lofty and steep. To the extraordinary elevation of the soil must be attributed the coolness of the climate, although placed in a latitude so near to the equator. The grape does not ripen here; the cultivation of rice would be labour lost: the products are generally maize, buckwheat, wheat, barley, oats, rye, and colza. In the month of May our hills are covered with excellent strawberries. In the finest days the clouds seldom rise above the tops of the mountains. The rain in summer and the snow in winter are most abundant."

"When I came into this country, in the month of December, it appeared to me as if I entered a new world. A mild temperature existed on the plain; according as I ascended, the cold became more sharp; the ways were impassable without the assistance of frostnails on the shoes; and I imagined I was crossing the famous Mount St. Bernard. The illusion is very allowable: we were proceeding by a path of ice, extremely steep, bordered by precipices, which the foliage of the trees, covered with snow, concealed from our sight. We took three hours to go from the foot of the mountain to the top, and during all this time we did not find a single habitation. On the other side we met a panther; it might have been unfortunate for us, for we were without defence against its claws and teeth. It happily retired into the forest, and we pursued our way. I at length arrived, not at the monastery of the generous hospitaliers of the Alps, but at our little college of Mo-Pin, where I received the most cordial welcome from our excellent colleague, the dear Mr. Verrolles."

"These mountains are covered with immense forests, which supply Su-Tchuen with timber. They are also inhabited by all kinds of wild animals: the buffaloes feed in flocks; the monkeys, squirrels, and lynxes are the most numerous; the fox is also to be found, but less common, as likewise the stag, pheasant, every species of pig, the musk-deer, resembling a young stag without horns; its skin is prettily spotted, like that of a tiger; the panther, that comes to carry off the dogs from our poultry yards; the bear, still more dreaded, that ravages the maize plantations of the poor natives; many a mountaineer knows by experience the weight of the paw of this terrible neighbour. The country abounds in mines of gold and silver, which the avaricious Chinese explore with profit: I have procured some samples of the ore, which I forward to you for the amateurs and learned in Europe.

"The prince who reigns here is an absolute master: but although he does not depend on the emperor like the king of Corea,* the proximity of his states and the small extent of his power expose him to many a humiliation from the mandarins, the pest of human nature in our half civilized countries. It is, however, only by tolerance that the Chinese are suffered in Thibet: they may be colonists, but not proprietors; and if our petty king was not obliged to sacrifice his interest and wishes to fear, he would long since have cleared his states from these troublesome visitors.

"As for the natives, they are neither given to fraud nor covetous, proud, and vain, like the Chinese, who, however, despise them as barbarians. They have a national language, which is rendered difficult by as many dialects as there are valleys. Every one here knows that there are Europeans in the college; we make no secret of our presence, for the Thibetians like us, and the pagan Chinese do not think about us at all. There could be nothing to fear, except in the case of persecution; under such circumstances the mandarins would, perhaps, knowing our residence, then demand the surrender of our missionaries; but we have reason to hope, that being apprised beforehand by the native chiefs, who are devoted to us, we should have the time to betake ourselves to the mountains; and defeat all pursuit. Why do we not count as many Christians as we do friends amongst this poor people! They know our religion very well; they acknowledge even that it is the true one; yet different considerations retain them in their idolatry. If the prince was converted, the whole nation would throw itself into the arms of the Church."—Ibid.

HISTORY OF THE BRITISH DOMINATION IN IRELAND.

We publish the first of a series of articles, by a correspondent upon a subject of great present interest. They profess to contain an impartial examination of the history of British domination in Ireland. We publish them as curious for their historical research, and in the course of their publication shall perhaps take occasion to comment upon them:—

On the State of Ireland, its Causes and probable Consequences

"It is an old saying that:—'The pride of France, the perfidy of England and the war in Ireland will be without an end,' that saying, in what refers to Ireland, will ever remain true, unless God teaches men some remedy hitherto unknown."

The above words are to be found in the second volume of State papers recently published in England under the superintendence of a government committee, and which papers relate to the reign of Henry VIII. He who wrote these words had been charged to make a report to the King on the state of Ireland, and to propose plans of reform with the view of securing the peaceable domination of England over that country. It is obvious that even at that time he saw no chance or means of coming to the wished for result, and since that period three centuries have elapsed without giving to the English power in Ireland more of real strength and security.

It is not that the remedy cannot be found. Far from this; but England will not find it, or rather cannot make use of it without shaking to the very basis the whole social, religious and political organization, from which, according to Sir James Graham (1), depends all the future preponderance of England amongst nations. That impossibility, which government pretends to exist, of rendering to Ireland that justice which she claims as a prescriptive right, is precisely what gives to the actual question a character of peculiar gravity, and brings it on a level with the most considerable and important events which will mark the middle of this century. Such a question however is not one that a few months can settle. Under several different forms it has been moved and agitated for some hundred years, and perhaps will for a long period remain still undecided. It may be therefore attentively studied, from its origin, through all its numerous phrases without much chance that a sudden termination of the existing state of things will deprive that study of its actual and present interest.

The origin of British domination in Ireland is not the least curious and singular circumstance in its eventful history: Catholic Ireland, upon which Anglican Protestantism has weighed so heavily and so long, and whence so many efforts were made in conformity with the atrocious maxim of James I., to eradicate papistry, was forsaken and marked as a prey to the ambition of English kings by a pope! At the time when Roman Pontiffs could still dispose of nations and of crowns, in 1156, Henry II, son of Geoffry Plantagenet, desired to signalize his accession to the crown of England by a master-stroke of policy calculated to show him in as bright a light as had appeared his maternal great-grandfather, William the Norman. He thought of conquering Ireland; but before he would begin hostilities, he sent a deputation to Rome in order to obtain from the Pope the consecration of his aggressive project.

The pontifical throne happened to be then occupied by an Englishman of obscure origin, Adrian IV. (2) He had at an early age of life left his native place and sought fortune first of all in France, afterwards in Italy, where in a short space of time he was made successively Abbot, Bishop, and at last became the Head of Christianity! Adrian welcomed Henry's message, and gave him power to invade Ireland by a Bull wherein the following words occur:

"Granting to thy laudable and pious design the favour it deserves, we have and hold for agreeable that in order to enlarge the limits of the Holy Church, to propagate religion, to amend morals and implant virtue, thou shouldst enter that island and therein execute, according to thy prudence, all that thou mayest think proper to do for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

"May the people of that country receive and honour thee as their lord and master, saving the right of Churches which should ever be maintained untouched, as also the annual rent of the penny (3) due by every house to the beatified Saint Peter.

The bishops of Ireland came to meet the invaders, applying the following verse of the Gospel to the bearer of the Papal Bull: "Blessed be he who comes in the name of Lord!" They did more indeed, for they handed to the conqueror letters signed and sealed in the form of an authentic character by which they all declared having "constituted of their own will and assent, as King and Lord of Ireland, the glorious Henry the son of the empress, and his heirs for ever." And as the people of Ireland, thus transferred in the mass to a new Lord upon an order from Rome, would not submit to it, Adrian's successors fulminated against them Bulls of excommunication!

It was in this manner that English domination was introduced into Ireland. Is not such a beginning one of the most curious anomalies of history, when we think of the frightful persecutions that afterwards pressed upon the people, whose principal guilt in the eyes of England is their attachment to the Roman faith? Might it not be said to be an act of providential justice that England, put in possession of Ireland through Catholicism, should incessantly be threatened with loss of her conquest for having lost sight of the conditions on which it was granted? For Adrian added in this Bull, "Shouldst thou therefore execute what thou hast conceived, be it thy peculiar care to teach that people good morals and habits; that the church in that country be adorned through thy exertions with a new lustre; that the true religion of Christ be there progressing; in a word that every thing connected with the glory of God and the salvation of souls be, through thy prudence, ordered in such manner as thou mayest become worthy of obtaining in heaven eternal recompence, and upon this earth an illustrious and glorious name in all ages."

Henry II. accepted the conditions imposed upon him; but how were they fulfilled?—Davies (4) writes as follows:

"A few weeks after Henry's invasion, the whole country of Ireland was divided into Cantons and shared between ten Englishmen by birth; and notwithstanding they had not been put in possession of even one third of the Island, they however were declared, by right, proprietors and lords of the whole, in such manner that nothing was left to the indigenous people."

This first act of the English was characteristic. They had hardly touched the soil of Ireland when its people are declared unworthy and incapable of possessing that soil: what is still worse they were proclaimed enemies to England and therefore it was lawful to kill them. The last quoted historian has it so in so many words.

At a later period, in special charters Henry conceded the right of property to FIVE FAMILIES of his country, and thence the following expression so frequently met with in judicial documents of that period; "none of the five blood," nemo de quinque sanguinibus. Every body not belonging to those five families, to "five bloods," was outlawed; all and any violence or outrage against him was by law unpunishable.

Such were the beginnings of that power which to this day finds itself so much perplexed in governing possessions obtained in so questionable a manner.

The sequel is worthy such a commencement and shall be set forth hereafter.—Calcutta Star.

Article II.

The history of English Domination in Ireland may be divided into five periods. The first, from 1172 to 1612, comprehending the divers phases of the invasion and conquest which could not be achieved in less than four hundred years.

The second, from 1612 to 1692, or down to the treaty of Limerick.

The third, from 1692 to 1778, to the time when the emancipation of the British North American colonies alarmed the despotism of England, and brought some alleviation to the effects of its most atrocious regime, by means of concessions dropped unwillingly from a trembling and reluctant hand.

The fourth, from 1778 to 1800, or to the abolition of the last shadow of legislative independence, and to the forced fusion of Irish Nationality into the unity of Anglican supremacy.

The fifth, from 1800 to our own days, up to that position of affairs against which the now existing commotions in Ireland are raised and directed.

These five periods must be rapidly analyzed as it is important the reader should completely conceive, through the diversity of times and passions, that immutable intention of oppression which never ceased to animate the English nation against Ireland.

The study of history shows often enough that hazard or violence, more often than sympathies, than natural tendencies of affinities, have caused the association of certain people or nations; but at no time, in no country, was ever this monstrous anomaly so manifest as in the case of the union between England and Ireland. Physically the two countries are separated by the narrow channel of St. George only; but morally there is betwixt them a wider depth than that of Ocean itself. They have always most heartily detested each other. England seems to have had no other policy respecting Ireland than to abuse its victim, either violently or with subtle refinements, to persecute without cause under the slightest pretence, for the mere sake of persecuting, as if it had sprung on her part from one of those laws of fatality which humanity bends under without the possibility of resisting them.

On its side, Ireland, guided by an instinct of hostility prevailing over all other sentiments, has constantly taken a part in the cause most injurious to England. Ireland is perhaps so fervently Catholic now for no other reason than that England stands out the most active and zealous champion of the reformed Church. During the intestine wars, the Irish colours were those against which marched England: even the banner of the Stuarts, of those kings who, when in power, had been so cruel and violent against Ireland, was adopted by its armies, when those princes resolved to subdue England having revolted against their authority.

This deep rooted antipathy can alone account for a struggle that has survived all cotemporary events as well as resisted all the attempts of bringing it to amend; it alone can account for the animosity that the English at large still entertain against the Irish; and it cannot be denied that a vote for an efficient and armed repression of what now takes place in Ireland would meet with popular approbation.

Sir R. Peel, the indispensable man of the Tory party, the head and heart of the British government, will sink perhaps for not having yielded to the popular motions we allude to; his relative moderation is qualified treason by a great number of his friends, and some newspapers that two months ago idolized him, now put his name in the pillory of public opinion. Indeed at all times, the most celebrated statesmen in England have been those who proved to be most hostile and relentless against Ireland. To oppress Ireland mercilessly mercy has often been one of the means of government, or an extenuating circumstance in the eyes of parliament having to try certain princes or ministers.

The above reflections will now be elucidated by authentic documents. It will escape no reader that our quotations are and will be from the less to be suspected authorities, from writers or public men some of whom were most sincerely devoted to the persecuting power.

1st period (1172—1612.)

The long period we have to examine was but a long series of murders, pillage, destruction, famines purposely occasioned. Morrison, a protestant, describes the epoch in a few lamentable words: "One of the most frequent occurrences is to find in the ditch of cities, specially where the country had been recently ravaged, numbers of poor Irish having died on the spot, their mouth still green from the nettle and other grass they have browsed to satiate their hunger."

The legislative acts of those times elucidate more strongly the resolved policy of extermination followed by England.

No legal marriage (1) could take place between English and Irish persons. Under Edward IV. count Desmond, one of the highest Anglo-Norman barons, was sentenced to death for having married a woman of Irish blood.

Union, the same union as in our days the English wish to maintain by all possible means, was then forbidden with the greatest rigour.

The famous statute of Kilkenny (2) has for its direct and avowed object to prohibit any mingling of the English race with the Irish; and prejudice was then carried so far that Edward declared "incapable of being or of becoming proprietor in Ireland any Englishman born in that country." All the property such persons might have acquired was confiscated, and granted to Englishmen, new-settlers in Ireland.

Every Englishman having the misfortune of resembling an Irishman, by his external appearance or his costume, either from allowing his beard to grow over his upper lips, either from his wearing a dress of different colours, or making use of Irish words, was immediately dispossessed of his property and thrown into a prison. (3).

For an Englishman to have and keep an Irish nurse was a crime punished by law as severely as any recorded crime. (4.)

To purchase from or to sell to an Irishman any merchandises whatsoever, was declared a crime punished by confiscation; half of the property of the offender was granted to his denunciator, the other half belonging to the king. (5)

The murder or assassination of Irishman or woman (6) was authorized, far from being reckoned a crime. When such man or woman could not obtain to give bail or security from a faithful subject of good name and dressed in the English costume, the killing them was even a deserving action. "It shall be lawful (7) to have them (Irish) apprehended, killed, and their head cut off, without it being allowed to the king himself, our lord, his heirs, his officers, ministers or any one, to prevent it,"—and moreover:

"It will be lawful for the bearer of such head or heads, and for those who will have assisted him in the deed, to levy a tax, which they will collect themselves, of two pence over every man possessing in full some arable land in the neighbourhood, of one penny over any man possessing the half only of some portion of arable land, and of half a penny over any man holding a house or portion of land of the value of forty shillings."

Surely this is indeed carrying the spirit of persecution to its greatest extent: the king delegating a part of the sovereign power, that of levying taxes, to whomever would or might commit a murder!!!

From the above specimen of English legislation (respecting Ireland), one may judge of what morals, actions, habits, could have been, at a time when barbarism prevailed to such a degree in the written law.

The following document of the middle of the 14th century (8) sums up the state of public spirit in Ireland at the period (9).

"To John, pope, Donald O'Neyl, king of Ulster, also the inferior kings of this territory, and the whole population of Irish blood (10).

"Most holy Father,

"We address you with some true and sincere details upon the state of our nation and the injustice which we suffer and which our ancestors have suffered from the part of the kings of England, from their agents and the English barons born in Ireland (11); after having expelled us violently out of our commodious houses, our fields, our paternal abodes, after having compelled us, that we might keep our lives safe, to run to the mountains, to the marshes, the woods or to caverns into the rocks, they still pursue us incessantly in those miserable refuges, in order to appropriate to themselves the whole of our country, (12) Thence between them and us an implacable enmity has arisen, and it is one of your predecessors who has put us in this deplorable predicament (13). They had promised to that Pope they would show to the people of Ireland example of good morals, and to grant us good laws while they have annihilated all the written laws which for so long had been our rule (14), indeed they have left us without laws or, in the view of our complete ruin, they have promulgated some detestable ones, the following to wit (15).

"It is a rule in the courts of justice, such as they have established in Ireland by the kings of England that every man who is not an Irish by birth can prosecute an Irishman for any cause whatsoever; but the same right is denied to Irishmen, be they clerks or laymen. Should an Englishman commit a murder, and this is too often the case, upon the body of an Irishman, in this latter one of the clergy or of the laity, the murderer is not to suffer any bodily punishment for his crime, nay even sentence to any fine. On the contrary, the more the murdered enjoyed consideration amongst us, the more his murderer is honoured for the crime he has committed, recompensed by those of his party, even by men in religion and by bishops (16). No Irishman at his death-bed can dispose of his property, and the English take possession of it (17.) Every religious order established in Ireland is precluded to admit amongst them men of Irish origin (18).

"The Englishmen who have for many years resided amongst us, and which are called men of mixed blood, are not less cruel than the others (19).

"Sometimes they invite to their table men of the first rank in our nation, and treacherously they put them to death in the middle of a repast or while they are asleep (20). It was thus that Thomas of Clare having culled in his house Brian the Ruddy of Thomond, his brother-in-law put him to death by surprise, although they had received the sacrament together from with the same host consecrated specially for themselves and divided into two parts (21). Such crimes seem to them to be honourable and worthy of praise, and it is the belief of all laymen amongst them, and of most of their priests, that it is not a greater sin to kill an Irishman than to kill a dog (22). Their monks pretended that after having killed a man of our nation, and this is too often the case, they will not for such a deed consider themselves obliged to abstain from celebrating the mass, even for one day (23). In proof of this, the religious of the order of Cîteaux, established at Grandard, in the diocese of Armagh, and those of the same order who reside at Ynes in Ulster, daily attack with open arms, wound and kill Irishmen and still continue celebrating the holy mass (24). Frater Simón, of the order of the minors, a relation of the bishop of Coventry, has publicly preached that there is no guilt whatever in killing or robbing an Irishman (25). In a word all Englishmen assert that it is lawful for them to deprive us, if they can, of our land and property, and that their conscience should not be troubled for such deeds even at their last moments (26).

"Such grievances, added to the difference of language and habits, that exists betwixt them and us, render it impossible that we may expect to ever enjoy peace or truce in this life, so great on their part is the eagerness of domination, so strong on our part is the legitimate and natural desire to free ourselves from an intolerable servitude, and to recover the heritage of our ancestors (27).

"We nourish in the bottom of our hearts against our enemies an inveterate hatred; caused by our long sufferings, by the murder of our fathers, of our brothers, of our relations, and which hatred shall have no end either in our age or in that of our sons. (28). Therefore, without regret or remorse, we will fight against them in defence of our rights, and will not cease fighting and doing them harm till the day that, for want of power, they will have ceased to be harmful to us, and when the Supreme Judge will have drawn vengeance of their crimes, which one day or other must happen. And so we hope most fervently (29). Till then we will fight to death to recover our independence, which is our natural right, compelled as we are besides to do so by necessity itself and preferring to encounter peril like brave-hearted men than to languish amidst injuries of all sorts," (30).

This oath of war even to death (31), made more than four hundred years ago, is not forgotten yet, and the hour when these divisions will be put an end to belongs to a time to come which it is somewhat impossible to foretell. Notwithstanding the intermixture of races and the transactions of all sorts brought about by the succession of ages, the hatred against the English government subsists as a native passion, in the heart of the Irish population. Ever since the day of the invasion, that race of men have wished for what their conquerors would not, detested what they liked, liked what they detested. This untameable pertinacity in opinion, this power of preserving through centuries of misery the recollection of an old long lost liberty, of not despaning of an ever-defeated cause, is perhaps unique in history, and one of the greatest examples a nation ever gave.

And yet even the abominable acts we have cited have been aggravated. This we will expose hereafter.—Calcutta Star.

FATHER MATHEW IN LONDON.

Father Mathew made his appearance on Friday, the 11th inst., as previously announced, in Hall's Riding Academy, Albany-street, and addressed the numerous assembly from the gallery. During the day he was visited by Sir A. Capell de Broke, Bart., Count de Lisle, the Hon. Mr. Browne (brother of the Earl of Kenmare), Captain Mathew, &c. &c. The two last-named are relatives of the very rev. gentleman. The Rev. Mr. Doyle, of Chatham, was also present, and was successful in eliciting a promise, from the Rev. Father that he would visit his (Mr. Doyle's) locality as soon as possible. In the course of one of his addresses, Father Mathew complained in a gentle manner of the Times' reports of his meetings, which put into his mouth words and sentences which he never used. He had been made to say, that Total Abstinence was not recommended as an evangelical virtue, by the members of the church to which he belonged. Now he always considered it to be an evangelical virtue, but not a scriptural precept. He quite coincided with the opinion expressed by the Bishop of Dromore, that Temperance was a gospel command, that perfection was also inculcated by the gospel, and that Total Abstinence was the perfection of Temperance. He had been made to say also, that he had received communications from Sir R. Peel and Sir J. Graham; but his statement was that some friends of his had received letters from those distinguished individuals expressing their approbation of his (Father Mathew's) labours. Something also had been said in the Times about superstition. Now, he (Father Mathew) did not ask any one to kneel down to receive the pledge, who objected to that posture; it was done by some persons through reverence for the name of God, which was invoked, but not through any superstitious motive. In another brief address, the very rev. gentleman said that a correspondent of another morning paper had asked who Father Mathew was, and had answered the question by stating that he was a Popish friar. Now, the ancestors of the writer of the paragraph, if English, were not so squeamish, for they received the light of Christianity from a Popish friar. (Cheers.) The writer also perhaps boasted of his Protestantism; now, his forefather also received his Protestant doctrine from a certain Popish friar named Martin Luther. (Great cheering.) Why, then, should any one refuse to receive the boon of Temperance from the hands of another Popish friar? (Prolonged applause.) When one admired a beautiful picture or piece of sculpture, he did not ask what kind of a brush or chisel had been employed. (Hear.) The meeting was addressed by J. S. Buckingham, Esq., the Rev. Mr. J. Burns, Mr. Treare, Mr. C. Harry, Mr. Hart, Dr. Hicks, Mr. McCarthy, Mr. Briscoe, the Rev. J. Moore, and numerous other speakers. The following address was presented by a youth named Power, one of the pupils of the Catholic School, Marylebone, under the direction of Mr. Tracey.

TO THE GREAT APOSTLE OF TEMPERANCE, THE “VERY REV. THEOBALD MATHEW.

“VERY REV. FATHER.—We, the pupils of the Marylebone Total Abstinence School, most humbly beg leave to hail your presence with unfeigned joy, and most unaffected pleasure and delight, trusting you will accept of our humble address with the same good feeling as if it came from the pen of a Homer or a Newton; but no pen could truly describe the warm sentiments of our hearts to you, rev. father.

“You are, very rev. father, welcome to our shores—yes, rev. father, a thousand times welcome to this great metropolis; and we do most earnestly pray that your heavenly mission will have the desired effect. We are in hopes that your presence will bring to the homes of our parents, peace, comfort, happiness, and content.

“And we do most earnestly pray that the great God of Heaven will bless and assist you in your great, glorious, and heavenly mission.

“JOHN POWER.”

“To the Apostle of Temperance, &c. &c.”

The reader of the address was presented with a silver medal by Father Mathew, who promised to visit the school.

On last Saturday the very reverend gentleman was again at his post in Albany-street. In the course of his introductory address he denied that he reaped any profit from the sale of Temperance medals: on the contrary, he had exhausted all his own pecuniary resources. Indeed, he should be obliged to write to his relations at home for money. It was true that he need not apply to them unless he wished to do so, for numbers of his Teetotal friends had offered him large sums of money, and the Society of Friends alone would raise for him, if he required it, the sum of 50,000*l*. (Loud cheers.)

After one or two batches had come forward to take the pledge, 180 boys belonging to the St. Patrick's School, Tudor-place, Tottenham Court-road, knelt down and repeated the words in English and Irish. One of their number then read the following address to Father Mathew:—

“TO THE VERY REV. THEOBALD MATHEW.

“VERY REVEREND AND MOST VENERABLE FATHER—We, the boys of St. Patrick's School, who have the great and inestimable happiness of being under the care of the Christian Brothers, beg to offer you our young and ardent congratulations on your arrival amongst us. Looking upon you as the great regenerator of our common country, we cannot but hail with gratitude and delight that kindness of disposition and goodness of heart which induced you to cross the seas in order to bring to us the blessing and regeneration of our common country. To you, next to God, Very Reverend and Venerable Father, our dear and beloved country is indebted for the high moral position which it now occupies among the nations of the earth. Superior to many, and inferior to none, it may boldly challenge the most enlightened country of Europe to produce another instance of such devoted zeal in the cause of virtue and morality, which the Irish nation at this moment exhibits, under the auspicious banner of good Father Mathew.

“We humbly pray God that your labours amongst us may be crowned with success; that we and our fathers may not be found unworthy of our affinity to that people whom you, Very Reverend Sir, have raised to so high a moral elevation among the nations of the earth; we feel it an honor and a most sincere pleasure to join our young corps to the vast multitude who look to you as their guide and father, and beg you to believe that amongst the millions who love and venerate you, none do so more than the boys of St. Patrick's.

"In conclusion, Very Reverend and Most Venerable Father, we again tender you our gratitude and our love."

"May the benediction of Heaven crown your labours with success—entire and complete success—and this within your own days; that thus you may have the happiness of seeing, as the fruit of your toils, our lovely island, after centuries of oppression, risen in moral greatness, as majestic as her hills, as impregnable as her shores, and her learning and public virtue ascendant among the nations of the earth!"

"With sentiments of the most profound respect, we remain, Very Reverend and Venerable Father, your sincerely devoted, BOYS OF ST. PATRICK'S SCHOOL."

Father MATHEW returned thanks, in affectionate terms. After the Catholic female scholars of the Warwick-street District had taken the pledge, Mr. J. W. Green presented the following address to Father Mathew from the Metropolitan Total Abstinence Association, signed by Mr J. S. Buckingham, President:—

"TO THE VERY REVEREND THEOBALD MATHEW.

"REVEREND SIR,—We, the officers and committee of the Metropolitan Total Abstinence Association, desire most cordially to welcome you to our metropolis, and to acknowledge the obligation under which you have laid us, by consenting, for a period, to absent yourself from the accustomed field of your labours.

"We unite in ascriptions of grateful praise to Divine Providence, who has made you the honoured instrument of abundant good to your own country. To you, Reverend Sir, it has been given to check in its progress the master vice which had long been the prolific source of physical, moral, and social misery of thousands in Ireland; and to you has been granted, also, the rich reward of witnessing the rapid progress of a principle and practice by which thousands have already been improved in condition and character, and which bids fair, under the continued blessing of Almighty God, to raise Ireland to a state of moral greatness and prosperity such as she has not enjoyed for ages.

"We rejoice, Reverend Sir, to know, that however eminently successful your warfare has been, you have employed no 'carnal weapon,' no merely human policy. We have seen you disclaiming alike the aids of political partizanship, and of sectarian zeal. On your spotless banner has been portrayed the Cross, the sacred emblem of peace and salvation. Your motto has been the song of the cherubim legions who proclaimed the advent of the Prince of Peace, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men.' Your weapons have been sound truth, calm persuasion, and Christian charity. Thus, Reverend Sir, you have 'put to silence the ignorance of foolish men;' you have secured the suffrages of the wise and good; and your operations have proved 'mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds.'

"It is our confident hope, Reverend Sir, that your visit to our metropolis may be productive of the most beneficial results to our Irish brethren and to the population generally. We trust that it will increase the zeal, and concentrate the energies of those who are already members of our Society, to unite in the promotion of the great cause; and that it may, also, awaken the attention of others, and induce them to abandon habits by which they have but too long been enslaved and degraded.

"We conclude, Reverend Sir, this brief and imperfect expression of our feelings with sincere and earnest prayer, that your useful life may long be spared, that you may proceed with increasing success in your benevolent career—that you may enjoy to the latest moment the approbation of your Great Master, in whose favour is life—and that you may at length hear pronounced by Him in Heaven the unspeakably glorious commendation—'Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!' (Signed, in behalf of the committee.)

"J. S. BUCKINGHAM, President.

"M. B. HART, Treasurer.

"J. W. GREEN, Secretary."

Mr. GREEN stated that the address emanated from fifty Protestant societies in London.

Father MATHEW, in reply, said it was extremely gratifying to him to receive such a testimonial from so many Protestant societies. All his life he had avoided all manifestations of bigotry, and he was delighted to find such liberality in England as was manifested by the address just read. He had also learned with delight that the chief magistrate of London, the Lord Mayor, had approved of his (Father Mathew's) labours. The usual proceedings—speeches and batches of postulants—characterized the meeting during the day. About 30,000 persons visited the place during Friday and Saturday; and about 3,000 took the pledge. In the evening Father Mathew and a few friends were hospitably entertained at the residence of the Revs. J. B. and E. Hearne in Norton-street, Fitzroy-square.

The following Catholic clergymen have taken the pledge from Father Mathew: the Rev. Messrs. J. Hearne, J. B. Hearne, E. Hearne, J. Moore, Juvch, Coner, Kelly, and Hodgson.

The Rev John Moore, who is almost constantly by the side of Father Mathew, and whose labours in the cause of Temperance are highly successful, has had an interview with the Lord Mayor, in order to obtain the Guildhall for the great Apostle of Temperance. His Lordship kindly promised to interest himself in the cause.

On last Sunday, about one o'clock, the very rev. gentleman, who had celebrated mass and preached in the Catholic Chapel, Virginia-street, made his appearance in Cumberland-market, in one part of which a kind of hustings had been erected. The appearance on the platform of the large and splendid banner of the Somers-town Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association, called forth some disapprobation, on account, it is supposed, of having a portrait of St. Aloysius on the reverse, the other portraits on it of St. Patrick and Father Mathew not being deemed inappropriate. After some friendly and gentle, but useless remonstrance and explanation on the part of the worthy members of that thriving auxiliary, and after some few words in private (and, therefore, unwarrantably reported in one or two of the morning papers), between Father Mathew, and the Rev. J. Moore, the banner, at the request of the former was quietly removed—the members of the Somers-town auxiliary readily complying with the wishes of their illustrious leader.—Tablet.

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

PASTORAL ADDRESS.

TO THE CATHOLICS OF CALCUTTA AND ITS IMMEDIATE VICINITY,

PATRICK JOSEPH, By the grace of God and the favor of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, wishes Health and Benediction.

BELOVED BRETHREN IN JESUS CHRIST,

Our Pastoral solicitude for your spiritual welfare has long made us anxious to distribute Calcutta and its suburban vicinity into parishes or districts, of such an extent, as would enable the Clergy and faithful of each division, to discharge conveniently their respective religious obligations. Hitherto, various difficulties existed which, as they now begin to be partially removed, permit us to adopt in part an arrangement, that with the Divine blessing, we hope soon to see fully and satisfactorily completed.

We have been anxious for the proposed arrangement, because, it will connect more closely with their Pastors the Faithful of each parochial district, and assist, on the one hand, the Priest in knowing the number and the wants of that portion of the Flock, immediately entrusted to him, and, on the other, bring religion and its consolations within the reach, especially of the poor and the ignorant, that is, of those who stand most in need of the compassion and good offices of the sacred Ministry.

In effect, the want of such an arrangement, as that now described, in this immense City and its Suburbs, over both of which the Catholic population is dispersed in every direction, must occasion many, particularly when any dangerous epidemic prevails, to be deprived at the hour of death, of the benefit of the Sacraments, and of the other spiritual helps, which at that awful hour, the Church provides for the consolation of her children.

Moreover, not to mention other cases, where the Clergyman, to discharge his obligations properly, should inform himself satisfactorily of the character and family connections of parties, who have recourse to his Ministry: the important duty of administering the Sacrament of Matrimony makes it necessary, for the welfare of society and religion, that, before that irrevocable engagement be sanctioned by him, he should often feel it right to make many inquiries—a duty, which in the present state of things, can seldom be satisfactorily fulfilled, and which is always found to be attended with much trouble and inconvenience.

Besides, the daily increasing numbers of the Catholic Community, and the corresponding strength and stability thus given to the Church of Bengal, make it desirable, the according as circumstances permit, ecclesiastical arrangements should be introduced, which would prepare the way for the establishment of a regular Hierarchy, whenever the Holy See might sanction such a measure, in order thus to assimilate the Church of India to other Churches,—the Church of America, for example, and the still more recently founded Church of Australia. The Venerable Successor of St Peter has already, on many occasions, evinced his paternal solicitude for this portion of the Universal Church, and his eagerness to honor in a distinguished manner its people and its pastors. We cannot therefore doubt, Beloved Brethren, that, when, by our united exertions, Religion is placed here on such a footing, as to warrant the Sovereign Pontiff to establish among us a fixed Hierarchy, His Holiness will with joy, give us in this way also, new proof of his benevolence towards the Church, rendered so illustrious as that of the a is, by its two glorious founders, St. Thomas, and St. Francis Xavier.

We look forward with becoming solicitude the honor of the Church, with which Divine Providence has connected us in so sacred manner, to the period, when your children, beloved Brethren, through the exertions of the Clergy and Religious, who together with us war for their advancement in piety and learning, will show forth such happy evidences of their proficiency in both, as will convince the Father of the Faithful, that, from among them, may be chosen holy and enlightened Prelates and Pastors to govern the Church of India.

It is time, that the Church of India should produce such fruits as these, worthy of the word of the vineyard—Churches of more recent foundation than that of India, and destitute of many of the blessings, which we enjoy, have their sanctuaries already adorned with Pastors, the natives of the respective countries in which these Churches exist. This could stimulate you, Beloved Brethren, to procure, by your pious care of the little ones entrusted to you as Parents, an honor for your Church, like that, which other more recent Churches enjoy, and rescue Christianity here from being open to the reproach, that religion is obliged to seek in other countries for Pastors and Guardians, to watch over and protect from the indifference and tepidity of its own children, and the hostility of its adversaries.

To assist, as far as such a measure can do so, giving maturity to our ecclesiastical arrangements, and to assimilate them, as far as circumstances permit, to those of other Churches, we have, in virtue of the authority vested in us by the Holy See, ordained that, until it all seem good to ourselves or our successors arrange otherwise, the city of Calcutta and its vicinity shall be divided into four districts, specified in the annexed Schedule, the pastoral care of which and of the Churches appointed in them by us for the use of the faithful, until we shall ordain otherwise, we confide, in subordination to ourselves and successors, to the Reverend Clergy named also in the subjoined Schedule.

The faithful of these districts are therefore instructed, to have recourse to the Clergymen whose care the Church and district they belong to, are confided, for all the offices of Religion, but more especially for the administration of Baptism, the Paschal Communion, Matrimony, the last Sacraments, &c. We earnestly hope, that they will cordially co-operate with our solicitude, to provide as far as our power lies, for all their religious needs, and evince towards the Pastors placed over them, the reverence and affection, to which their zeal and piety so justly entitle them. We look forward anxiously to the period, and, we trust in God, that it is not distant, when we shall be able to assign to the faithful in Durrumtollah and the Bow-bazar, holy pastors, men full of the Spirit of God and mindful only of heavenly things. Until that happy period shall arrive, we charge the Clergy of our Cathedral with the pastoral care of the faithful of those districts, and we are confident, that, on this, as on every other occasion, the Clergy of our Cathedral will cheerfully co-operate with our paternal anxiety. The peace and blessing of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, Brethren. Amen.

Given at the Cathedral House, Calcutta, on the 29th day of November, 1843,

THE CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL AND DISTRICT

The Clergy of the Cathedral are charged for the present with the pastoral care of all the other parts of Calcutta and its suburbs not designated in the preceding schedule.

SCHEDULE of the Clergy, to whom under the chief Pastoral care of the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic, the above mentioned Churches and districts are confided—viz,

The Very Rev. the Superior of St. Xavier's College and the Priests of the Society of Jesus under his authority, are charged with the care of St Thomas' Church and district.

N. B. This arrangement is made provisionally until the sanction of the venerable Father General of the Society of Jesus be obtained.

The very Rev. The Superior of St. John's College and the Clergy who may be appointed to assist him are charged with the care of the Church, Burial Ground, and district of St. John's.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic during the absence of the Right Rev. Doctor Olliffe, assumes charge of the Church of St. Patrick's at Dum-Dum and of the district annexed to it.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic assisted by the Curates of the Cathedral takes charge of the Churches and districts in and about Calcutta not designated or assigned to other pastors in the premised Schedule.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic reserves to himself and Successors the right, saving always the authority of the Holy See, to decide definitively on any doubts or difficulties that may arise respecting the limits or bounds, fixed in the preceding Schedule for the districts or parishes of Calcutta and its vicinity.

The preceding Pastoral is to be read at the public or parochial Mass on the first Sunday of Advent, in the several public Churches named in the first Schedule, and the Schedules, which designate the Churches, Districts and Clergy of Calcutta and its vicinity are to be affixed to one of the doors of each of the aforesaid Churches.

By Order of the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal,

J. X. MASCARENHAS,
Secretary.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

INTALLY.

TO OPEN ON THE FIRST OF JANUARY, 1844.

THE VERY REV. DR. KENNEDY, Principal.

St. John's College is designed chiefly to educate youth for the sacred ministry, for the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal. The abundant benediction which it has pleased God to bestow on the mission of Bengal, the constantly increasing numbers of the Catholic community, and the necessity of establishing new missions in different parts of the Vicariate, all demand, that provision should be made here immediately, to educate candidates for the service of the sacred ministry, in order, to multiply the number of labourers in the Vineyard of the Lord, and to secure a succession of good Pastors for the Vicariate.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, although for a long time, deeply solicitous to secure for the Church of Bengal an advantage of such great moment for its permanent welfare, abstained from pressing the subject on the notice of his generous flock, from a feeling, that the demands made on them, for the Orphanage and other charitable purposes, were as much as their circumstances would allow them to meet.

The same feeling would still prevent him from calling their attention to the subject, if through a singular manifestation of the Divine Goodness, a House and Demesne had not been placed at his disposal, (which cost the late Proprietor the immense sum of about 100,000 Rupees,) for the establishment of a College. The conditions annexed to this foundation are such, as the Archbishop confidently hopes, can be complied with, so as to satisfy fully the wishes of the benevolent Founder, and, at the same time, secure for the Bengal Mission, an Institution, which, with the blessing of Heaven, will in a few years, send forth a holy and a learned Priesthood, qualified by their education and knowledge of the language and usages of the country, to be the Pastors of the faithful, and the Heralds of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

As the Funds under the administration of the Archbishop suffice to provide for the education and support of six students, it is intended, as soon as circumstances permit, to select candidates for these scholarships, by concursus, or according to merit to be ascertained by examination. For the present, young men who have wholly or nearly completed their classical studies in some of the approved Seminaries of Great Britain and Ireland will be chosen, in order to attain more expeditiously the object, for which the Seminary is established, and to give time to the Anglo Indian Youth who aspire to the Priesthood, to make such a proficiency in the English, Greek and Latin languages and Mathematics, as will qualify them to compete for the above mentioned Scholarships. Due notice will be given to candidates, of the subject-matter of the examination to be undergone by them. In accordance with Catholic discipline, testimonials of exemplary conduct and attention to the duties of religion, must be produced, before any candidate is admitted to examination.

Such benefactions as the faithful may bestow on the Institution, will be employed in purchasing a suitable Library, in furnishing a Hall with the apparatus required for the Study of Natural Philosophy, in erecting such additional buildings as may be found necessary, and finally, in founding free places for candidates for the sacred ministry, of distinguished piety and attainments.

In order to promote these important objects, and to assist in defraying the expenses of the Institution, arrangements have been made for educating in St. John's College twelve young gentlemen not designed for the clerical profession, at the monthly charge of thirty Rupees for each Boarder and of twenty-one for each day Boarder. The course of education will comprise the Greek and Latin Classics, French, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, &c. English Grammar, Geography, History, the use of the Globes, Logic, Mathematics Natural Philosophy, and the native languages generally in use. No pupils will be received under six or beyond fourteen years of age.

Payment to be made quarterly in advance, and a month when once entered upon to be charged for in full. No extra charge for pupils who remain during the vacation, and no allowance made for absence during that period. An extra charge will be made for Medicines and for the attendance of any other besides the appointed Physician of the Seminary. The monthly pension fixed for Boarders includes all charges, for washing, and for the use of books and table and bedroom furniture.

Reference for further information to be made to the Principal of the College.

A PIOUS REQUEST.

We give publicity to the following most edifying letter from a lady to his Grace the Archbishop, with the view of soliciting the clergy and the faithful of Bengal to unite charitably together in prayer for the attainment of the holy object which the pious writer has so cordially in view.

MY LORD ARCHBISHOP,—I know not how to apologise for intruding myself thus on your Lordship's precious time, and doing so, in the character of a beggar, that is of spiritual alms, but the fact is, that my husband and myself having determined on making a Novena in honor of the Immaculate Conception of our Blessed Lady, for the purpose of obtaining more especial assistance and grace to advance in virtue and holiness, and having written home to request our friends to assist us in every way that they can, having also written to good Dr. Fennelly at Madras, and Mgr. Bonnard at Pondichery, we cannot resist the desire of begging your Lordship to join us; and add your prayers to so many others for our spiritual welfare. I am astonished at my own boldness, but the deep sense I have of my infirmities, sloth, tepidity, &c. urges me on to implore the charitable supplications of all our friends to pray to God for us. We expect to be joined by many members of the convent of Trappists, Jesuits, Benedictines, of the perpetual adoration of another convent of Benedictines where I have a sister and a niece, of the Nuns, also, of another convent of Sepulchrine Nuns near London, and besides of numberless priests and pious people in England, and also in Ireland, where in two convents, there will be holy souls praying for us. Dr. Fennelly will use his influence with the good Nuns at Madras, and some other pious people to pray for us, and Monseigneur Bonnard at Pondichery. Dr. Fennelly has also had the great charity, to forward a few lines of supplication which I had the boldness to write, to the Hon'ble and Rev. Walter Clifford, entreating him and some few of the charitable Jesuits at Madras to join the Novena, to pray for two Catholics who were in great difficulties, not being able to obtain opportunities of frequenting the sacraments, &c. and if we obtain all these prayers, surely, God will take compassion on our weakness. I again entreat your Lordship to join us,—the Novena commences on the 30th inst. St. Andrew's day, and ends on the 8th December the Feast of the Immaculate Conception: the prayers are very short the "Memorare O piissima" of St. Bernard, and the collect of the third Sunday after Pentecost, "O Deus protector." We are now on the point of leaving—to proceed to—where my husband has been appointed—. There is a Catholic Church there, but it is served by a schismatical Goanese priest, with whom we cannot communicate in spiritual matters. We had no idea at the time of first undertaking this Novena that we should be ordered there, but now that such is to be the case, how much more necessary to us are these prayers, in which I beg your Lordship to join us and all the holy people in England and Ireland who will be praying at the same time. I once more crave pardon for my boldness, and remain,

Your Lordship's obedient servant,

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have been requested by His Grace the Archbishop to publish the following letter of acknowledgment from the Vicar Apostolic of the Cape of Good Hope, for the information of the contributors towards the erection of a Catholic Church in that town.

MY DEAR LORD, per Bentinck.

Yesterday the "Olivia" arrived and I received from Captain Roome your kind favour of 10th July, with a volume of the Bengal Catholic Herald, and an Order for 406 Rs. (£38, 18. 0.) towards the Building of our Church in this Town.

I know not how to express my thanks for the generous interest your Grace has taken in this poor Mission, and for the liberal contribution that followed thereupon. Though I have experienced the powers of my friend Captain Roome in begging money for our Church, yet I hail his success in the present instance as the consequence of the kind co-operation of your Grace.

To the other munificent contributors, I beg you will have the kindness to express my most grateful acknowledgments, and to assure them of my earnest prayers that they may have always the means so to assist the works of religion, charity and piety at home and abroad.

If your Grace think it necessary and prudent you will also oblige me by having inserted in the Bengal Catholic Herald this my acknowledgment of the receipt of the sum above-mentioned per Captain Roome, with my most fervent thanks. Contributions such as these will enable us to proceed slowly but securely, and without Debt, in a work which is exhausting our own little resources, aided only by the small sums we can allot to it, out of the grants of the "Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi," which are principally expended in the support of our other four Missions in this colony, and the charitable institutions attached to them. Without a decent Church however in Cape Town (and more than decent I cannot expect it to be), our Mission cannot be said to be firmly established here.

To the gentleman who with his subscription sent me a volume of the Herald, I feel deeply indebted. As I think it has your Grace's sanction, I wish to become an annual subscriber to the work. Some one, long ago, used kindly to send me a number, but I have never had one since it changed its name, till Captain Roome brought me the 25 numbers of this year.

Permit me now, my dear Lord, to congratulate you upon your new title of Archbishop and the promotion it involves, and I do so the more cheerfully as I believe both to be well merited. I hope the day is not far distant when your Archiepiscopal Title shall be derived from the See of Bengal instead of Edessa.

I hope to be able to send this letter by the new and gallant little band now here on their way to aid in your noble conquests for the Church. I grieve that the poverty of my circumstances has prevented me from seeing more of them than a transient glance could afford.

I am but slowly recovering from a relapse into the illness of which I complained in my last, so that your Grace will please to excuse this hasty scrawl, while I have the happiness to remain,

My very dear Lord, your Grace's
Most obliged and grateful
Brother in Christ
+ P. R. GRIFFITH.

Cape Town, Oct. 17, 1843. }

VICAR APOSTOLIC OF AGRA.

The Right Rev. Dr. J. A. Borghi, Bishop of Bethsaida and Vicar Apostolic of Agra and Hindoostan, arrived here in the afternoon of Friday the 24th ultimo, and immediately proceeded to the Cathedral, where he was received by his Grace the Archbishop and the Clergymen attached to the Cathedral. We rejoice to say his Lordship is in the enjoyment of good health. On the Sunday following the Bishop said a Pontifical Mass at the Cathedral, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. D'Mello and Storck and performed the Vespers at St. Thomas Church on the same evening. We understand that the Bishop has taken his passage on board the Bentinck Steamer for Suez en route to the "Eternal City."

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

On Sunday the 3d December, a Pontifical High Mass will be celebrated by the Right Rev. Bishop Borghi, at the usual hour, at the Cathedral, for the members of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. The Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy will preach on the occasion.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

On Sunday the 3d instant there will be High Mass at 8 o'clock. The Rev. R. Sumner will preach.

RECEPTION.—On Friday the 8th instant the solemnity of admitting two ladies to the reception of the religious habit will take place at 7 o'clock A. M. at St. Thomas' Church. The Right Rev. Bishop Borghi will celebrate mass and officiate at the solemnity. After the Sermon, a collection will be made for the Bengal Catholic Orphanage.

CONVERSION.—In the course of the preceding week a young Man, an English Protestant, was received by Rev. Mr. Storck into the Catholic Church.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLLIFFE.—The Catholics of Bengal will rejoice to learn that the consecration of the Right Rev. Doctor Olliffe was appointed to take place at Cork in the early part of October. His Lordship was received with marked attention at the grand National College of Maynooth, and also at the Episcopal Colleges of Kilkenny and Carlow. He hopes to bring out with him from these Institutions for this Mission a few pious and learned Ecclesiastics. Four choir Nuns, two of them already professed, and six Lay Sisters have also generously offered their services for the convents already established in Bengal, or for any new similar Institution, which may be founded in the Bengal Vicariate. It gives us sincere pleasure to add, that Bishop Olliffe proposes to bring out with him a few pious Tradesmen, who as Lay Brothers, will devote themselves to teach their respective trades to the Orphan Boys, and also give their services to such of our other Institutions as may require them.

The following is a copy of the letter which accompanied the Bulls for the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe's consecration :—

MY LORD,—As you have already learned from private sources, so I now have to confirm the communication with the liveliest pleasure, that the Sacred Congregation in the meeting of the 7th ultimo having proposed to His Holiness your election as coadjutor to the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, the Holy Father confirmed the choice with particular pleasure, by promoting you to the Episcopal dignity with a title “in partibus” (Milene) as you will learn from the annexed Pontifical Briefs, which I delay not in despatching to you for your consecration. The sacred congregation cannot doubt, and the Holy Father is likewise fully persuaded, that you will correspond in every respect to this new token of benevolence and of perfect confidence, which is offered to you for the greater good of the mission, to which you have already rendered important services, and which ought now to be so much the more dear to you, the more sacred and close are the ties which bind you to it.

Renewing my sentiments of especial attachment, and praying the Lord to preserve and prosper you for many years,

I remain,

Your most affectionate Brother,
J. P. CARDINAL FRANSONI.

J. BRUNNELLI, Secretary,
Propaganda, Rome, Sept. 5th 1843.

THE LATE REV. MR. KEARNEY.—We lately noticed in our Journal the demise of Rev. Mr. Kearney, Parish Priest of Clane, in the diocese of Kildare in Ireland. Out of his private property, this lamented Clergyman bequeathed £8000 sterling or 80,000 Rupees, for the education of candidates for the Priesthood who should offer to serve on foreign Missions.

The Right Rev. Doctor Healy, the Bishop of Kildare, the trustee of the above mentioned noble legacy, has most kindly promised Bishop Olliffe to educate from this fund two students for the Bengal Mission. We profit of this occasion to tender for ourselves and our fellow Catholics to the venerated Bishop of Kildare the tribute of most grateful and respectful thanks for the important benefit, his Lordship has thus, conferred upon us.

THE PERSECUTION OF SLANDER.— EDINBURGH REVIEW: BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.

We resume our notice of the Article in the Dublin Review.

The Reviewer after calling upon the honest and truly patriotic portion of the Press to aid in exposing the base and dishonest system of polluting every branch of literature with the views of Anti-Catholic bigotry, proceeds to illustrate the fact:

“We commence with the Edinburgh Review. We place it first on our list not because we think it the very worst of its class; but because its high literary character, its advocacy of certain liberal views, and the general ignorance that prevails of the reckless bigotry which so often marks its language regarding the Catholic religion, render it one of the most dangerous.*

We have no wish to speak lightly of the literary merits of the Edinburgh Review, although we think they have been not a little overrated. It is, indeed, to us, anything but grateful to denounce a periodical so long the steady friend of Catholic Emancipation; whose pages have been so often illuminated by the wit and eloquence of some of the wittiest and most eloquent men of the age; to denounce it too for qualities which sink it far lower, as an advocate of truth, or justice, or truly liberal opinions, than the occasional contributions we have referred to, raise it in other respects. This is indeed a labour we would rather avoid, and which we were beginning to flatter ourselves it would not be necessary for us to undertake: for we thought we had perceived of late years, among not a few of the bitterest fruits of by-gone prejudice and ignorance, the growth of better feelings and juster notions in

* We think it right to say, moreover, that it is owing to the dissertation on “Borrow's Bible,” that this series of papers is commenced in our present number. The writer of this article had indeed resolved a considerable time back to enter on this task. He wished nevertheless to wait a little longer, until the pressure of engrossing and unavoidable occupations should be relaxed, and leisure thus afforded him of doing all the justice to his subject which its importance demands, and his own slender abilities would enable him to accomplish. But, on the one hand, he had no prospect of soon enjoying the wished for leisure, and, on the other, he thought it better that the good work should be attempted by an inferior artist or with means, than not attempted at all: “Ab alio portiusquam a me, a me portiusquam a nomine.”

the Edinburgh Review, But an article in the February number, on "Borrow's Bible in Spain," has dashed our too fond hopes, and has exhibited once more the demon of slander, of mocking and malignant Calvinistic slander, grinning out from the pages of this periodical.

Some of our Catholic readers, who know the Edinburgh Review only through its more moderate articles, may be startled at these strong words of ours, and others—e.g. the Catholic lawyers, who eat meat on Fridays—may be offended at them. Let such readers, if any such there shall happen to be, suspend their judgment, for the present; and, when they shall have read the extracts we are about to give, say whether the spirit of a work, of which these are but specimens, would not justify language even stronger than we have used.

The reviewer, in the first paragraph of his dissertation, tells us of Mr. Borrow, that he is "if at times serious even unto sadness, never churlish or ascetic—never morose or misanthropic; the milk of human kindness flows in his veins; his disposition is cheerful, such as becomes the bearer of tidings of peace—solemness becomes their vital import. His every feeling is an inlet of joy; his pages, true exponents of the man, are studded with heartfelt admiration of the beauties of nature, &c.—(p. 105.)

Truly these are magnificent eulogiums, and scattered with no sparing hand; such as might befit some shadowy being of the poet's dream, some being who wanted but "the adornment of bright wings," to look like an inhabitant of a higher sphere—an angel of peace, whose feet are beautiful on the mountains, whose glance is sunshine, whose voice is music. Well, we read the extracts from Mr. Borrow's book in the Edinburgh Review, and then we sent for the book itself, and read attentively. Alas! what a change came over the lovely vision of human perfection which the reviewer had conjured up before our too easy imagination. This serious, and sweet, and cheerful creature, with the "inlets of joy," and the "studded pages," this new evangelist, this wingless cherub stood revealed before us, in his own reality—a gloomy bigot, and furious fanatic; petulant, frivolous, cynical, vulgar, pedantic; tasteless, arrogant, abusive. We speak of him only as he has pictured himself in his own book, as he exists there: who George Borrow is, or rather what he is, we know not, except as far as his book and his reviewer tell us. His book is a clumsy, ill-written, disgusting libel upon Catholicity; and, but for the virulent anti-Catholic phrenzy that pervades it, we can hardly conceive it possible that it would have found a dozen readers, or a single panegyrist. Frantic antipathy to the Pope, and to every thing Catholic, not only forms the burden of these three (for there are three) volumes, but it is the whole, their alpha and omega, their body and spirit: take, this way, and you do not leave even a gibbering skeleton behind. In reading them through, we felt as one in a night-mare, with all the goblins dancing on him; as one in pitchy darkness with a troop of devils yelling in his ears."

We annex a few of the extracts which are given from "Borrow's Book" in proof of the Anti-Catholic animus which must have influenced the Edinburgh Review in bestowing such high commendations on so low false and scurrilous a production.

"The following is the strain in which he addresses the Pope:—"Undeceive yourself, Batuscha (Daddy).... Amongst the peasantry of Spain I found my sturdiest supporters; and yet, the holy father supposes, that the Spanish labourers are friends and lovers of his. Undeceive yourself, Batuscha."—(Ib. xvii. xx)

"The pope is an arch deceiver, and the head minister of Satan here on earth," &c.—(i. 51.)

The Edinburgh Review tells us that "Mr. Borrow never spares the pope; he treats him with defiance and sarcasm."

He calls the Virgin Mother of our Lord, whom the archangel pronounced "blessed among women," and who was to be called blessed among all generations—he calls her jibingly—how can we write the words?—the Goddess of Rome, Maria Santissima."—(Ibid. xix.)

"I, therefore, when they" [some two hundred children at Evora, in Portugal, who, as Borrow says, had not seen the Bible] "told me they were Christians, denied the possibility of their being so, as they were ignorant of Christ and his commandments [not having seen the Bible!] and placed their hope of salvation on outward forms and observances, which were the invention of Satan, who wished to keep them in darkness, that at last they might tumble into the pit which he had dug for them. I said repeatedly that the pope, whom they revered, was an arch deceiver and the head minister of Satan here on earth, and that the monks and friars, whose absence they so deplored, and to whom they had been accustomed to confess themselves, were his subordinate agents. When called upon for proofs, I invariably cited the ignorance of my auditor respecting the Scriptures, &c.... Since this occurred, I have been frequently surprised, that I experienced no insult and ill-treatment from the people, whose superstitions I was thus attacking ; but I really experienced none," &c.—(i. 50.)

Need we tell our readers to mark the forbearance and meekness of these poor Portuguese Catholics, in hearing the brutal and atrocious language in which the head of the Church, and their beloved and proscribed fathers are assailed. It brings the tears to our eyes to think of these little children—two hundred Portuguese Catholic children—deploring the loss of the spiritual fathers to whom they had been accustomed to confess themselves, and, in the simplicity of their hearts, obliged to listen to the howlings of this ravenous wolf.*

Akin to this gratuitous assertion (that the monks fabricated charms and sold them to the people) is another which he makes, in describing the execution of a criminal at which he was present, in Madrid. He tells us that "Two priests led the animal [on which the culprit sat] by the bridle : two others walked on either side chaunting litanies, amongst which I distinguished the words of heavenly peace and tranquillity, for the culprit had been reconciled to the Church, had confessed and received absolution, and had been promised admission in heaven [of course, on condition of his sincere repentance].... One of the priests then in a loud voice commenced saying the belief [creed,] and the culprit repeated the words after him.... As the screw went around, the priest began to shout "pax et misericordia et tranquillitas," and still as he shouted, his voice became louder and louder, until the lofty walls of Madrid rang with it : then stooping down, he placed his mouth close to the culprit's ear, still shouting just as if he would pursue the spirit through its course to eternity, cheering it on its way. The effect was tremendous. I myself was so excited, that I involuntarily shouted misericordia, and and so did many others." Now, leaving out the light and sneering tone of the narrative, in what regards the priest, we would naturally suppose that such a scene, even as witnessed with Mr. Borrow's eyes, would have suggested peaceful and becalming reflections ; and that if he added anything, it would be to say that, after all, there was something to be admired and loved in Catholicity, which thus strengthens and cheers the departing spirit, and lifts the soul even of the dying malefactor, on the wings of faith and hope and charity. But no—even the virtues which a pagan would admire, are, in this fellow's eyes, vices, when they exist in a Catholic priest. Hear his blasphemous revilings!—"God was not thought of ; Christ was not thought of [how under heaven could he know this ?] ; only the priest was thought of, for he seemed at that moment to be the first being in existence, &c. A striking instance of the successful working of the popish system whose grand aim has ever been to keep people's minds as far as possible from God," &c.—(i. 249.)

The writer goes on to show that the spirit of the Edinburgh Review is not only Anti-Catholic but infidel and cites the recorded opinions of Archbishop Whately to that effect. We can however only insert the following passage which will show our Catholic readers to what eminent danger their faith is exposed from the fashionable literature and infidelity of the day.

"We do not give any further extracts, for the purpose of more fully substantiating this charge of rationalism ; chiefly because, for this purpose, we should quote, not, as we have done, isolated sentences, but whole and continuous paragraphs. The Edinburgh reviewers care little for the religious feelings of their Catholic readers, who are comparatively few ; and, therefore, they have no concern to soften down or half-conceal their Anti-Catholic prejudices. But rationalist principles could not be so safely advanced in round terms. Whoever, possessed of ordinary sagacity, has read much of the writings of the Scotch philosophers, must plainly see that the great mass of them (including such men as Sir J. Mackintosh) are utterly destitute of anything that, among Catholics or even High Church Protestants, could deserve the name of faith. The Redeemer, the apostles, the great doctrines of Christianity, its progress and perpetuity, and influence upon the minds and condition of men, are all as so many topics for theorizing about, so many facts to be studied, for clearing up difficulties in the history of the human race, like the invention of gunpowder and the discovery of America—and nothing more. Christianity is to them but the finest of the fine arts, and sometimes even not so much. These are, in truth, but the natural results of the principles of Calvinism worked out into shape. Nevertheless the multitude, even those who have imbibed the spirit, without having learned the language of this philosophy or forgotten the symbols of their old heresy, with its ferocious league and covenant, are not yet altogether ripe for the reception of naked and unmitigated Deism. And hence the principles of infidelity must be, if put forward at all, mingled only as grains with the mass, concealed under a heap of phrases, popular and orthodox, or as the most certain means of gaining currency, joined with a hearty invective against the Catholic Church. This has been, as every scholar knows, the practice of heretics, and especially of infidels, in all ages : as long as they formed the weaker party, they neither preached their doctrines openly, nor avowed their intentions ; and hence the difficulty of exposing the principles that lie, not on the surface, but at the bottom of their writings "

REQUIESCAT IN PACE.

MAY HE REST IN PEACE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—The notice which your issue of the 25th instant contained of a " Month's Mind" to be celebrated for the late Very Rev. Mr. Moré, induced me to attend at St. Thomas's on Tuesday morning last, to witness the solemnities of the Church on such occasions, and that mournful but affecting commemoration suggested reflections which I hope I shall not soon forget.

Since it is decreed for man to die once, and after death to be judged, what a consolation is it not, I said, to die in the embraces of the tenderest of mothers, who, though destined not to die, conducts her departed children through the shades of death, and in her prayers accompanies them to judgment. If in our unhappy days, Faith can hardly be found on the earth, and if amidst the contagion of a corrupting world, the charity of many be grown cold, the love of the Catholic Church for her children is still as strong as death and stronger. When the mystery of love was consummated in the Incarnation and birth of the Son of God, the angels sang—Glory to God on high, and on earth peace to men of good will; after his resurrection from the dead, "my peace be to you" was the expression of love towards his disciples, and, "may he rest in peace" is the tender recommendation to mercy with which the Church dismisses her children out of life and commemorates their departure. I am more disposed to enjoy in peace the consolation which I feel in being recognised as one of her children by a mother so venerable and loving, than to vindicate by disputation the value of her prayers for the dead; but if I were asked a reason for the hope that is in me relative to this practice, I would answer briefly, that it has been from the beginning a custom in the Church of God.

Give me, said a Protestant once to a Catholic acquaintance, the text of scripture which obliges us to abstain from flesh meat on Fridays, and he heard to his confusion—"We have no such custom nor the Church of God." If the negative reasoning of St. Paul be just and convincing when he says—"If any man wish to be contentious, we have no such custom nor the Church of God," how undeniable is the positive argument to be deduced in favour of prayers for the dead, from the constant and immemorial usage in the Church of commending her departed children to peace and rest. Perhaps I may be told, that supposing it lawful to pray for the dead, still the practice is useless. But no, it is a good and wholesome thought to pray for the dead that they may be loosed from their sins, and if the prayer of the just man availeth much, the prayers of the Church cannot be disregarded. She is the assembly of the just and the kingdom of God on earth where alone his will is done as it is in heaven. She is the spouse of Christ, cleansed in the laver of regeneration in word of life, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. She binds and unbinds on earth and the operations of her ministry have their effect in heaven. She asks mercy for her children and they receive it through her prayers. She invokes upon them the peace of God and they sleep in Christ. She knocks in their behalf at the gates of heaven, and they are opened to them.

Will it be said after all that the Church prays in vain for her departed children? Or can it be affirmed that her prayers are capable of rescuing from angry justice the souls of all who die in her communion?

Neither one nor the other is true. "The sacrifices and prayers of the Church for the souls departed," says St. Augustine (De Cura pro Mortuis Gerenda) are a thanksgiving for the very virtuous, a propitiation for those whose lives were not very sinful, and if they are useless to those who died in their wickedness, they are some consolation to their surviving friends." Thus spoke a learned and holy Doctor of the Church nearly 1500 years ago, and I will add from my experience of last Tuesday that the affecting and solemn spectacle which religion exhibits while these sacrifices and prayers are offered up to propitiate the great Judge of the living and the dead, speaks to the heart of the vanity of the world, the terrors of judgment and the value of a pure conscience, like the sounds of the last trumpet. O yes, death shall come upon us like an armed man and despoil us of all our earthly possessions; at its approach the grandeur of the world will vanish and its look shall blast all that is beautiful or charming in nature, our nearest friends will deposit our mortal remains in the earth and forget us, but though the carnal mother should forget the child of her womb, the Church of God will not forget her children, and while the link between us and all that is earthly is severed in death, our relations of union and sympathy with our holy mother the Church become then more manifest and more tender. Come, ye inquirers after truth, take up like another Solomon the sword of discernment and judge of the claims of our Holy Church to be the mother of the children of God from the sincerity and constancy of her affection towards them. The pretended mother will consent to have the child divided provided she may be allowed to retain a lifeless half, but the true and real mother claims both soul and body, united in life and separated in death, and while she sanctifies the latter and guards it from profanation until the day of resurrection, she ceases not to supplicate for the former the rest of peace and for both a glorious immortality.

SOLEMN COMMEMORATION TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE RECTOR OF ST. XAVIER'S—(From a Correspondent of the Hurkaru).—The Loretto House was yesterday morning, the scene of a solemn commemoration, to the memory of the late Rector of St Xavier's. The ceremony opened a few minutes after 7; and the solemnity of the occasion was heightened by the harmony of a very able Choir, under the conduct of a professional gentleman of no small note in Calcutta. What pleased us most was, the gratitude that the Catholic community of Calcutta testified in joining with such willingness, for the purpose of offering their prayers for the eternal rest of one who for a period of 7 years left untired no endeavours for their future welfare, and who, perhaps, regarded his charge over his flock more than the health of his constitution, which was too delicate to withstand any longer the inclemency of an Eastern climate. The return, we repeat, was very pleasing to the friends of the late Principal, whose like, we fear, we shall not soon see again.—November 28, 1843.

GLEANINGS FROM THE OVERLAND MAIL.

The Rev. S. Fennelly and a party of eleven Nuns and Clergymen have taken their passage on the Lady Flora, which sailed on the 24th September last, bound to Madras.

Three students from the South Presentation Monastery have left Cork for Madras, to be accompanied by four Nuns from the Presentation Convent, Dublin, and three young Clergymen who have just received ordination in that diocese, with eighteen Ecclesiastical students. They are all destined for the Mission of India.

The Roman Catholics have in India, China, and the rest of Asia, sixty-nine Bishops, twenty Coadjutors, one thousand eight hundred and fifty six priests, and two millions, two hundred and eleven thousand members.

W Lockhart, Esq B. A. of Ex-ter College, Oxford, and for the last twelve months an inmate of Mr Newman's house at Littlemore, has become a convert to Roman Catholicism.

In the year 1749, the grand jury of the city of Cork, made the following presentment "We find and present Charles Wesley (the brother of John, the founder of Wesleyan Methodists,) to be a person of ill-fame, vagabond, and a common disturber of his Majesty's peace, and we pray that he may be transported."

The Right Rev. Dr. Bruke, Roman Catholic Bishop of Elphin, died at Turlough near Ballymore.

A correspondent of the Times, dated Lisbon 25th September mentions that the confirmation of the Archbishop of Goa, and the Bishop of Macao by the Roman See has been officially, announced, and little more remains to be done to the completion of the Concordat.

MADRAS.

THE LATE REV. MR. SHIEL.

It escaped us to notice in our 1st issue, the death of a most amiable and promising Ecclesiastic of the Catholic Communion—the Rev. Eugene Shiel, at the early age of 25 Years and 7 Months.—This amiable and talented young person brought with him to this country the seeds of the complaint of which he died:—his career in India had been but short, though hopes were entertained at one time it would be otherwise; but short as it was it had been sufficiently marked to secure for him the love and esteem of many, as was evidenced on the evening his mortal remains were committed to the silent grave, in the number of persons in attendance at the Cathedral to witness that solemn service of the Church.—Madras Examiner.

A Military Grievance with the Roman Catholic Soldiers.—We have given a place in our present issue to the communication of "A Catholic," and we have done so under a firm conviction that should it meet the eye of the most Noble the Commander in-Chief, or his attention be drawn to it, he will not hesitate to grant the relief sought; inasmuch as the regulations of the service authorise it and it inflicts no additional duty upon others—it will be a consideration the Catholic soldiers will duly appreciate and keep in kindly remembrance.—Ibid.

Father Mathew in London.—This great moral regenerator of Ireland has visited London, and thousands have listened to his paternal admonition and enrolled themselves under the banners of Total Abstinence. The papers which came to hand per "Hindustan," are full of the particulars of this important movement. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm with which this illustrious Apostle of Temperance was everywhere received. Persons of every class of life and of every Religious denomination united in paying him homage and respect, and enrolling themselves under his standard. We find the most kindly feelings every where prevailing; Catholic and Protestant Clergy and Laity shaking hands together, and at the same time vying with each other in zeal for the promotion of the great and good cause. Several addresses were presented to Father Mathew, by the different Total Abstinence Societies previously established in London. They were all most gratefully and warmly acknowledged by the gifted individual in whose honor they were composed.

On one of these occasions Father M. availed himself of the opportunity to state, that he wished the Total Abstinence Societies would not take the distinctive titles of Catholic or Protestants. In obedience to this suggestion and in the name of his Brethren the gentleman who presented the address from "the Protestant Members of the South London Temperance Society," expunged therefrom the word "Protestant." On another occasion the Rev John Moore (a Catholic Priest) shook hands publick and most cordially with the Revd. Jabez Burns (a Baptist Minister) exclaiming, "Let no one say for the future, that a Catholic Priest cannot love and respect Protestant Clergymen."

With these facts in view, let us now turn to ourselves. Father Mathew's spirit is at work in this city. Total Abstinence Societies, branches of the great one of which he is the head, have been established here by the Right Rev Dr. Fennelly and his Clergy; and we are proud to bear testimony to the great moral change effected thereby since his Lordship's arrival. The same disinterested zeal for the moral regeneration of man which marks the conduct of the champion of Temperance distinguishes also his followers in India; and, like him, they know not difference of creed, or caste, or colour, in the prosecution of the good work. We are, however given to understand, that with very few exceptions Catholics alone have taken Father M.'s pledge. Heaven has evidently given to this Rev. Gentleman's labours a very peculiar blessing, not bestowed on other Societies—and it is for this reason we would wish to see all Temperance men united under his banners. The leaders of the movement here are, it is true, Catholic Priests; but surely what is no objection in Father M. cannot reasonably be an objection in them. If they united with the pledge of Temperance anything of a Sectarian nature, then indeed we would view them with distrust, but this they never even dreamt of. We are aware that there is another Temperance movement in Madras patronized by the Protestant Missionaries—but we incline to an opinion that it is too exclusively Protestant to be generally useful; and as we long to see the day when religious dissensions will cease amongst us, we cannot but earnestly recommend to all the plan pursued by Father Mathew and his followers of every Religious denomination. Without abandoning a single principle or sacrificing a single conscientious conviction, those worthy men are of one mind and of one heart in the great cause to which they are pledged: let us but imitate their example, and India, like Ireland, will soon become a regenerated land.—Ibid.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—I will feel obliged by your informing me whether Catholic Soldiers can refuse to form a portion of the firing party at the funeral of a Protestant? The Army regulations declare, that, no Commanding Officer can compel his men, being Catholics, to attend the Protestant Service, and yet when Catholics belong to the firing party at the funeral of a Protestant, they are obliged to be present whilst the burial service of the Church of England is reading, which is contrary to the discipline of their Church and to their own wishes. It may be urged that they are not obliged to repeat the responses. Neither would they if they were marched into St. Mary's Church in the Fort, and yet what Commanding Officer dare order his men to march thither on Sundays? Why then are not Protestants selected for the firing party at the funerals of Protestants, and Catholics for the firing party at Catholic funerals? This arrangement would not be very difficult to put in practice, and it would put an end to one of the chief grievances of the Catholic Soldiers.

The Catholic Church does not prevent her children from accompanying the remains of a departed friend to their last resting place, but she never can tolerate anything like joining in prayer with those whom she believes to be in error. I am certain that if this grievance were brought to the notice of the Most Noble the Commander in Chief, he would immediately give directions to adopt some means of remedying the evil. You will much oblige not only myself by answering my question, but also the Catholic Soldiers as a body, and hoping that you will offer a few remarks which may meet the eye of the Noble Marquis at the head of the Army,

I remain, Sir,

Yours Sincerely,

A CATHOLIC.

MADRAS,
24th October 1843.

FATHER MATHIEW AND BISHOP OF NORWICH.

Father Mathew has returned to Ireland. At Norwich he was rather uncourteously treated, but Dr. Stanley, the Bishop of the Diocese, addressed the rev. gentleman thus at a public meeting:—"And now, reverend sir (turning to Father Mathew, who rose from his seat) you, my friend, from another island, I meet not here as a priest of the Roman Catholic church; for I will candidly say I am hostile to it. But I meet you here in a nobler and more comprehensive character than that of the priest; I meet you here, like myself, a Christian brother; I meet you upon neutral ground, where Christians of all denominations meet and delight to visit and congregate together. Sir, I have watched your proceedings for many and many a year. You may remember many years ago that I censured you in public—nay, more, may I not add, abused you? I believed those public reports that were spread concerning you; and I scarcely know how to allude to them in their malignity, falsehood, and misrepresentation; nevertheless I believed in them. Yet I thought it but fair, as a candid man, to appeal to you as a gentleman, a christian, and a man of honour, and to tell you how the case stood. Sir, you answered me in a manner which did you credit, and I turned over a new leaf; I abused you no more, and I am now your friend. I am not one of those who will not believe a Catholic upon his oath. I act more cautiously. I believe you upon your candid and honest affirmation, and I am satisfied that you did not deceive me." Father Mathew said, "I cannot command words to give expression to what I feel,—thankfulness to the Great Bestower of all good for the scene witnessed to-night, and then joy and pleasure at hearing the great cause in which all the feelings of my heart are concentrated, so ably and nobly vindicated by the illustrious bishop. I grieve that he has suffered so much on my account, and on account of this great cause; but in spite of suffering still greater obloquy, high influences compel him—his own conscience—his benevolent heart, and that great and good God who will bestow on him a reward far superior to all human approbation. He had already conferred upon me a heavy weight of obligation; he had extended over me his protecting shield at a time when I was nearly oppressed by prejudice and malevolence. But I may not presume to praise the learned, eloquent, good, and pious Lord Bishop of Norwich. It would be presumptuous in me to say that he thanks you for the kindness with which you have received me. That would, perhaps, be arrogating an honour, not intended for me, but for the great work which the Lord has blessed so wonderfully; for in all sincerity I say, that I consider myself worthy of nothing. In my most sanguine moments, in my wildest dreams of the success of this great cause, I never anticipated what my eyes have seen and my ears have heard this night. I consider myself but as an unworthy instrument in the hands of the Almighty, who selects what instruments he pleases, and who declares that he chooses the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things thereof to correct the proud."—A correspondent of the Standard supplies some particulars of the family of the Rev. Theobald Mathew, whose mission in the Metropolis has made him an object of special interest. The genealogist states that the family carry back their pedigree to the Welsh Gwaythvoed, King of Cardigan, through Sir David Mathew, standard-bearer to Edward the Fourth. Adm. Thomas Mathew was descended from the same knight. A lineal descendant of Sir David went from Llandaff to Ireland about the year 1610, and married the widow of Lord Thurles, mother of the great Duke of Ormonde—the first of many alliances between the Butler and Mathew families. Eventually, the possessor of the estates became Earl of Llandaff but at the death of the last Earl, the title expired, and the property went to his sister, Lady Elisha Mathew; who, dying in 1842, left them to the Viscount de Chabot, a French nobleman with extensive connexions in Ireland, brother-in-law to the Duke of Leinster, but not at all related to the Mathew family. The executors to Lady Elisha's will were the Duke and her relative Father Mathew; but Mr. Mathew refused to act. Nor does he interfere in the litigation of which the will is still the subject.

LES DAMES DU SACRE CŒUR.

SOME time since we announced the expected arrival of a filiation from the mother house at Paris of the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, in this country. Since that time they have arrived, and are now established in the old mansion of Berymeade Priory, near Acton, in the vicinity of the metropolis. At that time we expressed our satisfaction at the prospect of having such a conventual establishment amongst us; we can now only renew our satisfaction, on finding that all difficulties in the way have been overcome, and admire the devotion of those good ladies, who have, as it were, rendered us independent of France while, by so doing, they establish an unquestionable claim, not only on our good wishes, but also on the support and encouragement of the Catholic body in England. Of the merit of the parent establishment as a school for the higher classes of young ladies, it is unnecessary for us to speak; its popularity and high character are sufficient proofs of the estimation in which it is held not only in France, but also in this country, by that no small class, who are anxious to combine the advantages of a foreign education, with sound religion, which they are assured must be the case when it is directed by ladies of birth and family, who devote themselves to that pursuit through the highest motive,—namely, that, of love to God.

Now, with the exception of the dull and uninteresting journey between any point of the coast and the metropolis of France, we cannot see that a whit greater advantage can be derived from sending young ladies to Paris for their education, than is to be found at the affiliated house of Berymeade Priory,—where the same exercises, discipline, and customs are as strictly French as at the mother house; for within its walls it will be found as completely Parisian, as if the atmosphere which, in this instance, is the only difference, were identical; but combined with this great advantage, that, in cases of illness, the parents may have the satisfaction of being immediately present with their children, to say nothing of having it in their power to exercise that parental superintendence over them, which, however much neglected, is so strictly incumbent on all parents, whether it be in the progress of their studies, or in the care of the health of their offspring.—These most desirable points can be attained with as much facility at Berymeade Priory as at a secular school, and, therefore, without making invidious distinctions, we cordially bring before the notice of our readers, an establishment which we are persuaded requires but to be known, to induce many to take advantage of. Nor do we suppose that these ladies will interfere with other establishments whether religious or secular. The Catholic body being continually on the increase, there is ample room for all; but, we earnestly hope that that their claim will not be overlooked by such parents as may have taken the resolution of sending their children to Paris, or elsewhere abroad, for the attainment of an object which can now be procured as well, if not far better, at home.—Catholic Magazine.

SOUTH AMERICA—The Rev. A. D. Fahy, O.S.D., is to leave Dublin this week, for the important mission of Buenos Ayres, in South America. This zealous, pious, and learned Irish ecclesiastic, will, we fondly trust, be the means of promoting religion and solid piety in this distant mission.—Tablet, Sept 30.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

Article III.

Second period—Religious wars—Treaty of Limerick.

With the time of Henry VIII.'s schism, begins in Ireland an era of most cruel persecutions. It would be however too long to detail every point of this lamentable history, and, sad to say, we have to choose but among crimes, victims and executioners. The period we have reached was one of unmitigated horrors and abominations. Both reigns, that of the second of the Tudors and of Edward VI., we will then pass over, in order to come to him who, most relentlessly tyrannised over Ireland.

Elizabeth, James I. Charles I., and above all, Cromwell, are those whose memory is most sullied and exalted, those who, either of their own will or by their slackness in repressing the evil passions of their times, either as acting themselves or as permitting their lieutenants to act, have sowed in Ireland that deep rooted hatred against the Englishmen which, from generation, to generation is re-produced with inexhaustible fecundity.

J Gordon, the historian, an authority not to be suspected, says that the persecutions ordered by Elizabeth were so dreadful that "it caused the destruction of the whole Irish population and changed their country into a mournful desert."

Holingshead, a cotemporary writer, says: "The country which formerly was rich, fertile, very populous, most abundant in harvests; pasture, and cattle is now waste and sterile. Fruits are no more produced, no corn, no cattle in the fields; in a word heaven's malediction is so severe against Ireland that whoever would visit it from one extremity to the other could hardly meet with an Irish man, woman or child (1)."

Such a description requires no amplification; but it is necessary we should sum up the legislative acts of these times in those parts relating to Ireland. Those recorded acts will be found to say more than the mere general facts of history, as these latter may often be considered exceptions, casualties occasioned if not justified by an ardent struggle or the personal passions of certain chiefs.

Laws, on the other hand, prepared in cold blood, long meditated, debated with all the maturity, of a protracted discussion, laws, we say, afford the truest and most irrefragable expression of the sentiments of an epoch. Those who propose laws and those who vote them, are conscious that they work not only for the present time but also for times to come. They sit as for posterity in all the studied gravity of attitude, and demeanour as they would wish to be seen by future generations, and such is their opinion of the work which they elaborate as to justify them in binding for ever by these their acts those very generations.

They presume to ordain for eternity, as if in the accomplishment of their solemn avocations they were illumined by supreme intelligence. Thus cotemporary legislation will best elucidate the atrocities revealed to us by historians.

A Bill passed at the accession of Elizabeth to the throne enacts as follows: the Queen is declared the supreme chief of the church. Any person maintaining the spiritual supremacy of the pope, as heretofore was the case, shall be proscribed, together with his accomplices; he shall be deprived of all Property, SHALL SUFFER DEATH and other punishments, also confiscations as in cases of high treason."

And such as acknowledged another religious supremacy than that of Queen Elizabeth, were not the only persons that incurred the penalties of high treason; but whoever refused to acknowledge her supremacy, although he adhered not to any other hierarchy, and declined to take the oath, was to be punished by death (2).

Whoever attempted to bring any one out of the adopted faith over to the Roman church, was to be punished by death (3).

Whoever assisted in the above attempt, was to be punished by death (4).

Any priest or Seminarist continuing to reside in or visiting the Kingdom, for more than forty days, was to be punished by death (5).

To receive to protect or assist such persons was felony (6).

The act of conveying any pecuniary assistance to such persons out of England was to be punished by a præmunire, which involved loss of property and transportation (7).

Two thirds of the land or other property of any person refusing to visit the new established church was to be confiscated to the Queen's use (8).

Any priest charged with being a priest, and denying his profession, was to be incarcerated (9).

Any individual above 16 years of age refusing to go to church or verbally impugning the ecclesiastical authority of the Queen, or persuading others to avoid going to church, was to be incarcerated till he consented to attend divine service as established by law (10).

Any person pertinaciously objecting to submit to the above laws was ordered to leave the kingdom, his refusal to do so was declared felony (11).

The landed or other property of such persons, so obliged to leave the kingdom, was to be confiscated in favour of the chief of the established Church, the Sovereign (12).

We need quote no further from this systematic code of persecution towards the Catholic: from the above specimens the rest may be guessed at. How fearful an age was this sixteenth century in all that concerned religious creeds and formulas! For it is right to observe that both churches were then vying with each other in intolerance and cruelty. While Elizabeth was proscribing on one side of the channel all such of her subjects as had remained faithful to the Roman creed, frightful decrees were fulminated in France against the sectarians of the reformed church in 1539. Henry II. of France issued his edict (13) pronouncing sentence of death, against all Lutherans, prohibiting judges to modify the punishment, as sometimes had been done (14). The year after, 1560, the edict of Romorantin vested bishops with the cognizance of the crime of heresy which was denied to the parliaments, suspected for its moderation.

In 1567, letters patent of Charles IX excluded every Protestant from all judicial offices, till at last arrived that day of awful memory, the Saint Bartholomew (15.) In those times of ardent passions, intolerance was always combined with fervent zeal between Protestants and Catholics, the question was how to decimate each other fastest. But yet it may be truly said that intolerance was nowhere more persistent and cruel than in the country that had proclaimed as its religious chief such a man as Henry VIII. There, for a very long period, executions were the normal regime of the dissidents; it was a Saint Bartholomew with years of duration instead of being confined to the space of an orgie, and, in this respect, so imperative was the public spirit then prevailing, that James I., was forced to yield and to become a persecutor against his own will. The Irish, on his accession, expected he would acknowledge liberty of conscience as a right, but their expectation soon proved illusive.

In the very first day of his reign James I. issued a proclamation which disabused the Irish, and proved to them all the folly (16) of their supposition. Whole provinces were confiscated in virtue of a royal decree, and the Irish-born were dragged to the scaffold. Some few bands of them were driven to the most inaccessible parts of mountains and marshes. Their lands were granted, partly to some Scotch adventurers, partly to a company of capitalists that had been formed in London to execute, upon a large scale, a plan of Protestant colonization. Thus was established in the vicinity of Derry, a colony which at a latter period became a manufacturing city under the name of Londonderry, the origin of which belongs to one of the most violent usurpations of that time, and the name of which is the title of nobility of one of the most virulent Tories sitting now in the House of Lords.

Charles I. followed meritoriously the steps of James. The form of expression and of spoliation was altered, but the results were the same, the iniquity of legislative enactments replaced or rather aggravated, armed barbarity. Charles claimed as his property the whole of three provinces of Ireland and appointed a committee charged to adjudge them to him with all the forms of justice. Several jurymen, members of that committee, refused to incur the odium of such a mission; but Sirafford, the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, found means to put an end to their scruples. Those means are officially transcribed in the records of the House of Commons. "The jurymen who gave their verdict according to their conscience, were censured in the hall of the castle and fined; some sent to pillory WITH LOSS OF EARS AND THEIR TONGUE PIERCED; some were BRANDED ON THE FOREHEAD WITH A RED HOT IRON; some suffered other ABOMINABLE MUTILATIONS." (17).

Sirafford's correspondence with the King is no less curious. He writes to His Majesty to give an account of the measures he took in order to teach the judges the line of conduct they were to follow. "We have sentenced the Sheriff to a fine of one thousand pounds sterling for having ill chosen the members of the jury, and these latter were compelled to enter the hall of the castle where we have thought proper to punish them for their obstinacy with a just severity." (18).

Leland (19) tells us in what consisted that just severity. "Some jurymen were sentenced to a fine of £4,000 Sterling, their lands seized, and their person committed to prison, till the fine was paid up, after which they had to solicit pardon upon their knees in presence of the court."

One citation more to depict this reign.

The following is the text of the order issued by the Lords-Justices to 'Count D'Ormond and communicated to him under the form of a decree.

'It is resolved that it is convenient and proper his Lordship should make, with H. M.'s soldiers' assistance, all possible efforts to strike, kill, slaughter and destroy all the rebels, their adherents and those who assist them; to burn, plunder, pillage, ruin, sack, raze to the ground all places, cities and houses where the rebels have been assisted and lodged, and also the fields of corn and of hay; finally to destroy all the inhabitants capable of bearing arms.'

MISCELLANEA.

CONVERSION.—We can state it as a fact that the Rev. Daniel Parson, Curate of Marden, Wilts, long known as a Tractarian, has seceded to the Church of Rome. Private reason will for the present prevent his becoming a priest, but he is to assume, as we are informed, the office of teacher in some Papish establishment.—Record

PROFESSION OF FAITH.—The Rev. Dr. O'Carroll, of St Andrew's Westland-row, made a solemn profession of faith on Sunday last, on the occasion of receiving from the Roman College a diploma of Doctor of Divinity. This learned gentleman, while a student of the Irish College at Rome, went through the prescribed examinations at the university, and was proclaimed worthy to receive the honourable distinction of Doctor of Divinity. The Superiors of the College having lately been informed that this distinguished ecclesiastic left Rome without applying for the authentication of his promotion, immediately dispatched his diploma to the Rev. Mr. Ferguson, of Gardiner street, a member of the splendid order which presides over the Roman College, with instructions to present it to the Rev. Dr. O'Carroll, after having received his solemn profession of faith, according to the form prescribed by his Holiness Pope Pius VI. This ceremony took place at the Parochial House, Westland-row, in presence of the Very Rev. the Dean, and of many others of the clergy of the city.

GERMANY.—Prince Hohenlohe is reported to have performed, by prayer, a new miracle at Inspruck. The daughter of a counsellor of the Court of Appeal of the Tyrol, after an illness of three years, and a woman of fifty-five, who had for seven years suffered from paralysis, have owed their recovery to the Prince's prayers.

FEAST OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER.

From a Correspondent.

The anniversary of St. Xavier, which fell on Sunday last, was solemnized in St. Thomas' Church. Since the Catholic College at Calcutta, which has adopted St. Xavier for its patron was founded, the festivity of the Apostle of the East has invariably been commemorated, and flocks of Catholics have hronged to the solemnities in acknowledgment of the Apostle's blessed agency and in admiration of his heroic virtues in the cause of religion. The congregation at St. Thomas' Church on the present occasion, was not, however, so numerous as we have often had the pleasure of seeing; but the comparative scantiness may be satisfactorily accounted for when we consider another attraction at the Catholic Cathedral on the same day. Everything was in keeping with the nature of the ceremony;—the weather was delightful, the choir, as a matter of course, very creditable, and to crown all these concords, we had a very graphic panegyric of the Apostle, whose memory was being celebrated, from one of our best preachers. After the Gospel the Rev. Mr. Sumner ascended the pulpit and first read the Pastoral Address which the last number of the Catholic Herald laid before its readers. The Rev. Gentleman chose for his text the 11th verse of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and began by proposing the eminence of St. Xavier from the merits of his achievements. The singular record in the Sacred Scriptures of the meekness of Moses, the patience of Job, the penance of David or the faith of Abraham proves, not an exclusive gift in each of these personages, (for there were others not devoid of these endowments,) but an excellence of each in his respective virtue. The Catholic Church on the strength of the power vested in her, canonizes the individuals whom she knows as deserving the meed; but in the exercise of this privilege she allows that quantum of dignity to each which his dues can claim. The traces that the footsteps of Xavier have left behind them, join, to show the magnitude of his deserts, and his acts and performances in this life have gained for him dignity even among Saints. How fraught with difficulties does the very project of undertaking the conversion of uncultivated millions from a life of luxury and voluptuousness to strict christian discipline appear to our eyes; what hopeless difficulties, what appalling dangers does the route to that end present to us! The perils of the sea, despite the discoveries of art, the tedium of a voyage notwithstanding the conveniences of life, render the secular reluctant to entrust himself in a frail barque to the mercies of the ocean even for the attainment of some other object less encumbered with difficulties and labour. But mark the zealous Apostle of the Indies renouncing his title and possessions! See him tearing himself from the embraces of a disconsolate parent, and running with cheerfulness to meet mortifications and dangers! Already he is embarked; his vessel weighs anchor, and Xavier bids a last adieu to his mother-land. His vessel skims along, and after some days touches different shores, and then sets out for the goal of Xavier's desires. With longing solicitude the ardent Apostle waits for the cry of the seamen aloft, and while the others prayed for a rest from their toil, St. Francis Xavier implored for the beginning of his! "The land! the land!" at length greets his anxious ears, and now he comes in sight of Goa! Now from a sea of comparative calm, he enters into another of afflictions, perils and mortifications, sufficient to qualify many for the palm of martyrdom! Oh God! assist thy devoted minister to slake his thirst in thy cause! Unaided and unabatted, he has ventured in dreary lands, where self will has no curb, and where ignorance has benighted the hearts of the inhabitants! Enlighten their understandings, soften their callous hearts, and guide thy Xavier through these unknown lands! The effects of his zeal were wonderful. The palaces and dwellings of the great, inaccessible to many others of more worldly conspicuity, were entered by the humble Apostle, and though ignorant of the dialect of the country, he has been known to be suddenly inspired with the requisite knowledge, and to have gained over to the faith of Christ millions by his preachings. No less than five kings and several queens, those haughty personages of uncivilized lands, have been by Xavier persuaded to abandon a life of luxury and sin and bend to the yoke of Christ. But who shall enumerate the perils of this faithful minister of God? Who shall attempt to pourtray the nature of the dangers his insurmountable zeal so often exposed him to? The hostility of the fishing coast, the dangers of the plains of Travancore, the raging storms and hurricanes of the Japanese islands, were all fearlessly encountered, and oh! most wonderful, overcome. For three days clinging to a remnant of his wrecked vessel, has he been tossed on the billows of an angry sea. The conversion of another's soul was as precious to him as the safety of his own, and did he but hear of a soul in danger, be the obstacles never so formidable, he would think a conquest feasible, and risk his life in imminent danger in an attempt. How many and how oft have his labours and successes raised dreadful enemies against him, secret assassins, more daring murderers, and deliberate foes. Those very ones whom he so fondly loved, have planned and determined upon his destruction! But yet did Xavier cherish them with a more than father's love, and yet did he brood over them with parental care; yet did he raise his emaciated hands to heaven and say "Oh India, what a land art thou! Though blest with the riches and comforts of life, thou hast not had a friend to guide thee into better paths, no hand to stay thee, no monitor to check thy deviations! But be happy. The unworthy Xavier has been deputed to your shores! Yes! come, and he will hug thee in his arms and pray, he yet might prove thy father and thy friend!" In expiation of his former errors Xavier subjected himself to tortures and mortifications that seemed beyond the power of man to suffer. As penances for his sins, he lowered himself beneath the earth, and he, that was of such gentle countenance, whose worldly expectations might have been unworthy a prince, engaged himself in services the most lowly, travelled 100,000 miles afoot without convenience or reasonable intermission, tended on the sick, begged by the way, suffered with patience and resignation the scoffs and taunts of the deriding mob, sucked the very ulcers of the patients; in short, submitted himself to every humiliation a mortal could devise or offer. These and many others were the afflictions no doubt that made the Cross in his mother's sanctuary weep tears of blood, to show to all Europe the conspicuousness of Xavier's virtues. It would be too much for the limits of the Herald to give a more detailed account of St. Xavier's life as dilated by the Rev. Mr. Sumner; but suffice it to say, that maugre the impediments that obstructed the Saint's way and the sicknesses to which his method of living subjected him, he accomplished the wonderful conversion of the East in ten years, and was proceeding to work new wonders in China when he sunk under an accumulation of sufferings, a martyr to his Faith and Religion. 'Go,' concluded the Rev. Preacher, to whom we have not done justice in this meagre outline of his sermon, "Go! and when you are asked in what space of time this grand work of conversion was achieved, answer in ten years, and by one single man, who coped with difficulties, endured labours and wrought miracles such as would entitle many to the rank of Saints, Martyrs and Apostles."

DURRUMTOLLAH CHURCH.

It is with heartfelt pleasure we announce that a Pontifical High Mass will be celebrated on next Sunday the 10th inst. at the Church of the Sacred Heart, by the Right Rev. Bishop Borghi and a Sermon preached on the same occasion by the Most Rev. the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal. The service will open at 8 o'clock A. M. with the "Te Deum," to return thanks to God for the ample benediction his mercy has thus bestowed not only on the Church in Calcutta but on religion throughout Bengal.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

The Right Rev. Dr. Borghi performed a Pontifical Mass at the Cathedral on Sunday last for the members of the Society of the Propagation of the Faith in honor of the anniversary of its Patron Saint, St. FRANCIS XAVIER. His Lordship was assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Mascarenhas and D'Mello, Deacon and Sub-Deacon. The Very Rev. D. Kennedy preached on the occasion, taking the text from the gospel of the day, Luke IX. 25 to 38. He concluded his very edifying discourse by remarking that he was sorry to find that the Society had not the same degree support in Calcutta as in other places, but he was certain that it was not from any want of charity among the Catholics of this city but owing to a want of proper organization of its Members, especially as the conditions required from each Member were so simple: viz. The trifling monthly subscription of six pice and the recital daily of one Pater and one Ave with the versicle, 'St. Francis Xavier, pray for us.' He was sure that if these conditions were more generally known, all Catholics would cheerfully join in promoting the good work. He exhorted his hearers, and particularly the charitably disposed, to take up the subject and form themselves into decades of ten, one of whom to collect the subscriptions and hand the Monthly collection to the Treasurer of the Society: by such organization a larger number would join, and thereby further the usefulness of this Society which has for its object the Propagation of the Faith to distant places which are still in darkness and in the shadow of death.

We think it the bounden duty of every good Catholic to come forward and support this laudable institute, more particularly as the Society has afforded pecuniary aid to the Mission of Bengal from its funds.

FEAST OF THE CONCEPTION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

RECEPTION OF NUNS.

Yesterday, being the Feast of the Conception of the B. V. M., a solemn High Mass was celebrated at St. Thomas' Church by his Lordship Bishop Borghi: and as it was a fit opportunity for a holy purpose, the solemnity of the service was heightened by the interesting ceremony of two ladies taking the Religious Habit. We were gratified to observe so good an attendance on this occasion. It is as it should be, that the Catholics of this country not only join in the celebration of these solemnities, but together participate in the joy thereby imparted to all who feel deeply for the well-being and spread of our holy religion. We have indeed much reason, at every moment, to pour forth our humble gratitude to Almighty God for the many blessings which, within a very short period, He has been pleased to vouchsafe to us;—and the establishment of a colony of Nuns, which is now yearly increasing in number, is one of the most prominent boons that call for our most heartfelt thanks.

The spiritual field of India, for the improvement of which the Almighty has in His mercy sent us such faithful labourers, does thus show its richness in the grace of God, by beginning to yield the fair blossoms and fruit we now see springing around us. It required only the care and seed it now obtains, the watering and culture it experiences, to show forth the beauty and power of Catholicity here. May the Almighty spare and increase the number of the zealous labourers in this our vineyard, and grant us the grace to be grateful for His mercies and kindness in thus securing to us the means for our spiritual welfare.

After a most eloquent and appropriate sermon by the Most Rev. the Archbishop, which we are sorry we are unable for want of time, to give any detail—a collection was made for the benefit of the Catholic Orphanage.

PERSECUTION OF SLANDER—EDINBURGH REVIEW: BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.

We shall now conclude our extracts from the article entitled Persecution of Slander &c. in the Dublin Review.

"Mr. Borrow boasts of the extensive reading and knowledge of the Bible, and the fruits thereof in England: nor is he the first who has so boasted. Indeed so often and so confidently has this assertion been made, and so commonly admitted, that one is disposed to think it must be true, because it is so common. But what is the fact? that Bibles without number are printed, that the Bible is very much talked about, that countless copies of it are distributed, and that it is read from different motives, and for various objects, by very many—all this we willingly admit. But that the people of England are in the smallest degree more remarkable for their knowledge of the Bible than any other nation in Europe, this we utterly deny. For, in the first place, it is a fact admitted by those who are most interested in denying it, that England is far behind the continental nations in the knowledge of Biblical literature; and that even the small knowledge existing in England is taken second-hand, and badly taken, from the works of the scholars of Italy, Germany, &c. We have not space to go into much detail, but let us take a few instances. Horne's Introduction is admitted to be, or at least to have been until very recently, the most learned work of its kind in English. Truly the recommendations of it given by most respectable authorities, would, if printed together, line half the trunks of Fishamble-street. Now, Horne's work is about one of the most stupid, inaccurate, ill-written, ill-digested books we have ever read upon any subject. The writer shews throughout an ignorance of history, languages, Theology, Scripture; his style is as good as that of Lord Castlereagh's speeches, his reasonings as just as Tom Paine's, his opinions as sound as Lord Brougham's, his facts as true as Borrow's, his decorum of language equal to that of an Orange newspaper. Even Davidson, who evidently loves the man, admits this much of the work: 'He [Horne] cannot be said to have written a well-digested, well-reasoned, ably written book—In fact the more I read of this work, the greater dissatisfaction I felt, and the more inaccuracies, as they appeared to me, did I meet with. However much, therefore, this Introduction has been held up to the public as ‘a complete,’ ‘invaluable,’ ‘unrivalled,’ &c. &c.,* it will be unsatisfactory to the patient inquirer.” Credner (quoted ibid.) says ‘that Horne’s Introduction is the most approved work of this kind in England; but to German theologians it is of no consequence.” The inferiority of Marsh, Bloomfield, and the rest of the English Biblical scholars, to those of the continent, is equally undeniable. Even such compendiums as those of Glaire (Paris, 1839-41), or Moralia (Rome, 1828-9), or Jahn (Vienna, v. y.), though the last named is rash and heterodox on several points, shew more real scholarship, and yield more solid information, than a whole ship-load of such English Protestant writers as we have been speaking of. As to the commentators, expounders of the sacred text itself, how dwarfish and feeble even the mightiest of English writers appear beside such men as Cornelius à Lapide, Estius, Calmet, N. Alexander, Maldonatus, and a host of others. Bloomfield’s annotations, when compared even with the very condensed comments of Menochius, or Pequigny, remind us of nothing so much as the croakings of old  or the eternal pal-lal of the idiot boy in Blackwood’s Magazine.

“In the second place, with regard to the general knowledge of the Scriptures in England, and still more the fruits of Bible-reading in that country, we cannot conceive folly more reckless than in appealing to such a test. We have seen in our own days—not to go further back—fruits indeed of Bible reading, but not such as Mr. Borrow would be likely to boast of. We have seen swarm after swarm of the most hideous monsters of superstition and infidelity, springing up from the very bosom of Protestant England, and spreading far and wide, and drawing away thousands and tens of thousands of willing worshippers. Hardly a year passes away without giving birth to some new sect, each surpassing its predecessors in blasphemy; until at last atheism, open and avowed atheism, is professed, preached, published, circulated by Socialists and other such denominations, whose very names make our ears tingle to hear. Who has not heard of Anna Southcott, with her long train of followers and favourers,—among whom were numbered at least one of the English Protestant Bishops, several ministers, and many wealthy and highly respectable persons (one of whom left her an estate of £250 per annum), and for the revival and extension of whose sect, all that was required, according to the Edinburgh Review itself, was that some active and eloquent preacher, like Whitfield or Wesley, should arise to trumpet it forth. Yet Johanna was a diligent reader of the Scriptures, from her earliest years; so were her followers; so were the followers of others like her, before and after her time,—Thom and the rest,—the mere catalogue of whose names would fill several pages of our journal.

“But facts have, within the last year, come to light upon the clearest testimony, which show how foolish it is in Mr. Borrow to hold forth England as an example of the influence of Protestantism and Bible reading, in forming the religious principles, and strengthening the virtuous dispositions of the people. We need but refer to the extracts given in our last number from the evidence on the condition of the working classes. The very fundamental articles of the Christian faith,—the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, nay, the very existence of the Redeemer, utterly unknown among large masses of the lower orders in England! the most degrading vices raging among them, as a pestilence; covering them as with the deep sea of iniquity! How our souls burned within us, as we read the heart-rending details of the havoc which impiety has made among so many thousands of those who boast to be the most enlightened,—who boast to be, and who are, the most powerful people in the world! If, in the bitterness of our hearts, we invoked some scourge upon the children of that nation, which inflicted so many ages of wrong upon our native land, what greater calamity could we desire than this? But God forbid—O! God forbid, that, in feeling as Irishmen, we should cease to feel as Christians—as Catholics. God forbid that the first and ruling sentiments of our hearts should be any other than those of pity and compassion for the appalling condition of these wretched people, upon whose heads the pride, and the lust, and the rapacity of the powerful and wicked men, who severed England from the centre of Catholic unity, has brought down this most terrible of maledictions,—to be delivered up to darkness of mind, and hardness of heart. God forbid that we should not mourn over the misery of the poor children, sixteen and eighteen years old, who said, in their examination, that they had never heard of Jesus Christ,—that they never prayed,—that they knew no prayer,—that they were never taught to pray.* But what shall we say of those who, born in this wilderness of living death, dwelling in the seat of these abominations, go out thence into foreign climes to sow there the seeds of the same pestilence, which has desolated their native land; who point, for a proof of the knowledge and fruits of indiscriminate Bible reading, to the very country where by such multitudes God is unworshipped, and the name of Jesus hardly known, and where the very existence of the Deity is practically denied by thousands. Out upon this audacious hypocrisy! Stay at home, ye vagabond slanderers, and try to convert your own brethren to a simple knowledge of the existence of God, before you venture abroad to teach Christ crucified to nations that know him with a knowledge, and love him with a love, infinitely beyond what you possess, or can understand. Stay at home, and ere you venture to pull down the altars of God's own temple, first demolish the hideous idol that is worshipped among yourselves, and by yourselves; first teach the daughters of your land,—who become mothers by the thousands, ere they have well ceased to be little children,—teach them that the fornicator and the adulterer shall not see the glory of God. O, there was a time—before the period of Henry's murders and Cranmer's perjuries—when such a lesson would not so need to be taught. "Qui ergo alium doces, teipsum non doces: qui prædicas non furandum, furaris: qui dicis non mœchandum, mecharis: qui abominaris idola, sacrilegium facis." Take the beam out of your own eyes, ere you examine the mote in your neighbours': shew that the indiscriminate reading of the Bible has improved yourselves, before you force it as a boon upon others: break your own chains, ere you go forth as apostles of freedom to break the chains of those who are already free."

* Davidson, “Lectures on Biblical Criticism,” p. 382. See also Wright’s translation of “Seiler’s Biblical Hermeneutics,” where the gross ignorance manifested in some of Horne’s remarks on the Latin Vulgate is exposed, note, p. 404.

In alluding to the evidence afforded by Mr. Borrow's own narrative of the complete failure of his attempts to propagate protestantism, the Reviewer exclaims:—

"O, Protestantism!—Protestantism! the curse of barrenness is on thee. Thou dwellest in the fortress of the most powerful nation in the world; the swords of invincible armies flame around thee in thy defence; the gold of many conquered tribes, and of many plundered shrines is flung into thy lap; the ways of the earth are made clear before thee, wherever the "white-winged commerce" of England shines; and courage and wisdom and eloquence and learning wait upon thee. For three centuries have thine heralds trumpeted thee forth in the ears of men; and thou hast smitten with thy sceptre of power those who stood against thee, and broken their earthly might into pieces; and those thou couldst not strike, thou hast tried to bribe with thy gold; and those thou couldst not bribe, thou hast tried to debauch with the 'wine of thy fornications.' And there thou art, like her,* who chiefly made thee what thou art, withered and withering, wooing, but never winning, with none, out of thy narrow dwelling-place, who truly love thee; none who yield thee the homage of the heart.†"

BURRISAL CATHOLIC MISSION.

TO THE MOST REVEREND DR. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa and
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY DEAR LORD,—The only apology which I can offer for troubling your Grace with the subject of this letter, is that necessity has no law; and that when all other resources fail me, I must have recourse to your Grace at last in all my missionary wants. I hope your Grace will not be frightened when I say that I want 2,400 Rs. to meet a most urgent necessity, or at least your Grace's permission to appeal to the charity and generous zeal of the Catholics of Calcutta by laying before them the wants of religion in Burrisal and the neighbouring district.

A congregation of about 1,000 Catholics in this locality are quite unprovided with a suitable place of worship, and the means of a useful and religious education for their children, and while they deeply lament their spiritual wants, they feel that the utmost exertion on their part if left to themselves, would fail to supply an adequate remedy.

The Civil Judge of the district, Mr. Loughnan, to whom too much praise cannot be given for the lively interest he takes in the welfare of our holy religion and in the advancement of every good undertaking, has generously contributed the sum of 700 Rs. towards the building of a Church and School Rooms, and the subjoined list of contributions will prove that the Catholics in general are neither indifferent to their spiritual wants nor unwilling to coöperate with their pastor in removing them to the extent of their very slender means. The list contains the names of several Protestants, and while this circumstance cannot fail to awaken our grateful admiration of their goodness and liberality, I trust it will show to the Catholics of Calcutta more satisfactorily than any thing

* Elizabeth.

† "We think it a most remarkable fact that no Christian nation, which did not adopt the principles of the Reformation before the end of the sixteenth century, should ever have adopted them. Catholic communities have, since that time, become infidel and become Catholic again; but none has become Protestant."—Edinburgh Review, No. cxiv. p. 255.

* See our last number, p. 354, &c.—ED. D. R.

I could say, how much sympathy the spiritual destitution of my poor people is capable of exciting, if fully understood.

On the lowest calculation 4,000 Rs. will be necessary to erect a convenient Church, competent School Rooms, and a small residence for the clergyman. Of this sum 1,600 Rs. have been already realized on paper from the congregation and our good Protestant neighbours, and for the remaining 2,400 I will knock, with your Grace's permission, at the door of charity in Calcutta.

I am fully aware of all that the Catholics of Calcutta have lately done and still continue to do to alleviate the wants of religion and poverty among themselves, and I feel that nothing less than the peculiarly distressing case of their fellow Catholics in Burrial could justify me in coming before them with an appeal of this ure. I assure your Grace that it has cost me an effort to plead the cause of religion and education on this occasion, and that, knowing how charity and zeal and generosity are already taxed in behalf of the widow and the orphan as well as of religion and science, I could not prevail on myself to solicit contributions in Calcutta, even for objects so holy, without your Grace's previous consent and approbation; and I would not ask your Grace's consent to do so, if I thought it would injure in any way the charitable Institutions more immediately under your Grace's pastoral and fatherly superintendence.

I remain, my Dear Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient servant,
AUGUSTUS GOIRAN.
Missionary Apostolic.

Calcutta, Dec. 6, 1843.

TO THE REV. AUGUSTUS GOIRAN.

REV. DEAR SIR,—It gives me great pleasure to sanction your zealous undertaking and contribute my mite of fifty rupees towards its success. I feel deeply grateful to the Protestants and Catholics of your district, and very particularly to Mr. Loughnan and Mr. Sturt for the kind encouragement and attention they have shown to you and to your Rev. Colleague on this and on every other occasion in which you or Mr. Zubibarne stood in need of their patronage. Praying that God may bless your pious labours,

I remain, Rev. dear Sir,
Yours Faithfully in Christ,

CIRCULAR.

The Catholic inhabitants of the station must utter destitution of the means of practising, and obtaining instruction in their religion, and to supply these necessities it is proposed to raise by subscription sufficient funds to provide a Church, a residence for a Clergyman, and a school room, which being done every hope may be entertained that His Grace the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of the Bengal Mission, who has every wish to do so, may be shortly able to appoint a Priest, to be maintained by the Mission, to the station.

It is estimated that the sum of 3000 or 4000 Rupees would be sufficient to erect or procure buildings commensurate to the present extent of the Catholic Community. Its members are therefore earnestly solicited to co-operate in an undertaking so much to their advantage by subscribing to the extent of their means; as however they are for the most part not in a condition to effect this object by their own unaided efforts, the more wealthy residents friendly to the cause of morality and religious instruction are respectfully requested to contribute.

THE MOST REV. DR. FOLDING.

ADDRESS OF STAFF.

His Grace the Most Reverend Douglas Folding gave audience, on Thursday last, to the Very Rev. F. B. Geoghegan, Vice-Chancellor of Australia Felix, for the purpose of receiving an address from the Roman Catholic hierarchy of that district. There were present on the occasion the Very Reverend F. Murphy, Vicar General; Rev. John McEneaney, Dr. Gregory, Secretary to the Archbishop; Rev. Don Garret, Rev. Mr. Bourgeois, President of St. Mary's Seminary; Rev. Messrs. Fitzpatrick, Slater, Magraith, Fairbairn, and several other of the gentlemen attached to the establishment. The address was presented by the Very Rev. F. B. Geoghegan, and had appended to it the real signatures of 579 male adults, an agreeable fact, as showing the immense Catholic population of the southern district, and their advanced state of educational acquirements:—

THE DUTIFUL AND CONGRATULATORY ADDRESS
Of the Clergy and Catholics of Australia Felix, to His Grace the Most Reverend Father in God, John Bede, Lord Archbishop of Sydney and Metropolitain.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,

We the Clergy and Catholics of Australia Felix, affectionately congratulate your Grace on your safe return to the charge of your extensive spiritual jurisdiction. Long and earnestly did we unite our prayers with the rest of your devoted people for the consummation of this happy event, and not less joyfully were our acts of thanksgiving to Heaven commingled with theirs, in gratitude for your Grace's auspicious arrival, and especially on the occasion of your Grace's solemn assumption of your Archiepiscopal functions at the Holy Altar of your Metropolitan Cathedral.

Hitherto we have deferred the public expression of our feelings, in the almost certain prospect of being able to address your Grace in your own welcome presence; but having at length learned that the claims of the yet unopened and more urgent mission of the aborigines demanded your immediate attention, and that your visitation to this district must thereby be postponed, we could delay no longer to tender to your Grace the heartfelt tribute of our reverence for your high authority, of our filial attachment to your person, and of our veneration for your many virtues and dignified acquirements.

During your Grace's protracted absence, which no portion of your flock felt more keenly than ourselves, we were frequently comforted with the notice of your Grace's smiling and successful efforts for the advancement of the poor, and to the religious and moral rank of the enlightened nations of the other hemisphere. But as this brief address we cannot omit mentioning the enthusiasm and pious gratification experienced by us all, when intelligence reached us that the Sovereign Pontiff, struck with your apostolic zeal and labours, and deeply sympathising in the spiritual desolation of your wide error-ridden people, conferred the pallium on our beloved prelate, elevated your former Vicariate into a Metropolitan See, and ordained that your Grace should be assisted and comforted by three Princes of the Episcopate. We believe the Faith and in general the Catholic cause throughout the vast territories of Australia Felix.

God's blessing on your Grace's labours, and on the efforts of the flock to follow you in the path of duty.

our allegiance to the Chair of the Prince of the Apostles; these exalted charities, with which your Grace has been invested, would bind us in ties as endearing as they are indissoluble to the Holy See. Already have they embalméd the present Venerable Father of all the faithful in the purest affections of our hearts, nor can they fail to treasure up the name of Gregory XVI. through many a generation, like that of his Ancient and Sainted Predecessor, in gratitude for the tenderness of his pastoral solicitude, and in testimony of the Augustine, who at his mandate generously abandoned country, kindred and all, and bearing the Apostolic Commission over perilous seas, from one extremity of the globe to the other, founded the first See of the One, Holy, Apostolic, Catholic Church in the land of the Australians.

With the progress of Catholicity in this section of the Arch. Diocese, we respectfully prefer your Grace would become acquainted by your own personal investigation, when in a few months we anxiously expect to welcome your arrival in Australia Felix. For the present we are content to make an agreeable reference to Saint Francis' Church. In the place where only four years since was discoverable nothing but the neglected produce of ages, or the rude impress of the Children of the Wild, the Cross now raises its mystic form over a spacious, though unfinished edifice, in which a thousand at a time bend to the Sacred Mysteries of the Altar, where thousands have had the Gospel preached to them, and where the faithful are refreshed daily with the Sacraments of the Catholic Church.

The distressing depression of the times has not caused the zeal of the flock to abate. Few, it is true, if any, can now contribute largely; nevertheless, generous offerings from many, and more particularly from the limited substance of the laborious and the poor, have already accumulated a handsome sum, which encourages us to resume the building forthwith, and to hope, that the period is by no means distant when the completion of the Sacred Structure will enable us to solicit its consecration at your Grace's hands.

In conclusion, we renew our congratulations and our welcomes, and the sincere pledges of our reverence and affection for your Grace. Your great love for our spiritual welfare sufficiently assures us that we shall be often included in your prayers. Ours shall not cease to implore the Divine Grace of all good, that your Grace may live long to preside on the Archiepiscopal Throne, that your life may be as rich in apostolic virtues as in years of office, and that all your labours and toils may extend the Faith, may multiply the flock, may increase the joy of Heaven, and complete the consolation of your own heart.

Witnessed at the Cathedral of St. Mary, Sydney.

REPLY.

His Grace, whose reply was extremely pleasant, said that he felt the greatest pleasure in receiving the congratulatory and most affectionate address of the Clergy and Catholics of Australia Felix. He returned his thanks with such sentiments of joy and admiration to the devotion of Sydney and its vicinity, and to the efforts of the flock to follow him in the path of duty. He also expressed his great satisfaction in the progress of Catholicity in this section of the Arch. Diocese, and his hope that the period was not distant when the completion of the Sacred Structure would enable him to solicit its consecration at his hands.

his friends reciprocated all their feelings of attachment. Remote as Australia Felix was from his own residence, he had ever regarded it with the greatest anxiety. What, then, must have been his gratification, after his long and arduous absence, to find it in its present prosperous condition? Under Providence, who disposes all things, that province had received a gift by which the counties with which nature had so highly favoured it, are truly designated; but far more truly and happily have his beloved children embraced the beautiful land of their adoption by the monuments which their generous zeal has raised up to their holy religion. The sacred edifice which their pious liberality had constructed on so handsome a scale would be a most gratifying sight to him, when (as he purposed in an early period) he visited their district; it was not, however, the material but the invisible temple—the progress of their religious improvement—from which he expected the greatest consolation of heart. Often did he contemplate with delight the Christian charity which distinguished all denominations of the people of Australia Felix, and deeply pained was he to learn the interruption which that happy state of things experienced on a recent occasion—but he willingly believed the evil effects of that interruption would be but transitory—as clouds passing over the bright sky—that all traces of sorrow would soon disappear, and give place to those blessings of Charity and forbearance which there had been so long and so happily enjoyed—blessings which he earnestly encouraged the Clergy and Catholics of Australia Felix with their utmost exertions to restore and extend. He could not acknowledge with too many thanks the attachment and gratitude expressed towards the Holy See for the high privileges which had been conferred on this extensive mission. He assured them that the distance which separated them from the Sovereign Pontiff who so gloriously rules over the Church of God, tended to increase the more intensely his paternal solicitude in their behalf, and they did not overlook the late arrangements of his Holiness for the church of Australia, in regarding them as lasting proofs of the tender interest with which he has provided for its wants and advancement.

In conclusion, he must express his sincere approval of the piety, prudence, and zeal of the First Pastor, to whose care he entrusted the important mission of the Port Phillip district, and he hoped Providence would continue him in the long enjoyment of every blessing that the good will of his people, the parental affection of his superiors, and, above all, the grace of our Redeemer, the Prince of pastors, could confer.—Australasian Chronicle, Dec 21st.

SITUATION OF IRELAND.

IVTH. ARTICLE.

Continuation of the second period—Cromwell.

Ireland, whom we have had before occasion to call a Protestant clergyman, exposes, in the following terms, the object of the creative commission which we are treating of:—

The main object of the Irish govern[ment] and of the English parliament was the entire extirpation of all the Catholic inhabitants of Ireland.

The first measure before-hand designed to be the should be loved, and also their property to an inevitable ruin (1).

"The parliamentary party (2) had raised it power and strength upon grounds which excluded the possibility of entering any feeling of tolerance towards the Roman Catholic religion, of sympathy or even humanity towards the Irish nation, and more especially towards the Irish of pure extraction. The said party had formed an association of the whole mass of these men."

Marston has written in the same sense as Ireland and Clarendon.

This plan of extermination was adopted and followed punctually. Modes of torture were so ingeniously and marvellously combined that nothing remains to be invented in that horrible line. In order to render executions more easy and expeditious, the inhabitants of whole villages were enclosed within the limits of their places of residence or in heaths; fire was afterwards lighted in several places, and to prevent the possibility of any poor fellow escaping, regiments formed round those immense funeral piles a line or cordon of guards, whosoever attempted to overpass was killed or driven back to the flames.

In other places, near the sea shore, the Irish prisoners were attached by couples, back to back, and in this manner launched into the sea.

Sad it is to remark that when two centuries and a half after this time, a monster of the name of Carrier tortured his victims at Nantes in the same dreadful manner, which then was called a republican marriage, this wretch was but a plagiary! But Carrier was brought and tried at the bar of the National Convention for the Noyades he had ordered while in England, those cruel deeds were judged quite differently. A Captain Swanley, who had a considerable number of Irish people thrown into the sea, and their only crime was to be born Irish, was brought before the House of Commons and "Taxes were voted to him for his good and loyal services, and a present made to him of a gold chain worth £200 Sig. (3).

But to Cromwell and his memorable exploits in Ireland.

When he entered Wexford, the gates of which place were thrown open before him by order of the mayoralty; his first act was to order a general slaughter of the inhabitants. De Lacyard, from public and authentic documents he was in possession of, quoted the following account: "Three hundred women has fled for refuge to the foot of a large cross standing in the principal square of the city. There, upon their knees, they cried for mercy, but all were put to the edge of the sword." Cromwell, in his report to the House of Commons says that two thousand were the number of inhabitants that perished in his entry, some writers carry it to six thousand—let us admit Cromwell's number, and shall we not call this a frightful butchery?

At Drogheda—A few weeks ago one of O'Connell's meetings took place at Drogheda and the same Mr. Cromwell having been invited by the speaker, the speech fell in that a dreadful massacre of the people, amongst the crowd, the following lines were recited:—

(1) O'Connell, B. V. ch. 4.

(2) Clarendon.

(3) Commons Journal, Vol. II. p. 417.

Yet this ingratitude did not detach Ireland from James's cause. When expelled from the throne of his father, he sought a refuge in Ireland and the Irish once more devoted themselves to him.

The battle of the Boyne decided the fate of this monarchy, but the Irish were not vanquished with him, since one year after, the 3d October, 1691, they obtained from William of Orange the capitulation of Limerick, which stipulated the conditions of their submission to the British crown. By this treaty, they were to be equally protected like the other subjects of the kingdom, and particularly they were to enjoy perfect liberties as regards the exercise of their religion. The crown of England was engaged by honor to guarantee the execution of the clauses of this treaty.

How these engagements were kept shall be exposed in the next article.—Calcutta Star, Oct. 19.

FATHER MATHEW IN LONDON.

In addition to the 180 boys of the St. Patrick's School who took the pledge at the Riding Academy, twenty-seven more of their body, in the company of their parents, received it during the day. Their exemplary and respected head master, Mr. Kelly (of the Christian Brothers) was on the platform, and appeared (as he did on the preceding day), highly gratified with the interesting spectacle. About thirty boys and girls belonging to Mr. (generally called Boutswain) Smith's "Sailor's Orphan Union," also took the pledge from Father Mathew. These children previously to the arrival of Father Mathew, were stationed in a cart near the market, and sang several hymns in chorus, lead by Mr. Smith. Amongst the speakers during the day were the Rev. J. Moore, Dr. Oxley, Mr. Buckingham, Jun., Mr. Buckley, Mr. Linoberg, and Mr. Boutswain Smith. The very rev. gentleman retired about half-past six o'clock. At one time of the day not less than 20,000 persons were present, and the flux and influx of visitors were unprecedented. More than 3,000 persons of both sexes, all ages and all creeds, took the pledge. One batch, about 350 strong, was called the Rev. Mr. Hearne's, of Somers-town. The greatest order prevailed, although there were scarcely any policemen present.

On Monday the noble champion of Temperance proceeded in a carriage and six, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. M'Avila, Mr. Teare, Mr. Linoberg, &c., to the Britannia-fields, Islington, where he was enthusiastically received. Attached to the capacious and well-arranged platform were several flags with the following inscriptions:—"Fidelity and Honesty Temperance Society." "Union is strength."—"Islington Temperance Society."—"St. Luke's Total Abstinence Society." "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." 1st Thess., chap. v., 21. After an introductory address from Father Mathew.

The Rev. Mr. M'AVILA, the respected pastor of the Catholic Church, Islington, came forward to the front of the hustings and loudly cheered. In the course of an appropriate address, he said that many persons had recently desired to behold the distinguished champion of Temperance, and to take the pledge at his hands. Their desire had been at length granted, and the glorious opportunity for which they had longed was at last afforded them. He was happy to state that already the thousands of converts to the Abstinence cause manifested in his district. The temple of God was more numerous attended on the Sabbath, and the streets were not so full of idle and dissipated persons as they were formerly. It would be scarcely possible to point out all the evils of intemperance—that vice which crowded the jails, the infirmaries, and the fatal asylums of the vast metropolis. He had during some time endeavoured to promote the cause of Total Abstinence in Islington, and he had partly succeeded in his object; still, he thought that he was bound to set his congregation an unequivocal example of self-denial, in order to encourage them; and he had, therefore, determined to take the pledge that day from Father Mathew. The rev. gentleman, after depicting in glowing terms the miseries of the drunkard's home, and the domestic comforts of the sober man; and after descanting on the pecuniary, moral, social, and religious advantages of Total Abstinence, sat down amidst general cheers.

After several batches had taken the pledge, and several speeches been made, Mr. GAWTHORPE delivered a long address, and stated that Alexander the Great, although he had vanquished so many nations, could not conquer himself, for he died a drunkard.

Mr. TEARE read a paragraph from a Liverpool paper, stating that a publican who on a certain day of the week, was in the habit of selling large quantities of brewed and distilled liquors, had sold 36l. worth less on the corresponding day, last week. He (Mr. Teare) would therefore propose three cheers for Father Mathew. The call was unanimously responded to.

Mr. EMANUEL LINOBERG (incorrectly written Lemberg in our last number), one of the vice-presidents of the Lincoln's Inn-fields Total Abstinence Society, was the next speaker. He stated that he had been a Total Abstinence during three years. He had been once nearly severely injured by a drunken man. One night he (Mr. Linoberg), whilst travelling in Brandenburg, reached a town in which all the inns were full. Not being able to get proper accommodation, he was glad to accept the offer of a tavern keeper to allow him to sleep in some straw in a corner of the public room. After he had laid down, a drunken man came in, and on being told that he (Mr. Linoberg) was a cap-seller (that being his trade at the time), vowed vengeance against him, because some other cap maker had sold him (the drunken man) a cap with a paper peak which was passed off for a leathern one. The intoxicated person seized hold of the snuffers, the only article within his reach, and began assaulting Linoberg, who was obliged to effect a hasty escape. The speaker then proceeded to state, that if Joseph of old so justly received honour from the people of Egypt because he had removed famine from the land, surely the illustrious Apostle of Temperance, he who had so greatly improved the condition of millions of human beings, most justly merited all the respect which could be manifested towards him.

After an eloquent address from Mr. HART, of the Temperance Hotel, Abchurch-lane.

Mr. M'CAMBRAY came forward to the front of the platform. He observed that there appeared to be some confusion in the ranks of London's Total Abstinence men in an early hour of the morning. He had heard that, however, when so many thousands were coming forward to take the pledge, ordered little for the interested opposition of certain individuals. The speaker, in humorous terms, explained the various ways in which publicans sought to attract people to their houses. Music was one of the attractions; that is to say, the cat-gut scraping of some blind fiddler, or the screeching tones of some old piper. Now, the music which he (Mr. McCarthy) liked was real Irish music—the roar of a pig with its throat cut. It was said that music charmed the savage breast, but such music as that he had referred to charmed the savage stomach. (Laughter, and cheers.) The working classes were bought and sold by publicans. In Liverpool, the proprietor of a public house near a large foundry refused 500*l.*, and demanded 700*l.* for his house, because it was near the Clarence foundry, where 7,000 men worked. Mr. McCarthy next explained the adulterations employed in brewed and distilled liquors; and stated that in 1822 a publican named Nolan was fined 200*l.* for making “port” wine from a mare’s flesh.

Mr. SMITH here stated that a gentleman of the University of Oxford had introduced several Protestant friends to Father Mathew, in order to enable them to take the pledge from him. The very rev. gentleman then repeated the words to several highly-respectable ladies and gentlemen on the platform.

Father MATHAW next introduced to the meeting, as a specimen of the good results of Total Abstinence, a respectable mechanic, from Cork, who had been a Total Abstainer during five years, and whose healthy and robust appearance spoke well for the system.

After the Apostle had administered the pledge to the next batch, a person in the crowd, who appeared to be a publican, cried out, “Come, tell us Father Mathew, how much you have got by that hatch?”

Mr. BRISCOMBE then came forward, and said, “If the gentleman who has just put that question will come on the platform, we will publicly answer him to his satisfaction, and to that of the meeting.” The person in question, however, declined to do so, amidst laughter and ironical cheers. Mr. BRISCOMBE then proceeded to say, that whilst the men of the north of England had become Total Abstinents, the natives of London, who were not so laboriously employed, and who were not half so large as those men, kept aloof from the glorious movement.

On Tuesday Father MATHAW, after celebrating mass and delivering a brief exhortation in the new Catholic Church of Islington, proceeded to the Britannia-fields, and ascended the platform about a quarter past twelve o’clock, amidst enthusiastic applause. Previously to his arrival, the meeting was addressed by Captain PILKINGTON, the peace advocate. After a brief introductory address, the very reverend gentleman administered the pledge to the first batch, about 100 persons.

J. MANNING, Esq., in the course of his address observed that no one could tell by Father Mathew’s language or conduct, to what class of Christians he belonged. He was no doubt a good Catholic priest, but if he continued going to such good to the country, he would be considered with as much respect as any Protestant clergyman. (Cheers.) The principle of Total Abstinence was first taken up by respectable tradesmen in London, and was afterwards adopted by the working classes who had shaped the minds. Drunkenness, however, was not confined to the lower orders, for there were amongst the higher classes, in proportion to numbers, as many drunkards as amongst the other orders of the community. On account of the position which he held as secretary of the British and Foreign Temperance Society, he often had received letters from various places, consulting him as to the best remedies for intemperance, and he had invariably prescribed Total Abstinence. Amongst other letters was one which he would read to the meeting. It was written by the wife of a respectable professional man. Mr. Meredith then read as follows:—“I have been informed that you are benevolently interested for a class of persons who have reduced themselves to a pitiable state of degradation by surrendering both body and mind to the domination and baneful habits of Intemperance. Even for such a character I am deeply interested—for one whose talents and position in society qualified him to be an ornament to the circle in which he moved; but who, alas! has fallen by degrees until at length he has become identified with almost the lowest grade. About nineteen years have rolled over my head since I was congratulated as the happiest of women. I was very young at the time, and the sun of temporal prosperity threw a flattering lustre over the long vista of futurity. Mr. ———— was, I believed, a Christian, and a member of some Christian Church, and I ardently hoped that we should walk in life and out of life in the hope of a blessed immortality. But how quickly was the scene reversed! Not one year had passed away before I could discover a gathering and threatening cloud hovering over me. His society was solicited by the gay and vicious, and was not solicited in vain.” The letter portrayed the misery, loss of character, &c. which ensued. Mr. Meredith then proceeded to say that he saw the unhappy man—discovered still in him some remnants of the gentleman and the scholar, but found that his constitution had been completely undermined by intoxicating liquors. Mr. Meredith concluded by expressing a hope that there would be a Total Abstinence meeting in Exeter Hall, or in the Honover-square Rooms, so that the higher classes might have the opportunity of taking the pledge.

Mr. LARNER was the next speaker. In order to illustrate his argument, that it was morally impossible to prevent drunkenness as long as moderate drinking existed amongst certain classes, he narrated an anecdote of Dean Swift and his servant. The latter, at the request of his eccentric master, agreed to drink the sea dry, at a certain time and a certain place. The promised feat was publicly announced, and thousands of persons assembled at the appointed spot near the coast. The servant being urged by the dean to fulfil his promise, replied—“I am quite ready to fulfil my engagement; but, master, although I have promised to drink the sea dry, I have not said that I would drink all the fresh-water rivers that flow into it. Do you then, or any of the gentlemen around you, stop up those rivers, and, on my honour, I shall be as good as my word.” (Laughter and cheers.) Now, said Mr. LARNER, we may do all we can to empty the sea of drunkenness; but long as the rivers of moderate drinking flow into we shall never empty the sea in our undertakings. (Cheers.)

Subsequent addresses were delivered by Mr. BROWN and Mr. WATSON. The latter gentleman stated that he was present at a meeting of a class of at which one of that body observed, that the sole object Father Mathew had in view was to undermine the church in England. The Bishop of Norwich, who was present, interrupted the rev. speaker and observed that he was convinced that Father Mathew was actuated by the purest, the most benevolent, and the most disinterested motives. (Loud cheers.)

About this period the following letter was handed to Father Mathew:—

"REVEREND SIR—It is with great sorrow I am now about taking the pledge from you to abstain from all fermented liquors, finding they are destroying my bodily health; and on account of the awful consequences which have happened to my nearest relatives through it. My only brother George, fifteen years ago, fell into Earl Godwin's canal, at Pimlico, drunk, and was found drowned next morning, leaving a widow and ten children. His eldest son, six years after, was seen drunk in a boat near the same canal, and found drowned. My eldest son, Thomas, was found drowned at London-bridge; he belonged to the police, and was drunk when he went on duty: hoping for the benefit of your prayers, I am, Sir, your obedient servant.

"THOS. BOND.

"Hatter at Mr. Anderson's, Edward-street, Blackfriars-road."

The very rev. gentleman expatiated on the heart-rending contents of that document, and in the course of an effective address observed, that had the working classes saved the millions of money which they had expended during fifty years on intoxicating liquors, they could purchase the whole fee simple of England.

Two policemen took the pledge on the platform, and offered to pay one shilling each for cards and medals, but the very rev. gentleman told them that he always presented every Teetotal policeman with a shilling to purchase a medal and card. For his part he never spoke in severe terms of distillers and publicans; those classes of persons were not to be so much blamed as people in wealthy circumstances, who were not obliged for a livelihood to sell intoxicating drinks, but who gave them away for the sake, as it was called, of hospitality.

Able addresses were delivered by Messrs. Hart, Donald, Crump, Teare, Buckingham, Jun., Green, and the Rev. Mr. Moore.

The Rev. Mr. M'Avila stated that 2,360 had taken the pledge during the two days, and that he expected his district would be greatly improved in a moral point of view.

During the day there were several slight attempts at disturbances, but they were repressed by the police, under Superintendent Johnson, whom Father Mathew, at the close of the proceedings, warmly thanked. The proprietor of the Eagle Tavern drove around the ground, and was greeted by his partizans with cries of "Bravo Rouse!" Father Mathew was visited during the day by several Protestant clergymen, including the Rev. Mr. Burnett, of Camberwell, and the Rev. Mr. Blackburn, of Islington.

On Wednesday the scene of the very rev. gentleman's labours was shifted to Paddington, near the Railway Hotel of the Great Western. Previously to his arrival the distinguished gentleman breakfasted at the Hon. Stafford Jerningham's, where he met Lord Brougham, Lord Glenelg, Lord Petre, the Hon. E. Petre, the Hon. Mrs. Petre, Mr. P. H. Howard, M. P., Mr. Milnes, M. P., &c. &c. On the platform before the rev. gentleman's arrival, we perceived the Hon. S. Jerningham, Lady Dawson Damer, the Hon. Mrs. Petre, &c. &c.

Mr. Hart, in order to keep the people on the ground until Father Mathew arrived, addressed the meeting at some length, and expressed, in humorous but good-natured terms, a hope that Lord Brougham, who had met Father Mathew that morning at breakfast, would yet take the pledge from him.

Mr. Hart was followed by Mr. Teare; at the conclusion of whose speech Father Mathew arrived. He was received with general cheers, although there were apparently numbers present who were opposed to Total Abstinence principles. The procession which escorted him to the place was headed by a number of females, dressed in white, one of whom bore a flag, with the inscription, "Welcome Father Mathew to Paddington." A large flag was also displayed amidst the procession, thus inscribed: "Lisson Grove and Paddington Auxiliary." As soon as the females in white reached the platform they sang "God save the Queen." After an introductory speech from Father Mathew, he proceeded to administer the pledge. An address was read to him by J. Dunlop, Esq. Several addresses were delivered by various speakers.

Amongst other gentlemen who visited Father Mathew on the platform during the day, were the Rev. Messrs. O'Neal, Siak, Sullivan, Moore and Furlong, Catholic priests; and the Rev. Jabez Burns, Baptist minister. Some slight attempts at disturbance were made, but were easily repressed. It is but fair, however, to add, that to Father Mathew personally all possible respect was universally shown. About 1,000 took the pledge.

On Thursday, Father Mathew resumed his labours in Mr. Monroe's fields, Enfield, where the ardently expected gentleman arrived about half-past twelve o'clock. A highly-respectable, though not very numerous company, had assembled to meet him; who on his arrival, made the air resound with enthusiastic applause.

The very rev. gentleman, after some prefatory observations, said that he had read in the Times of that morning some observations which were reported to have been made by one of the speakers at Paddington the other day, in reference to a distinguished nobleman—distinguished by his talents and reputation—Lord Brougham. Indeed he (Father Mathew) had scarcely recovered from the anxiety and uneasiness which he had felt after reading those remarks.

An address during the day was presented to Father Mathew by Mr. Loudon. Speeches were delivered by Mr. Teare (the indefatigable advocate of Total Abstinence), Mr. M'Carthy (a very humorous speaker), Mr. Hart (who denied the correctness of the report of his speech in the Times of that morning), Dr. Oxley, Mr. Loudon, Mr. Green, &c. &c. The visitors during the day included Lady Elizabeth Pulk, Lady Eleanor Lowther, Dr. Greenfield, rector of Enfield, Mrs. Nash, of Edmonton, E. Williams, and E. G. Williams, Esq., local magistrates, besides several members of the Society of Friends, &c. Several tents for the accommodation of the spectators were pitched on the grounds, and were well furnished with provisions of all kinds. The very rev. gentleman, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Moore and other gentlemen, left the grounds at about a quarter to eight o'clock, amidst enthusiastic cheers. About 400 persons took the pledge during the day. It was stated that on the next day (Friday), and on the following Saturday and Sunday he would attend St. Giles's. He is to say nine o'clock mass to-morrow (Sunday), at the Catholic Chapel, Chelsea, and is to be at Blackheath on next Monday. He is to be near the Penitentiary, Millbank, on Wednesday and Thursday, and in Bermondsey on Friday and Saturday.—Tablet.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

A Search made into Matters of Religion. By Francis Walsingham, Deacon of the Protestant Church, before his change to the Catholic. A new Edition. London: Dolman, 1843.

This is the first of a series of volumes under the name of the ENGLISH CATHOLIC LIBRARY, being reprints of some extremely scarce and valuable works, from the pens of our earlier and ablest controversialists, and for which we are indebted to the enterprising zeal of Mr. Dolman. The design of the ENGLISH CATHOLIC LIBRARY, is thus stated in the publisher's advertisement.

"When it is recollected that, at the present time, the most unceasing attacks are made upon our holy religion through the medium of the press, and that a society (the Parker) has been formed, which is now in active operation, for the avowed purpose of republishing the writings of FRITH, TINDAL, CRAMMER, LATIMER, RIDLEY, JEWELL, RAINOLDS, PARKER, FULKE, FOX, and many other of the English sectaries,—it becomes an imperative duty upon Catholics, to meet these attacks in the most effectual manner, by reproducing the masterly and triumphant replies of SIR THOMAS MORE, BISHOPS FISHER, GARDINER, CARDINAL ALLEN, HARDING, STAPLETON, SANDERS, BRISTOW, PERSONS, WALSINGHAM and others, written in defence of our holy religion, and most admirably calculated to counteract the evil effects which the dissemination of sectarian writings is likely to produce."

This new edition of the "SEARCH" is reprinted from the second edition, printed in 1615, with no other change than the substitution of the modern orthography, and the correction of mere typographical errors. The edition in the second to the text of the first edition, is printed within brackets, and the omissions in the second edition are reproduced at the foot of the page—by which judicious arrangement, we have the two early editions of 1609 and 1615 entire. The editor also informs us, in his excellent preface, that on almost every point of importance, the author's quotations have been confronted with the writers, to whom he appeals, and that the examination has furnished very satisfactory evidence of his habitual carefulness and accuracy.

Of the merits of the work, we are enabled from experience to speak very highly, for it has been our companion for many years; and we think that the Editor has been peculiarly happy in selecting it as the opening volume of the ENGLISH CATHOLIC LIBRARY. We cordially join the learned Editor in "The expression of a hope that the present work (and those that are to follow it) will revive in the minds of British Catholics, just feelings of veneration and gratitude, towards the great men who fought the great fight of faith, under disadvantages, which we in our present position, can but inadequately estimate, and bequeathed unto after-times such a rich store of saving knowledge, that it will induce our separate brethren to reconsider the grounds of their estrangement from the inheritors of the old faith which these men taught, and for which several of them bled; in fine, that these good books may serve to advance that desirable consummation for which we pray—our all coming into one, and being perfected in the same mind and same understanding."

Among the works which we have observed are shortly to be published, is the Monasticon Scoticanum, by W. B. B. D. Turnbull, Esq. It is a matter of great surprise to us, that in a country like Scotland, which once possessed so many splendid monasteries, and which has so many memorials of this happy state of society, there should have been no work of this kind. This may, perhaps, have been owing to the bigoted prejudice against any thing Catholic (or Popish as it was called) which we hope is now becoming obsolete, and giving place to a purer taste and more correct feeling. We wish Mr. Turnbull every success in his undertaking, and confidently recommend his work to our readers.

We have received from M. de St. Priest a prospectus of the Encyclopædia of the Nineteenth Century,—a universal compendium of science, literature, and art, with a biography of celebrated men. From the specimens which we have seen of this work, and from the known character of its projectors, we can with confidence introduce it to the notice of our Catholic countrymen. The "Encyclopædia of the Nineteenth Century" will possess advantages which are not to be found in any other. In the department of biography, the encyclopædias of the present day are very defective, particularly on the subjects which are most interesting to Catholics. It has many times happened to us that we have been unable to find any account of some illustrious writer of the early Church; while in turning over the pages of encyclopædias, we continually find much space devoted to the account of some obscure Protestant divine, whose history elsewhere is already involved in the obscurity it deserves. It is also no small annoyance, to say the least, to find the most indifferent articles converted into pegs on which to hang sly sneers and would be witty jibes about Popish ignorance and superstition, dark ages, &c. &c. We could forgive this, did we not frequently also find gross misstatements of facts relating to religious matters, which are calculated seriously to mislead the public. We would not be understood in these remarks to point at any particular work. They will apply, more or less, to most of those in use, and will show the advantage of having one compiled by Catholics. The general diffusion of the French language will render this work nearly as useful to us, as if it were written in our own. We must not omit to mention what is no doubt a very important consideration also,—viz. that the price for the fifty-two volumes is very moderate.—Catholic Magazine.

MISSION TO THE INDIANS—The Rev. Messrs. Olscamp and Payement have returned from their mission to the Indians of St. Maurice, having baptized twenty adults and six infants, admitted twenty-six adults to their first communion, and celebrated three marriages. They advanced to Kekenduche of the Bullet-headed Indians, all the natives were delighted with the advent of their apostles, and grieved at their departure; the missionaries were gratified with the progress in religion of their aboriginal eleven.

MISCELLANEA.

THE NEW PEAL OF JOY-BELLS FOR THE CHURCH OF ST. PAUL'S.—A splendid peal of joy-bells, the first complete set that has been cast in Ireland since the time of the Deformation, has just been manufactured in Mr. Sheridan's Eagle Foundry, Church-street, for the use of the new Catholic Church of St. Paul, on Arran-quay. Five of the bells were manufactured in the course of the last fortnight, and the sixth, which completes the set, was cast at eight o'clock on Saturday evening last. The vicar-general of the diocese, with several other clergymen, and many of the resident Catholic gentry of the parish, were present to witness the process of manufacture, and appeared to derive much gratification from the sight. The following words will be inscribed upon the globe of the bell:—"This Bell was presented by the Ladies to the Church of St. Paul, Arran-quay, Dublin. The Very Rev. Dr. Yore, V.G., P.P. James Sheridan, maker, 1843." The process of manufacture being concluded, the five bells, which are already completed, chimed a merry peal to the iron mallets of the smiths, and the company of visitors retired evidently highly gratified.—Freeman.

The Superioress of the House of Mercy in Baggot-street, Dublin, with seven other religious ladies of that convent, sailed from Kingstown, on Monday evening last, in order to take possession of the new establishment in Liverpool. The Superioress, it is expected, will return to the parent house after having laid the foundation of all things connected with the new and interesting branch, which it is expected will be fruitful of lasting benefits to religion and charity.

Died, on the 26th instant, in the 54th year of his age, the Rev. John Carter, who, for upwards of eighteen years, was parish priest of Donoughmore, near this town. The chapel of Bar was built through his exertions, and in that churchyard he was buried on Monday last. Requiescat in Pace.

It is proposed to raise a monument in Cork, his native city, to the memory of the illustrious John England, the late beloved Bishop of Charleston.

TORONTO.—Some Jesuits had arrived in New York to establish themselves at Sandwich, in this diocese. The Brothers of the Christian Doctrine who accompanied them are still at Montreal.

PUSEYISM IN MALTA.—The feeling in society is gradually becoming strengthened that Puseyism is to be imposed upon the Malta Protestants under the auspices of the new bishopric.—Malta Times.

SPAIN.—A letter from Seville states that Baron Tylor has delivered over to the ecclesiastical chapter of that city, as presents from Louis Philippe, a magnificent portrait of Christopher Columbus, and two other remarkably fine works of art.

AMERICA.

HARLEM.—Mr. Bayley, formerly minister of the Episcopal church in Harlem, N. Y., has recently been to Oxford and Rome. The Evangelist says that he has been so smitten with the beauties of Romanism, that he will come back to this country a Popish priest; and that a certain Congregational minister has also gone to Oxford, and will probably follow Mr. Bayley's track clear round. The sooner the better.—Presbyterian. Undoubtedly.—Catholic Herald of Philadelphia, Aug. 10.

ANGLICAN DOCTRINE.—Bishop Doane and the Banner of the Cross insist that Dr. Pusey has not gone beyond the limits of Anglican doctrine on the Eucharist, which is, likewise, that of genuine Episcopalians in America. Unfortunately he has not advanced far enough for us to claim him as our own.—Ibid.

LINES TO A YOUNG NUN.

And I will tread the virtuous peaceful paths
Of her who trod the subtle serpent's head,
And wears the silver crescent on her own.

Say, what enjoyment dost thou find
In thy retreat so sadly lone,
To make thee ever leave behind
Thy father's house, thy native home?
What made thy heart so soon despise
The dance, the banquet, and the song,
Those pastimes that the world so prize,
Vain baubles of the idle throng?

It was religion's holier charm
That could alone true peace impart;
Yes! in thine eyes we view the calm
Wherewith it fills the virgin heart!
'Twas Mary's pure angelic life,
Which thou to follow well did strive;
That when all earth with doubt was rife,
Kept thy devotion's lamp alive.

Holy life's a light that guides
Her young disciples on their way—
A star whose purer glittering hides
The fainter radiance of the day.
Go tell thy wondering friends that pause,
Astonished at thy lonely cell,
How dear to thee the sacred laws
That made thee bid the world farewell:

Tell them the holy joy thou felt'st
When first forc'd from its ties to part,
That solemn morning when thou knelt'st
To make the offering of thy heart:
When first all chains to earth were broken,
Each link to every worldly thing;
And thou accepted, as a token,
The vestal veil, the beads, the ring!

Yes! tell the crowd profanely light,
How fully thou hast been repaid,
What safe and undisturbed delight
Follow the sacrifice then made,
How calmly now pass on thy hours—
E'en death has lost its wonted gloom;
Thou seem'st to view the freshest flowers
Adorn the pathway to the tomb.

'Twas for a solitude secure
Thou early fled the flippant crowd;
And now thy heart, unstained and pure,
Fears not the pall, the bier, the shroud!
Behold the Bridegroom cometh now,
How sweet his words will be to thee:
*I come to recompense thy vow,
And make thy happy spirit free!*

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1843.

[VOL. V.]

LORETTO HOUSE—RECEPTION OF NUNS.

When we last went to press we had to regret our inability to do more than allude to the interesting ceremony which we witnessed at St. Thomas' Church on the 8th instant, and congratulate our fellow Catholics on the consolation which, in a land like this, such a solemnity must impart to every one interested in the prosperity of our holy religion.

The two ladies admitted to the white veil on the occasion, were Mademoiselle Bontel and Mrs. Kelly, the Widow of the late Ensign Kelly of H. M. 50th Regt. The attendance was rather more numerous than the church could conveniently admit, many being obliged to stand during the entire ceremony. Among other highly respectable personages present, we noticed General Avitabile, late Governor of Peshawur, who seemed to partake in the solemn and tender feelings which the occasion was so well calculated to inspire. We beg to be excused from entering into particulars about the music which seemed to us to be very impressive and appropriate, if not enrapturing. The sweet Italian voice of the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi, who sang the Mass and officiated on the occasion, is too well known to the Catholics of Calcutta to require any observation from us in a passing notice like this. We will not dwell on the rich dresses in which the pious Postulants presented themselves at the altar to be interrogated on the subject of their vocation to the Conventual life, nor on the heavenly appearance of the little ones who supported their trains in the sanctuary, in the smiling but respectful attitude of angels employed before the throne of God, in the ministrations of love. We will not even attempt to describe the sensation which the exchange of a magnificent worldly dress by the Postulants for the demure and penitential habit of religion, appeared to cause in every one who beheld it.

We wish merely to make one observation before we proceed to give a scanty outline of the Sermon delivered on the occasion by our beloved and venerated Archbishop, whose language served as a key to the picture which the ceremony presented.

We would ask our Protestant friends ;—we would ask even an infidel who has not lost the feelings which the benevolence of humanity inspires, could a more consoling and affecting spectacle be witnessed than a young lady generously and cheerfully (because it was her choice) consecrating herself body and soul for life to the service of the God who made her, for her own sanctification and for the spiritual advantage of her neighbour without distinction of persons ? No one could read the history of Leonidas without weeping in tender approbation of his patriotism ; who could read the history of a Pagan going into voluntary exile for the sake of an ungrateful country, and be unmoved by such heroic disinterestedness ; and can we hear without emotion, or see with dry eyes, a young female in the flower of youth, putting off the garb of vanity, assuming the costume of religion, and declaring in the sight of men and Angels, her ardent desire to leave the world for the sake of those who live in the world, as well as in obedience to the call of her Creator, who invites her into solitude that he may speak to her heart in the silence of retreat. Du cum eam in solitudinem et loquar ad cor ejus.

Immediately after the Gospel was chaunted, the Archbishop ascended the pulpit and proceeded to address the dense congregation, with that eloquence, force and perspicuity for which his Grace's discourses are so remarkable. His text was from 1 Cor. 7. 29. “ This therefore I say brethren, the time is short : it remaineth that they also who have wives be as if they had none" and from Dan. 12. 3. "And they that instruct many to justice shall shine as stars for all eternity."

In illustration of the first part of the text from St. Paul "the time is short," his Grace dwelt with the happiest effect on several passages from the Books of Job and Ecclesiasticus, particularly the following "all those things passed away like a shadow and like a post that runneth on; and as a ship that passeth through the waves, whereof when it is gone by, the trace cannot be found or the path of its keel in the waters, or as when a bird flieth through the air, of the passage of which no mark can be found but only the sound of the wings beating the light air and parting it by the force of her flight; or as when an arrow is shot at a mark, the divided air presently cometh together again, so that the passing thereof is not known, so we also, being born forthwith ceased to be.... such things as these the sinners said in hell, "Spare me O Lord for my days are nothing; For man comes forth and is crushed as the flower and never abides in the same state." After abundant proofs and illustrations to this effect, the Most Rev. Preacher continued: If therefore the time be short, if human life be but as the passing of a shadow, if man's existence on earth be but a translation of him from the womb to the grave, what are the inferences which reason and religion will alike dictate to him. Ask the Apostle Paul and he will tell you: "It remaineth that they also who have wives be as if they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as if they rejoiced not; and they that buy as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as if they used it not: for the fashion of this world passeth away." "It remaineth," mark the Apostle's words, "that they also who have wives be as if they had none &c." that is to say, such is the inference, the inevitable conclusion which arises from the awful unquestionable truth. The time is short. This then is a consequence which according to the Apostle is at once the offspring of right reason and religion. Mark how naturally, how beautifully the Catholic doctrine of a religious or conventual life is deduced from the Apostle's words. Yes, holy Virginity as recommended by the Catholic Church is nothing but the flower in full bloom, which grows into maturity from the grain planted by Saint Paul. For if the inference be true, that it remaineth, because the time is short, that they who have wives be as if they had none, then is the conclusion equally just, that it remaineth, that they who have husbands be as if they had none. for in their regard as well in what relates to every thing human, the reason assigned by St. Paul admits neither of doubt nor exception, viz. The figure of this world passeth away." * * * * * Were it given me to explore the secret thoughts, to call into sensible existence the smothered sighs, the silent and suppressed sorrows, the stifled anguish and bitterness of soul which the world makes its children so often try to conceal beneath the veil of external pomp, riches and gaiety, what treasures of misery and woe would be revealed to view? Would it not be found that the mysterious words which St. Paul uttered of even of those who engage lawfully and honorably in the marriage state "Nevertheless such shall have the tribulation of the flesh," have had and shall always have to the very iota a terrible fulfilment. I will not dwell on the long catalogue of temporal sorrows so often found annexed to the marriage state, or the heart-breaking scenes which widowhood, orphanage, sickness and poverty present; for in the order of religion, all these may be made conducive to salvation, but the example of St. Paul admonishes me that whilst it is my duty to proclaim with him the Catholic doctrine, that the Virgin sinneth not if she marry, it is equally so to announce the solemn warning announced by the same Apostle, "Nevertheless such shall have the tribulation of the flesh." It is my duty on an occasion like the present, to encourage those pious females who aspire to serve God perfectly, by repeating the inspired declaration of Holy Scripture: "The unmarried woman and the Virgin thinketh on the things of the Lord; that she may be holy both in body and spirit. But she that is married thinketh on the things of the world, how she may please her husband. And this, adds St. Paul, I speak for your profit, not to cast a snare upon you, but for that which is decent, and which may give you power to attend upon the Lord without impediment." I feel it to be my obligation to resound in your ears the general unrestricted conclusion which the Apostle deduces from all that he has laid down with regard to the respective states of marriage and Virginity: "Therefore both he that giveth his Virgin in marriage doth well and he that giveth her not, doth better"—to say with the same Apostle to the unmarried and to the widows, "it is good for them if they so continue even as I," and furthermore to renew the pious prays of St. Paul, "I would that all men were even as I myself," that is, as he tells us in the next verse, not prevented by marriage from attending on the Lord without impediment. This holy doctrine St Paul had learned from the example and instructions of his Divine Master. The Saviour was the Virgin Son of a Virgin Mother, his beloved Disciple was a Virgin also and his Church is portrayed every where in the sacred scriptures as his Virgin Spouse. It is then only meet that his altar should be served by a Virgin Priesthood and his Virginal body in the Holy Eucharist should come forth now from Virgin hands as it came forth in Nazareth from a Virgin's womb. * * * *

But if Holy Virginity be so exalted a virtue, if it render angelical the lives of those who practise it in perfection, it possesses these prerogatives, in a great measure, because those consecrated to its observance enjoy the happiness of serving God and their neighbour for the love of God, with a single and undivided heart. But says St. Paul, "I would have you to be without solicitude, he that is without a wife is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please God, but he that is with a wife is solicitous for the things of the world, how he may please his wife; and he is divided &c." * * * *

Behold then the grand motive on which the apostle grounds his exhortation to embrace the state of Virginity—that we may have power to attend on the Lord without impediment, and how shall the Virgin attend upon the Lord in a way more pleasing to her divine spouse than by instructing the little ones of Jesus Christ unto justice, and by devoting her Virginity to bring forth spiritual children for the Heavenly Bridegroom of her soul. * *

* * How highly will he honor before the assembled universe those pious and holy Virgins who renounced carnal maternity and its narrow ties of relationship, in order to be ready to embrace with a mother's heart every destitute child that stood in need of maternal care without distinction of clime or of country.

If the Saviour has pronounced a woe against the man who scandalizes any of his little ones, if the Guardian Angels of those little ones, as the Saviour intimates, complain to his Father in Heaven, of him who scandalizes these little ones, is it not just to infer that the Virgin who consecrates herself to spotless purity in order to rescue them from the danger of scandal and rear them up in holiness and justice, will on the other hand, receive from the same Saviour the most distinguished reward, and be made to shine like stars for all eternity. * * * * Oh! if the Virgin's lamp be replenished with this holy oil of charity when the hour shall come for her to go forth and meet her Bridegroom, with what joy will not the portals of the Heavenly Jerusalem be thrown open to admit her to the embrace of the Saviour in company with all her little ones whom by her Virginity she will have brought forth to Jesus Christ.

Yes, beloved Brethren, it is for this thrice sacred end which is so important to society and religion, that the ceremony of this day is sanctioned by the Catholic Church. O! Holy Church! in what wonderful and multiplied ways dost thou show thy tender solicitude for thy children. Thou sendest forth now as at thy first foundation, thy sons clothed with the mystic powers of the Priesthood of Melchisedek, to proclaim salvation even unto the ends of the earth and to offer up the unspotted sacrifice predicted by Malachy from the rising to the setting sun. Thy daughters, thou addressdest in the words of the psalmist, saying to each of them—"Hear, O daughter, and see and incline thine ear and forget thy people and thy Father's house, that thou mayest enter into the House of the Lord, for one day in his house is better than a thousand years in the tabernacles of sinners." After a beautiful and affecting paraphrase of these words of the psalmist, applied specially to the Postulants in the sanctuary, the Archbishop continued—It is recorded of the first disciples that on the day of Pentecost they were all filled with the Holy Ghost and began to speak in divers tongues the wonderful works of God. This mysterious and wonderful event, God as it were perpetrates in his Church by the multiplication of religious orders to minister to all the wants and sufferings to which humanity is subject here below, and thus does Catholicity speak to the hearts of mankind in a language which every one can understand. Look to the sanctuary of this very temple, whatever be your country or language, do you not see that the Catholic altar is encompassed by a priesthood collected from every quarter of the universe, and although educated, if I may so speak, in regions as distant from each other as the ends of the earth, yet do they all unite like children of the same family in speaking the same language of religion, in announcing to every tongue and tribe and people, the one undivided faith, which, like its divine Founder, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Want of space prevents us from doing entire justice to the admirable sermon of the Most Rev. Preacher, by following him to the end. To this apology we have just room to add, that his Excellency, General Avitabile, having visited the convent, expressed himself highly pleased with the accommodations, the order and arrangements of that most valuable institution, and presented it with a splendid carpet of large dimensions, as a token of his good wishes for its success in carrying out its benevolent intentions.

CONVERSIONS.—In the Bengal vicariate, in the preceding week, two adult females, natives of England, applied to be instructed and prepared for Baptism. Both had previously, by reading some Catholic tracts of controversy, been led to entertain doubts upon the truth of the English Protestant Church.

VISIT TO THE SERAMPORE CONVENT AND SCHOOLS.

On Monday last His Excellency, General Paul Avitabile, late Governor of Peshawar, Aga Kurbolai Mahomed, the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi, Michael D'Souza, Esq. Chevalier C. R. Lackersteen, Mr. David John and several Mahomedan Gentlemen visited the Serampore Convent and Schools in company with His Grace, the Archbishop. Mr. Elberling, the Secretary of the Colony, and Dr. Abbott, who is in medical charge of the station, paid their respects to the General and accompanied him in visiting the Convent and Schools. It was the General's wish and also that of Aga Kurbolai Mahomed and his party to visit the Orphanage at Chandernagore, but the lateness of the hour at which they left Serampore prevented them from doing so. The Aga kindly promised that on another occasion he would do himself that pleasure. We are enabled to state on authority, that the distinguished visitors were agreeably pleased with the healthy, cheerful and clean appearance of all the children, and with the excellent arrangements of the Institutions.

We are told that the authorities at Chandernagore were all in waiting in their robes of office until a late hour on last Monday to receive General Avitabile, the Archbishop, Bishop Borghi and the other gentlemen of the above party. We understand that the Archbishop has requested the Rev. Mr. Boulogne to present his most respectful thanks for the honor thus intended to be shown to the gentlemen who, at his desire proposed to visit the Orphanage, and his regret that by occasion of a wholly unexpected delay, the party were prevented from proceeding to Chandernagore.

THE DURRUMTOLLAH CHURCH.

On last Sunday morning the Church of the SACRED HEART OF JESUS, at Durrumtollah, which has just been placed by its pious foundress, Mrs. Pascoa Barretto D'Souza, under the jurisdiction of His Grace, the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, was a scene of universal joy. Long before the appointed hour every part of this beautiful and costly edifice was crowded. Soon after 8 o'clock the Most Rev. Dr. Carew, attended by the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi, arrived, and His Grace was received at the principal entrance by Mrs. D'Souza, Messrs. Antony and Michael D'Souza, the Rev. Messrs. Mascarenhas and Goiran, and a large body of the Congregation, attended by several Members of the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. On entering the Church, the Te Deum was chaunted, after which His Grace imparted the Episcopal Benediction. Bishop Borghi celebrated a Pontifical High Mass, and the Choir sung Mozart's Mass, No. XII, Mr. Goodall Atkinson presiding at the Organ. After the Gospel His Grace ascended the pulpit and delivered a luminous discourse, which for eloquence and elegance of language has, we believe, never been surpassed any where. The text was from the Epistle of the day, the second Sunday of Advent. We regret, particularly for the sake of such of our readers as were not present on the occasion, that we are unable to give more than a mere outline of the highly edifying and energetic address.

His Grace commenced by remarking that the Epistle to the Romans holds the first place of all St. Paul's Epistles in the order of their distribution in the Holy Scriptures, although some of the other Epistles were written before it. This is to be ascribed to the pre-eminent importance of the subjects of grace and justification of which it treats and to the superior dignity and veneration of the Roman Church. The Apostle expresses, in the 1st Chapter, his earnest desire to visit the faithful at Rome that he might, he says, be comforted by that which was common to them both, namely, their faith and his. Of the faith which the Church of Rome professed, St. Paul says, "that it was spoken of in the whole world." In other words, the faith then professed throughout the orthodox Christian World was, according to the Apostle, that of Rome—it was Catholic and it was Roman, just as at the present day. St. Paul, in all his Epistles, evinces an untiring zeal for the maintenance in its full integrity of this holy faith;—and he, not unfrequently, points out, for our instruction, those particular passions and vices which sometimes insensibly, and at other times almost immediately lead to the corruption and loss of that supernatural and divine virtue. At the very opening of the Epistle now treated of, the Apostle shows by the example of the wise and the learned of Greece and Rome before the promulgation of the Gospel, that professing themselves to be wise, they became fools,—because they detained the truth of God in injustice, and because when from the wonderful works of creation they should have known and glorified the Creator, they did not glorify him and give him thanks, but became vain in their own thoughts and their foolish heart was darkened. "And," says the Apostle, "as they liked not to have God in their knowledge, God delivered them up to a reprobate sense, to do those things which are not convenient, being filled with all iniquity, malice, fornication, avarice, wickedness, full of envy, murder, contention, deceit, malignity; whisperers, detractors, hateful to God, contumelious, proud, haughty, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without affection, without fidelity, without mercy." In the Christian dispensation, the Apostle shows that the justice of God exercises a similar retribution towards those whom he has enlightened with the true faith, if their lives be not in concordance with the doctrine they profess. In his first Epistle to Timothy, the Apostle says "that they that will become rich fall into temptation and into the snare of the devil, and into many unprofitable and hurtful desires which drown men into destruction and perdition. For," he adds, "the desire of money is the root of all evil, which some coveting, have erred from the faith, and have entangled themselves in many sorrows." In the same Epistle the Apostle thus addresses Timothy his disciple, "This precept I commend to thee, O son Timothy; according to the prophecies going before on this, that thou war in them a good warfare, having faith and a good conscience, which some rejecting, have made shipwreck concerning the faith." Thus then in the order of Divine Grace, we behold the intimate connection which the practice of pure morality has with perseverance in the profession of the true faith, since from the example just adduced, we see that Hymeneus and Alexander made shipwreck of their faith, only after their conscience had become defiled by sin.

"In effect," His Grace continued, "as God never abandons those whom he calls to the true faith unless they first by sin forsake or renounce their allegiance to Him, it is certain, that they who unhappily fall away from the truth, must have by neglecting to co-operate with God's grace by inattention or neglect of the duties of religion, forfeited that Divine illumination without which man's mind is tossed about by every wind of doctrine. Among the evils, against which St. Paul oftentimes warned his Converts, as fatal to the welfare of religion, we find discord particularly mentioned, Galatians Cap. 5. v. 19 "Now the works of the flesh are manifest, fornication, uncleanness, immodesty, luxury, idolatry, witchcraft, enmities, contentions, emulations, wrath, quarrels, dissentions, sects, To guard against such an evil, St. Paul speaks thus, Hebrews Cap. 13. v. 17. "Obey your Prelates, and be subject to them; for they watch as being to render an account of your souls: that they may do this with joy, and not with grief." And to the Bishops, he says Acts Cap. 20 v. 28. "Take heed to yourselves and to the whole flock, wherein the Holy Ghost hath placed you to rule the Church of God which he hath purchased with his own blood." And again in the Epistle to the Ephesians, Cap. 4 v. 11, he adds, "and he hath given some Apostles, and some prophets, and other some evangelists, and other some pastors and doctors; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: until we all meet in the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ:" and this obligation of obedience and unity holds in every thing that appertains to religion.

His Grace here very impressively dwelt upon St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, Cap. 12, wherein the Church is called the body of Christ and its members assimilated to those of a human body, for, "if one member suffer any thing, all the members suffer with it; or, if one member glory, all the members rejoice with it"

NOTICE TO THE CATHOLICS OF CALCUTTA.

It having pleased the Divine goodness to confer an additional blessing of great importance on the Catholic Church in Calcutta, the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, is thereby happily enabled to provide for the spiritual wants of the Faithful who frequent the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, by appointing an approved Clergyman to the care of that Church and of the District or Parish annexed to it. The arrangements specified in the subjoined Schedule are made subject to the same conditions and provisions which have been already stated in the Pastoral Letter lately addressed by the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, to the Catholics of Calcutta, and the faithful who reside in the Parish or District of the Church of the Sacred Heart are in like manner now instructed, to have recourse to the Ministry of the Priest charged with the care of that Church for spiritual offices and particularly for Baptism, the Paschal Communion, Matrimony and the last Sacraments.

The hours for Divine Service on Sundays and Festivals of obligations will be as heretofore, 7 and 8 o'clock A. M.

The Rev. Mr. Goiran is charged with the care of the above mentioned Church and district.

On alternate Sundays the Rev. Mr. Goiran will preach in Portuguese and the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy in English.

Rev. Mr. Goiran will also give Catechetical instructions in the Bengalee language at such times as will suit the convenience of the Catholics under his care who are ignorant of the English or Portuguese languages.

SCHEDULE.

Limits of the District or Parish annexed to the Church of the Sacred Heart.

South of Durrumtollah Church, Jaun-bazar Street as far as Wellesley-street

East,—Wellington street to Bow-bazar street.

North.—Bow-bazar street, Loll-bazar road, to Tank-square.

West.—Tank-square, old court house street, Government place and Esplanade row.

By order of the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic,

W. KENNEDY,
Principal of St. John's College.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. BORGLI.—The venerated Bishop Borgli, Vicar Apostolic of Thibet and Hindoostan, took his departure yesterday for Europe on the Steamer Bentinck accompanied by the Rev. Dr. R. Flomanus, late chaplain of Purneah. His Lordship, we are sure, carries with him the good wishes of this community, and who will anxiously look forward for the time of his return to India.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—Within the last few days the Guardians (themselves Protestants) of a Protestant Orphanage have placed the child in the Catholic Orphanage for the purpose of being educated in the Catholic faith.

BELLARY.—The Rev. Mr. Doyle, the truly good Chaplain at Bellary has received from Major Pole, the gallant and beloved Commanding Officer of H. M. 63rd Regt. a most kind letter of thanks for his unremitting attention to the soldiers of that corps during the prevalence of the Cholera among them. The letter was accompanied with a donation of 300 Rs. for charitable purposes.

MAURITIUS.

The following is an extract of a letter from our Mauritius Correspondent—"I have now to acquaint you that the Right Rev. Dr. Collier, Bishop of Milevium, and Vicar Apostolic in this Colony, has left a few days ago for Bombay, whence he is to proceed, via Suez, to England for the purpose of selecting and engaging a number of clergymen proportionate to the wants of this Colony, where several Parishes are destitute of curates. That worthy Prelate has met with the sympathies of the population who cannot but be sensible of the interest and devotedness thus displayed in their favor by this useful mission. He is to be succeeded during his absence, by the Very Rev. William Carr, Vicar General, a most estimable Clergyman who has long resided at the Mauritius, and whose character commands public veneration."

RECEPTION OF NUNS.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—Would you do me the favor to give insertion to the accompanying remarks in your valuable Paper.

According to announcement, the solemn and interesting ceremony of two Ladies taking the veil, took place on the 8th Inst. in St. Thomas' Church, attached to Loretto Convent. The ceremony was preceded by a Solemn High Mass which was chaunted with great effect by the Right Rev. Dr. Borgli, Lord Bishop of Bethesda, and Vicar Apostolic of Thibet and Hindoostan, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Cuvclier of St. Xavier's College, and the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, Principal of St. John's College. At 7 o'clock, the hour fixed for the commencement of the holy ceremonies, the officiating Bishop with his assistant Ministers, and our beloved Archbishop entered the sanctuary, preceded by Thurifer, Acolytes &c His Grace in full canonicals closing the procession. His Lordship Bishop Borgli assisted by his attendants immediately robed himself for the celebration of the Divine mysteries. After the Gospel had been sung, the Bishop having taken his seat on the Epistle side of the Altar, the Postulants and the Professed entered the sanctuary, each holding in her hand a lighted wax candle, their trains being borne by four children who were very handsomely attired, wearing on their heads wreaths of flowers, emblematical of innocence. His Grace then ascended the pulpit, and delivered an argumentative and learned discourse, in his usual eloquent and impressive style, taking for his text, "This therefore I say brethren, the time is short, and it remaineth that they also who have wives be as if they had none," 1st Cor, 7, 29. His Grace prefaced his discourse with a few salutary admonitions on the necessity of preparing for a happy death, and proceeded to show the fitness of Monastic Institutions for that end. At the conclusion he invoked the divine blessing upon the Postulants, and imparted his Episcopal benediction to an edified and crowded congregation.

The Superioress and her assistant conducted the Postulants to the steps of the Altar, where kneeling they were successively interrogated by the officiating Bishop in the form prescribed by the Ritual. It may seem inconsistent to our Protestant readers, that interrogatories should be made use of at the very moment of reception; but they are here repeated as if to obtain a last solemn assurance of the motives which have led the postulants to the embracement of a religious state of life. How admirably is here displayed the anxious care of the Church to admit none to this state, but such as in demanding admittance, are obeying the call of the Most High. When the usual prayers had been read, the officiating Prelate rising, said: "What God has commenced in you, may he perfect." The postulants answered "Amen." The most affecting part of the ceremony here followed: the Novices lying prostrate, whilst the officiating Prelate extending his hands over them, invoked the Holy Spirit to descend upon them. The professed and clergy knelt during the time. The ceremony concluded with the Bishop's pontifical benediction. The religious retired to their Choir in the same order in which they had entered.

Thus ended another of those imposing and soul-stirring ceremonies which we seldom have the pleasure of witnessing in these eastern climes, since the commencement of the dark period of what is called the reformation. Well may we exclaim in the language of the Scriptures, How incomprehensible are thy judgments, O Lord, and how unsearchable are thy ways! for who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? For three long centuries has England been suffering under the punishment of her apostacy; but at length has the Almighty, the disposer of events, slackened in his wrath, and is once more extending the arm of his mercy to its unhappy people, and the spirit of the true religion is again rapidly developing itself. Our dissenting brethren wandering about unsatisfied amidst contradictory sects and conflicting religious opinions, which have so long disturbed the social and spiritual happiness of that once Catholic land, are now returning in numbers to the one fold of the one shepherd, the ancient faith of their forefathers.

In regard to the ceremonies of the 8th Inst. of which I have given a brief outline, whether I consider the dignified manner of the venerated Prelates present; and their respective attendants, in discharging their sacred offices; or call to mind the several passages in the eloquent appeal of the zealous, learned and Most Rev. Orator, in which he spoke so forcibly to the heart as well as to the understanding of each one present; I fancy I still behold the humble and chaste followers of the Lamb, generously and nobly making a sacrifice of their all in the cause of their dear Lord and Master. I must confess that I am at a loss which of these interesting ceremonies most to admire: each is pregnant with most important matter, as well for the thinking and well meaning mind to dwell and meditate upon, as for the religious heart to imitate and practice; truly may we exclaim with the royal Prophet: "Better is one day in the house of the Lord, than ages in the tabernacles of sinners."

A very great number of persons present were Protestants, of high standing and respectability, whose behaviour was truly becoming. May the God of wisdom open the eyes of their understanding, to see the beauty of the truth, and give them grace to embrace it.

The music on the occasion was excellent; and the solo "qui tollis peccata mundi" &c. sung by Signor Auguis was exceedingly grand, and reflected great credit on the performer. Begging many pardons for trespassing at such length on the columns of your truly useful journal, and wishing you every success in your undertakings,

I have the honor to remain, Sir,

Yours most respectfully,

O. J. C.

MADRAS.

JOSEPH MARIA D'SILVA TORRES, ARCH-BISHOP ELECT OF GOA.

To the Editor of the Athenæum.

Sir,—Be so good as to insert the following in your next issue and oblige,

Sir,
Your most obedient Servant,
M. F. Lebo.
Prior of the Cathedral.
St. Thome, 27th November, 1843.

GREGORY, servant of the servants of God, of &c.
To all the Brethren suffragans of the Church of Goa, salutation, &c.

We have this day provided the Church of Goa, only Metropolitan one of the East Indies subject to our beloved Daughter in Christ, Maria the 2d of this name, Queen of Portugal and Algarves, which Church of de jure patronage by foundation or dotation either de jure Apostolico belongs to the said Queen, and from which patronage nothing is known to have been in any way hitherto derogated, and the said Church being destitute at present in some respect of the comfort of a Pastor, we have provided it by Apostolic authority in the person of our beloved Son, Joseph Maria De Silva Torres, Archbishop Elect of Goa, in consideration of his merits, having taken the Council of Venerable Brethren Cardinals of the Holy Church of Rome; and we have appointed him Archbishop and Pastor and committed to him the charge, government, and administration of the same Metropolitan Church of Goa, conferring on him fully in spiritual matters and more fully as it is contained in the letters already forwarded in our Despatches. Therefore we remind and exhort you all, that you be attentive to the orders sent to you by our Apostolic writings, that you follow the said Archbishop Joseph Maria as the members follow its head, paying him due and avowed obedience and reverence, so that a mutual good will should exist amongst you and him, to the end that acceptable fruits may be produced, and we may be able to praise your devotion to the Lord.—Given at Rome, under the leaden Seal, 13th July, in the year of Incarnation, 1843 — Athenæum, Nov. 28.

THE CHOLERA.—We regret to say, on the authority of private letters from Bellary, this dire disease is raging at that place; but it is with pleasure we record the feelings of respect and admiration, which the zeal and attention of the Rev. Mr. Doyle, the Catholic Priest at the station, in attending to the calls of the sick and dying, and administering consolation and comfort to them, had inspired all classes of people; the officers and men of H. M. 63rd Regiment have spoken in the warmest terms, of his attendance upon the Catholics of the Regiment, while the Commanding officer, Major Pole, addressed him a very complimentary letter on the subject, forwarding him at the same time Three hundred rupees, to be applied to any charitable purpose the Rev. Gentleman should determine upon.—Examiner, Nov. 23.

Mrs. Switzer, Latchford, on Thursday, renounced the Protestant faith, and was received into the Catholic church by the Rev. Mr. Cherry, R. C. Chaplain, Shanagolden.—Limerick Reporter.

NEW ZEALAND.

LUMINOUS DOCTRINE OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.
"To thee I will give the keys of the kingdom of heaven"—
Matthew, 16. 19.

The Roman Catholic Bishop, Jean Baptiste Francis, to the People of New Zealand, who have received the Faith of the Roman Catholic Church, the stem of truth."

Salutation and benediction to you all in Jesus Christ.
"The Church of the living God is the pillar and foundation of truth"—1st Timothy, x, 15.

MY DEARLY BELOVED CHILDREN OF NEW ZEALAND—I have just returned from a voyage to several islands in these seas. I have fulfilled the command which God has given me—to carry the true doctrine to the numerous tribes inhabiting the same. My stay, in consequence, has been long at each of them; but by this means the people have learnt the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, the stem of truth. Several thousands of them have been baptized by me. They are now in the way of salvation—they are happy; for their darkness and ignorance have been dispelled. At this moment the light diffuses its rays to them all; their hearts are in peace, and happiness is in their kingdoms. Their authority and their lands are still their own as fully as they were before; they have not passed into my possession. I have only carried to them my sincere affection, and in return they have given their love to God, to me, and to my priests exercising the sacred ministry amongst them. This is the rule of the Roman Catholic Church—this is the precept of charity.

But do not say, "The Bishop has forgotten us;" for my love to you is great. You are my primitive spiritual children. In New Zealand I commenced my instructions, and I have also dispersed amongst you several priests, to exercise the sacred ministry in your behalf. But, alas! the territory of New Zealand is very extensive, and your tribes are not bordering on each other, like those of the islands I have recently visited. With regard to your tribes, they are widely separated, and, for this reason, my instructions have not been imparted to you promptly and simultaneously. Notwithstanding this, our journeys to visit and instruct you have been frequent. A greater number of priests will soon arrive, and there shall be an abundant distribution of books, that your enlightenment may be increased. This is the first of these books; others will shortly be given to you.

You see that I have not been unmindful of your desires to understand the word of God. I am also aware of your ardour in the search of truth and justice. You have not ceased to entreat me to give you books of instruction: four years and eight months have only elapsed since we came to New Zealand, yet this first book is now completed, in order to convey to your souls both nourishment and strength; for true doctrine is the food of the soul of man.

This book will assist you in your endeavours to understand the sacred volume itself, the meaning of the word of God; that is to say, the faith of the great body of Christians over the whole earth, and during every age, composing the congregation of the Roman Catholic Church. This book, moreover, will serve to refute the false assertions vented against this Church, the stem of truth, the One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolical, and Roman Church, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and foundation of truth. These are the things which you will find in this book, by the aid of the grace of God. Redouble your efforts to discover truth and justice; be diligent in reading this book, with the letter annexed to it.

My children, you have probably experienced anxiety and trouble in consequence of different and multiplied discourses, that is to say, untrue assertions against our religion and faith. Even here, in New Zealand, your ears are stunned with incessant statements, attacking the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, the stem of truth; attacking the Bishop and priesthood of that Church. But abandon evil words to those who choose to utter them; the sin will rest on them alone, and God will pronounce his decision on them at his awful tribunal. On my part I do not speak to injure my neighbour, but solely to unfold the truth, in order to promote his welfare.

Our manner of acting with regard to those who advance to meet the wrath of God, and who pursue the road to perdition, is thus: we pray to God that they may convert themselves to the Catholic, Apostolical, and Roman Church, which is the way to heaven and the foundation of the truth, which they have abandoned. It is possible that many of them do not fully comprehend the malignity of their conduct. Endeavour, my children, to understand what our faith really is, and may they endeavour to understand it also. This is the desire of my heart. May they see and acknowledge the truth of the Catholic Church, their mother Church, who bewails their fate, the fate of her still beloved children, who have wandered from her, and are lost in error. Let us return to our point. The Church of the living God is the pillar and foundation of truth. These are words well calculated to fortify the minds of those who are troubled by the multiplicity of erroneous assertions. I again repeat that you will perceive by this book that the Roman Catholic Church is the Church of the living God; for to this Church belongs the great body of Christians, of every nation and of every age. To this Church belongs the sacred ministry, the propagation of the faith, the most excellent worship, ceremonies, and rites; to this church belongs the Bible itself, with the explanation of the Bible, and of the whole word of God. By this you will see that the Roman Catholic Church is the pillar and foundation of truth, the tree of life, the focus of light, the house built by Jesus Christ on a rock, which shall never fall. This also is the Church described by the Apostles as the Catholic and Holy Church. This, in fine, is the Church which pronounces infallible decisions in matters of faith. For this reason, the Apostles give this precept to all mankind—Believe in the holy Catholic Church; that is to say, let your faith be conformable to hers. But here is another great precept of Jesus Christ—He who does not hear the Church (that is to say, who does not believe in the Church), let him be to you as a man who knows not God. These are the memorable words of our Saviour, to hinder men from walking in the ways of darkness, and from being carried away by every wind of doctrine, and also to prevent the corruption of the sacred volume, or of a single word it contains.

Endeavour then to seek the true Church; and in order to succeed in your undertaking, there are two means which may be very profitably employed at once, namely, the testimony of the great body of the Christian World, and certain clear passages in Holy Writ. Let it not be said we will take the Bible alone, in order to seek the true Church, and the meaning of the word of God; for to this every upright man will find the following reply, clear and conclusive. The sacred volume unanimously understood by the great body of Christians in every age and nation, is greatly preferable to the same book by itself differently understood by individual readers, or even by a new Church having contradictory tenets, and abounding with false assertions; therefore this principle is very just. The sacred volume, together with its common interpretation, that is to say, the unanimous testimony of the great body of Christians respecting the signification of the same book—these two means, I say, employed at the same time, are the basis of truth. Moreover, these two means just pointed out, are suited to all capacities, and hence the true Church is easily known. Now, according to the tradition of the great body of Christians, and according to the true sense of the sacred volume, here are two unanswerable testimonies.
